The vocal pupils of Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup and the violin pupils of Alexander T. Stewart gave a concert at Steinway hall last Thursday evening. The accompanists were: For vocal pupils, Mrs. Arthur W. Moore; and for violin pupils, Miss Aimee Davies, Miss Edna Ford and Miss Estelle Drummond. Long before the appointed time every available seat in the large auditorium was filled. The program showed great ambition on the part of teachers and pupils and was rendered with varying success. It were invidious to apply the same principles of criticism to the efforts of amateurs that would be the proper standard by which to judge professionals. It is unnecessary to state that the ladies were all young, sweet and lovely, and that the violin pupils were deeply in earnest and gave every evidence of conscientious work. The appearance of certain ones, it is true, showed either lack of judgment or else a willingness to allow a pupil to acquire stage experience and confidence before the public at the expense of the audience. One excellent feature of the program was the preliminary notice of no encores. This statement always contributes to the pleasure and the comfort of an audience. In the first three movements of Schubert's opus 137, No. 3, Miss Aimee Davis, at the piano, and Charles H. Blank were at their best in the second one of the three, producing a sweetness of tone and a delicacy of phrasing very pleasing to the ear. In Bartlett's "Frogs' Singing School," Misses Helene Anderson, Amy Hammond, Eva Jeffrey and Gertrude Cohn sang harmoniously, bringing out all the mirth and sprightliness of the composition. Miss Viola Van Orden rendered "Ah! my heart is weary" by A. Gowing with much intelligence and feeling. At first she seemed a trifle nervous, but soon regained her full power. She is a dramatic contralto of considerable talent, and sings with rare sweetness of tone and distinctness of enunciation. Her voice has promise. The violin trio, prelude from "Oska," Rieding, by Messrs. Charles H. Blank, Fred Seiffert and Marinus Lytjen, was the best of the violin numbers. The trio showed mastery of tone production and harmony. Miss Jeffrey sang Stewart's "California Night Song," with cello obligato by Mr. William Leimert, with much expression. Miss Sydney Miller played Kela Bela's Hungarian Fantasie with good expression and fullness of tone. "Tuscan Folk Songs" by Carriola were sung by Miss Saida Dewitt and Miss Jeffrey. Miss Dewitt has a clear light soprano voice of sweet tone. Miss Irene Meussdorfer sang the Polonaise from "Mignon" with success, and Miss Charlotte Morris sang two French songs delightfully. Miss Isabel Seal, Miss Helen Sutphen and Miss Winnie Bruce were other violin pupils who played well. There were many beautiful flowers bestowed during the evening by appreciative and admiring friends.

A testimonial concert to Edward A. Thornton was given on Wednesday evening in the Unitarian church, Alameda, the program being: Quartets, "A Song of the Sea," C. Harford Lloyd, "The Tin Soldiers," Howell, by the Golden Gate Male Quartet—first tenor, Frank Onslow, second tenor, Arthur A. Macurda, first bass, John da P. Teller, second bass, Henry L. Perry; bass solo, "O, Thou Sublime, Sweet Evening Star" (Tannhauser), Wagner, Mr. Perry; arietta from "La Verra Constanza," Haydn, Mrs. Charles H. ### On Kingston Bridge

(PUBLISHED BY DESIRE.)

(An old legend says the dead walk on Kingston Bridge on All Souls' Night.)

On Kingston Bridge the starlight shone
Through hurrying mists with shrouded glow:
The boding night wind made its moan,
The mighty river crept below;
'Twas All Souls' Night, and to and fro
The quick and dead together walked,
The quick and dead together talked,
On Kingston Bridge.

Two met who had not met for years—
Their hate was once too deep for fears;
One drew his rapier as he came—
Up leaped his anger like a flame;
With clash of mail he faced his foe,
And bade him stand and meet him so.
He felt a grave-yard wind go by—
Cold, cold as was his enemy;
A stony horror held him fast.
The Dead looked with a ghastly stare,
And sighed, "I know thee not," and passed
Like to the mist and left him there
On Kingston Bridge.

'Twas All Souls' Night, and to and fro
The quick and dead together walked,
The quick and dead together talked,
On Kingston Bridge.

Two met who had not met for years;
With grief that was too deep for tears
They parted last.
He clasped her hand, and in her eyes
He sought Love's rapturous surprise.
"Oh, Sweet!" he cried, "hast thou come back To say thou lov'st thy lover still?"
Into the starlight pale and cold
She gazed afar—her hand was chill.
"Dost thou remember how we kept
Our ardent vigils?—how we kissed:
Take thou these kisses as of old!"
An icy wind about him swept;
"I know thee not," she sighed, and passed
Into the dim and shrouding mist
On Kingston Bridge.

'Twas All Souls' Night, and to and fro
The dead and quick together walked,
The dead and quick together talked,
On Kingston Bridge.

Automobile Topics

The automobile records for fifty and twenty-five miles were broken on October nineteenth at the Cleveland driving park during the matinee race meet under the auspices of the Cleveland Automobile Club and sanctioned by the American Automobile Association. Charles Gorndt ran his machine fifty miles in 55:42, as against the former mark of 1:01:23 2-5, and Earl Kiser sent his machine twenty-five miles in 23:59, beating the previous record. Both of the machines used were Winton touring cars.

Charles C. Moore and family made a trip to Palo Alto and return last Sunday in Mr. Moore's Winton. Frank H. Johnson and party of friends have just returned from a week's automobile touring in Santa Barbara, returning home via Fresno, Stockton, Calistoga, Napa Springs and San Rafael, the entire trip consuming over one thousand three hundred miles. In speaking of his trip, Mr. Johnson stated that he had no trouble whatsoever, with the exception that a dealer in one of the rural towns gave him gasoline which was three-fourths water. Mr. Johnson is thinking of making a trip across the continent early next spring. He has read with considerable interest about the trips made by other automobilists and believes that by careful study and planning of the trip ahead, the trip across the continent can be beaten by at least five days with his present car.

M. G. Clark is now the possessor of a new Winton which he purchased last week from the Pioneer Company. On Sunday, in company with a party of friends, Mr. Clark enjoyed the beautiful fall weather touring through the Park and Presidio.

Mr. Webb, of Petaluma, in company with a party of friends, made a trip to San Jose and return last Sunday in Mr. Webb's new Oldsmobile light tonneau touring car.

E. P. Brinegar and party of friends made a trip to San Jose and return on Sunday last in the Winton Quad.

Dr. and Mrs. C. H. Whitman and party made a trip Sunday in their new Cadillac touring car to San Jose, where they dined with friends, and returned to town in the evening.

Morris Levy has been taking the city officials out in his Cadillac a great deal of late. Mr. Levy is doing his best for better pavements in San Francisco.

Cuyler Lee, agent for Cadillac automobiles, will remove this week to his new garage, 359-363 Golden Gate avenue.

Mr. and Mrs. E. Lynch and Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Lynch made a trip Sunday in their new Cadillac to San Jose. Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Pyser and Ruth and Dorothy Pyser, Mr. and Mrs. D. Green made a trip Sunday in their Cadillac to San Jose. Dr. E. L. Wemple, in his Cadillac, entertained a party of friends on an automobile ride to San Jose and return Sunday. In his Cadillac, Mr. M. Tansy and party went to San Jose and return on the same day, and H. H. Owens, Miss Stewart, Dr. Hale and Miss Owens made a trip to San Jose, returning to town in the evening.

Dr. H. Kugeler and wife left San Francisco on the eleven o'clock boat Sunday and went to San Jose in their Cadillac. They arrived in Oakland in time for a six o'clock dinner.

Some ten weeks ago Motoring and Boating began a competition to discern which is the most popular motor car in America today, and the first poll given in last week's issue places the White steamer at the head of the list with the greatest record of votes.

Miss Kate Dillon has by no means tired of automobiling, and can be seen as much these days in her White as when she first took up motoring. I hear that Miss Dillon intends to journey to Mexico ere long and tour about that country in her White.

W. S. Barnes, the lumberman, has just invested in a White touring car. He has covered several hundred miles in Monterey county, and claims few pastimes are a greater pleasure than that of motoring.

The temporary headquarters of the White Sewing Machine Company are now at 1078 Market street, corner of Franklin, where also the company's spacious and handsome garage is located. The model E White touring car will have arrived in San Francisco by the time this paper reaches its readers, and great interest no doubt will be centred in the 1905 car, with the hill climbing gear which General Corbin claims is such a feature.

At the automobile races held at Cleveland on Saturday, October fifteenth, a White model E car was the star performer, even though Oldfield and Kiser both raced.

If ever an automobile in San Francisco is put to hard, everyday usage, it is the Autocar touring car of Mrs. C. S. Middleton, and her machine is today in as good and even better running order than when she first purchased it. Mrs. Middleton is one of the most careful and expert drivers of an automobile in San Francisco and the excellent condition of her Autocar is a good example of how careful driving helps to keep an auto in the best of shape.

Among Autocar owners who were touring in their machines last Sunday were W. H. Wright, Henry Hedges, Douglas Grant, Leo Korbel and Harold Plummer. Mr. Korbel had two friends from Europe with him and in a conversation about automobiles they declared their intention of purchasing American machines before returning home because they were more simple in construction, and pointed out the Autocar as an example of simplicity and accessibility in automobiles of American make. Miss Emma Wright, a former Stanford girl, has become quite a chauffeur and runs her father's handsome touring car quite frequently.

Rudolph Spreckels was seen piloting one of the handsome and speedy little Autocar runabouts through the city the other day.

S. G. Buckbee and wife, in company with M. H. De Young, spent Sunday touring about the vicinity of Oakland and Berkeley in one of the new four-cylinder Packard cars.

Mr. McBride, of San Jose, expects to take down his new four-cylinder Packard car to that city some day this week.

Two more records made by the Pope-Toledo at the Los Angeles races! George P. Fuller drove his 24 h. p. Pope-Toledo the third mile in the five-mile race with Frank A. Garbutt in 1:00 3-5, which is the fastest mile ever made in the world by a 24 h. p. touring car. Bert Dingley, in 24 h. p. Pope-Toledo, drove five miles in 5:09 3-5, the separate miles in 1:02, 1:02, 1:02, 1:01 3-5, 1:02. This time was made on Monday as some of the races were left over from Saturday's program.

E. M. Hecht has placed his order for a side entrance Pope-Toledo, to be delivered in January.

All of the Eastern automobile journals in reporting the 300 mile Vanderbilt Cup Race mention the fact that the 24 h. p. Pope-Toledo made the most consistent time of any car in the race, the greatest variation in speed in any of the thirty mile laps being two minutes.

The Bohemian

Each of us has some favorite draught,
Of grain, or grape, or malt, or mead;
For some the craved-for cup when quaffed,
Bright visions in the brain doth breed;
While others in each bubbling bead
A whispered warning seem to hear;
Remorse and sorrow ne'er succeed
A Cigarette and Glass of Beer.

Yea, many a reveller hath laughed
While midnight did to morning speed;
Then came Remorse's rankling shaft
To sting him for his guzzling greed;
But as for me—I never heed
The coming day; I feel no fear;
I take—while some old rhyme I read—
A Cigarette and Glass of Beer.

If wine and whisky sometimes waft
Their fumes into my brain, and lead
Me on to where—both drunk and daft—
Of every sober sense I'm freed,
Till in the Tenderloin they bleed
Me for the booze that's drugged and dear—
To brace me up I only need
A Cigarette and Glass of Beer.

ENVOI.

So when my fevered pulses plead
For something to console and cheer—
Experience has this cure decreed—
October, 1904. —The Impressionist.

Marshall C. Harris drove his 24 h. p. Pope-Toledo at the Los Angeles races, his car developing a speed of about 1:05, 1:06. He could make no better time on account of a slight defect discovered in a spark coil. He had no difficulty, however, in easily defeating all other stock cars, with the exception of the Pope-Toledos driven by Fuller and Dingley.

Robertson on "Best Sellers"

There are few men in San Francisco who know so much about books as does A. M. Robertson. For thirty-four years he has been associated with books, first as a seller and then as a publisher, and he knows his books well. He has his own views on "best sellers." In the course of a chat the other day about some of the best-selling novels, he said:

"What do you mean by a 'best seller'?"

I told him. I referred to "Janice Meredith," "The Crisis," "Mrs. Wiggs" and others which have received so much advertising of late years.

"I do not consider the best selling books," he said, "those that are sold in that boom way. Frequently they only sell for a certain season. The real best seller is the book that keeps on selling, after you hear no more about it in the papers."

He mentioned some instances, and his illustrations are certainly borne out by the facts. Mr. Robertson himself publishes few books, and those only what his judgment tells him are worthy of publication, and is never discouraged when some of these have no "boom." He expects them to win on their merits, and is not impatient when it takes a few months before the public "discovers" them.

Child Stories

Myra Kelly, whose stories of school life in the East Side, published from time to time in McClure's, have just been brought out in a volume entitled "Little Citizens," is the daughter of Dr. J. E. Kelly, a New York surgeon. She was born in Dublin, but has spent most of her life in New York, and made the acquaintance of her "little citizens" during a two years' experience as a teacher in the ghetto district. It is currently reported that the incidents which comprise the series are transcripts from life, but that has no bearing on their literary merits. There are good stories, whatever their genesis. And speaking of good stories, it is wonderful how McClure's manages to secure the cream of the child-stories, as distinguished from children's stories. It was in its pages that so many of Josephine Daskam's imps and angels made their debut; Emmy Lou was at home there; Myra Kelly's Miss Bailey and her little flock marched in and took possession, and now that they have performed their part, Marion Hill has contributed to the October number what, it is hoped, will be but the introduction to another family—the unlucky little twins who were being brought up under the guidance of "The Privileges of Parenthood."

Dime Novels

George C. Jenks contributes a most interesting article to the October Bookman on the subject of "Dime Novel Makers." He comes gallantly to the rescue of the character of dime novels, asserting that no unwholesome thought or suggestion would have been tolerated by their readers and that villainy was never permitted to triumph permanently nor the moral to sink out of sight, a fact which was patent enough at all times to any one who had ever gorged on such literary diet, or nibbled surreptitiously at the forbidden fruit. Crude they were, and are, but never dull, and however improbable the hairbreadth escapes and unlikely the gallant rescues, at least they were possible. Most of the harsh criticism which has been hurled at the dime novel has come from those who had no first-hand knowledge, but fondly imagined that were "The Wild Huntsman of the Plains," or "The Charming Cherokee Captive" annihilated, there would arise an immediate demand for some long and deadly dull classic. People who could not find what they wanted would be constrained to take what they could get. That may be when it is a matter of food to fill an empty stomach or clothing to cover a naked back. Yesterday's dinner and last year's coat cannot be brought into existence again, no matter how great the desire or need, but with esthetic pleasures we are on a different plane. Given the habit of reading or of looking at pictures or listening to music, and once the taste is formed, if the old pattern cannot be had, the old book, picture or tune can be made to do good service. If reading, in itself, is a virtue, then, at least, the devourers of dime novels deserve a good word for having their feet set in the right path. There is an idea that only messenger boys and idle school boys, predestined to come to a bad end, are readers of cheap fiction of the adventurous and melodramatic order, but it would open the eyes of some of the carping critics to discover that lawyers, legislators and hard brain workers are regular patrons. They find the same recreation in the tales that President Lincoln did in attending the minstrels during the stress of the war. It is only the exceptional mind which can turn from a knotty legal problem to reading Sophocles in the original, or demonstrating theorems in spherical geometry by way of rest. It is said that hundreds of thousands of old-time dime novels were sent to the front during the Civil war, and that they were "swapped" from side to side as regularly as coffee and tobacco. The dime novel had the advantage of being light and convenient to carry, as well as being immediately available in the days before the era of cheap books. The worst count that has ever been brought against it is that it encouraged small boys to abscond with the idea of becoming Indian exterminators, but even that is not all to the bad, for there is something to be said in favor of a literature which aroused enthusiasm to the pitch of action and overcame the terrors of "seeing things at night." Writers who were well known in other paths of literature did not disdain this humbler walk. Edward S. Ellis was a school teacher and the author of numerous standard text-books. Judge William J. Hall of Ohio was another contributor. Albert W. Aiken, the actor, made a specialty of New York detective yarns, and Buffalo Bill wrote till he tired, when Colonel Prentiss Ingraham, recently deceased, continued to turn them out. The two men were friends, and the only stipulation made was that Colonel Ingraham would not depict Cody "with an ax in one hand and a war club in the other, knocking out the brains of all the people I meet." Colonel Ingraham is credited with having written about six hundred novels, all told. On one occasion he turned out a "half-dime" on a hurry order, thirty-five thousand words, in twenty-four hours. Ann S. Stephens, a regular contributor to Peterson's, Godey's, and other of the old-time monthlies, herself an editor, the founder of the first literary salon in New York, and the centre of the literary coterie of the times, was the author of the very first legitimate dime novel. Metta Victoria Victor, one of the early literary lights of the Pacific coast, and well remembered by readers of the Golden Era, was another favorite contributor. Though the name, "dime novel," has fallen into disfavor now, the article itself flourishes. The quality has deteriorated, if anything, but the price has risen. What once would have come out in paper covers at a nominal price, and passed into the hands of readers without any count being kept of the number of editions, not to mention the personalia concerning the author, now makes its bow in cloth, gilt top, illustrations, and a great flourish of trumpets and beating of drums. People who elevate their noses at the mere mention of a dime novel will haunt the book shelves and have their names on the waiting lists at the public libraries for best-sellers which, if disposed of at their literary value, would be dear at three for a nickel, instead of bringing the dollar and a half at which they are listed.

A striking feature of Sunset for October is a three-page color insert. It is from a drawing by Edward Cucuel, and represents a scene on the veranda of the hotel at Paso Robles Hot Springs during the army manoeuvres at Camp Atascadero, California. Among the well-known men represented are Major-General MacArthur, Governor George C. Pardee of California, General T. H. Goodman, Colonel S. P. Jocelyn, Colonel W. S. Patten, Major W. P. Duvall and Major C. E. Gillette. It is a notable and attractive magazine.

—The Bookworm.

Husband—May I inquire, madame, to what purpose you intend to put that very décolleté gown?

Wife—Yes, my dear; to exhibition purposes.

To a great majority of people coffee is wholesome, exhilarating without reaction, invigorating and delightful. Indeed, it is almost indispensable at the breakfast table. No cereal coffee can take the place of the real thing. Those who have tried some brands of coffee and found them injurious should not make up their minds that all coffees are bad for them. It would be well for them to make a trial of a standard brand, such as Armer's "Very Best" coffee, which is grown by the Armer Brothers on their own plantations and prepared under their supervision.

Other People's Ideas

From "Gargantua and Pantagruel," by Rabelais:

Rondabilis: For, as that looking-glass is not the best which is most decked with gold and precious stones, but that which representeth to the eye the liveliest shapes of objects set before it; even so that wife should not be most esteemed who richest is, of the noblest race, but she who, fearing God, conforms herself nearest unto the humour of her husband.

Carpalim: The humour, inclination, and nature of women is like the thunder, whose force in its bolt, or otherways, burneth, bruiseeth and breaketh, only hard, massive, and resisting objects, without staying or stopping at soft, empty, and yielding matters; for it dasheth into pieces the steel sword, without doing any hurt to the velvet scabbard which insheatheth it; it rusheth also and consumeth the bones, without wounding or endangering the flesh wherewith they are veiled and covered; just so it is, that women, for the greater part, never bend the contention, subtilty, and contradictory disposition of their spirits, unless it be to do what is prohibited and forbidden.

Hippothadus: Verily, some of our doctors aver for a truth, that the first woman of the world, whom the Hebrews call Eve, had hardly been induced or allured into the temptation of eating of the fruit of the Tree of Life if it had not been forbidden her so to do. And, that you may give the more credit to the validity of this opinion, consider how the cautious and wily tempter did commemorate unto her, for an antecedent to his Enthymeme, the prohibition which was made to taste it, as being desirous to infer from thence, It is forbidden thee; therefore thou shouldst eat of it, else thou canst not be a woman.

Pantagruel: Diogenes, being asked at what times a man ought to eat, answered, "The rich when he is hungry, the poor when he has anything to eat."

From "No Other Way," by Walter Besant:

In society, as in business, there is no friendship, and there is no compassion. One must pay or go out; the door is always open to those who go out; but to appeals for help, and for pity, and for friendliness, the door is always shut; no voices of lamentation or of distress reach the Assembly or the Card Room, the Masquerade or the Rout.

Is it, then, the way of wrong-doing that nothing can repay, nothing can atone? If so, then Heaven help us all, for even if the injury be forgiven, how shall we forgive ourselves?

It is the most remarkable fact about scandal that, although it is believed to strip a woman of her reputation, and to leave her, as the saying is, without a rag, it really does no harm at all.

The most dangerous pursuit for two young persons—being man and maid—is the practice together of music, whether of singing or of playing, or both.

If you think of it, the exaggeration of our own importance may become a wholesome incentive to virtue. In fact, with many of us it is the chief incentive. We are so important that we must not be sinners.

Drubarde in "Wyllard's Weird," by Miss Braddon: "I know some people who think nothing of lending a book; they can hand over a cherished volume to a friend—to an indifferent acquaintance, even—without a pang; they can see him turn the leaves and violate the stiffness of the back. I, monsieur, would almost as soon lend my arm and hand as one of these books."

Books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them.—Milton.

Let us thank God for books. When I consider what some books have done for the world, and what they are doing, how they keep up our hope, awaken new courage and faith, soothe pain, give an ideal life to those whose homes are hard and cold; bind together distant ages and foreign lands, create new worlds of beauty, bring down truths from heaven—I give eternal blessings for this gift—James Freeman Clarke.

The Light for the Home

CONSUMES 92 PARTS AIR AND 8 PARTS GAS

Ever since the introduction of the Bunson burner in a gas burner and the addition of a Welsbach mantle the scientific men of the world have been trying to get a more intense light, and greater candle power. In Germany they have perfected a chimney which is made with air holes so the air can be fed to the mantle. They have succeeded in obtaining a light of great candle power.

THE NEW CAMEL HOUSE LIGHT

is made perfect in the burner, with a large mixing chamber so the gas and the air can be mixed as it goes through the bunson of the lamp, then with the air hold chimney feeding the air to the mantle we get a powerful light of 500 candle power with a very low consumption of gas. An ordinary Welsbach mantle gives 80 C. P. while a New Camel Light gives 500 C.P. with the same consumption of gas. The burner being made from two parts of brass, it is impossible for the gas to clog the burner.

That Eloquent Yelp

That was an horrendous yelp emitted by James D. Phelan and Assessor Dodge last week when they learned that they were to be summoned before the Grand Jury to explain certain obvious irregularities. It was rather an undignified performance, highly suggestive of one of the characteristics of a certain animal that anticipates pain as soon as the lash is raised. If the irregularities were susceptible of explanation consistent with fair dealing, there was not the slightest occasion for alarm. The note of agony was consequently unfortunate. It aroused the suspicions of people who had previously esteemed the gentlemen as honest citizens, and their suspicions were not allayed by the attack on the juror who was the head and front of the impending investigation. It has recently been argued and quite logically that dishonest men cannot vindicate their acts by aspersing others. The irregularities which were made the subject of investigation were quite clearly established, we should judge, from the facts published, and which are said to be of record. It appears to be acknowledged that several pieces of Mr. Phelan's property were greatly undervalued by the Assessor, and that reductions made in his favor were far greater than were vouchsafed other tax-payers. The Assessor says that he made a reduction of twenty per cent on improvements all over town, and raised the assessment on land. But it appears that the reduction on some of Mr. Phelan's property was over forty per cent. This generosity toward Mr. Phelan, however, may not have been dictated by corrupt motives. The Assessor is a very busy man, and it is possible that he did not know that Mr. Phelan had been favored. Such things happen in the best regulated public offices and it is unfair to assume that as Dodge and Phelan are political cronies the irregularities were the result of connivance. Indeed if it had not been for the premature yelp horrendous, eloquent of fear, we should be inclined to give both gentlemen the benefit of the doubt. And if it had not been disclosed that Dr. Dodge delegated a mysterious committee of bankers to assess the property of taxpayers, we should have been constrained to overlook the irregularities, and wonder what it was that he had to conceal.

The modish woman's stationery is as much a part of her nowadays as her dainty wardrobe. Cooper & Co., 746 Market Street, are showing the newest modes in paper and envelopes, dies and seals.

What the Scoffers Say

Though Mr. Phelan enjoys the confidence and esteem of many of our foremost citizens, whose judgment of men should be respected, there are some skeptics who stubbornly decline to acclaim him for his public spirited activity. They refused to be impressed even by the enthusiastic lyricists of the dailies who sing of his integrity, purity and devout and holy consecration to the public service. They stoutly maintain that the contemporaneous estimate of Mr. Phelan is higher than the grade to which he will be assigned in history. His defects in their judgment are those of temperament. They think that his horizon is narrow, the scope and range of his faculties limited and his vanity immeasurable. They even think that he is not troubled with emotions or sensibilities, and that he is so phlegmatic that he has not been incited by the incense and adulation of Mammon worshipers to vindicate the eulogies of his boomers. They point out for instance that despite his manifest enthusiasm on the subject of beautifying the city, he has done nothing toward improving the sky-line. He owns buildings all over the city that are an eye-sore to the districts in which they are located. And some of them, notably the Bay City Market, are located in the city's principal thoroughfare. The Mutual Savings Bank structure is the only building enterprise with which he has been connected, and in that case only remotely. When it is suggested that he has erected fountains, the reply is that Dr. Cogswell did the same, but the doctor's ugly effigies were regarded as expressions of his self-esteem. Phelan differs from Cogswell, say the unreasonable skeptics, only in that he is content to have his name perpetuated by an inscription in granite. The scoffers even go so far as to appraise the public spirited character of Adolph Sutro above that of Mr. Phelan. Yet they admit that Sutro's donations always had a string tied to them, or were in furtherance of some private interest, as when he gave the land for the Affiliated Colleges to boom his contiguous real estate. The scoffers even look with suspicion on Mr. Phelan's connection with the Association for the Adornment of San Francisco, but their suspicions are unfounded. Mr. Phelan is a man of artistic temperament, and he really takes great pride in the city of his birth, and is intent upon making it one of the most beautiful cities in the world. Our attention has been called to the fact that though he has deprecated the maintenance of ugly sign-boards and fences along the public thoroughfares, he permits the maintenance of a particularly high fence on his own lot at Jones and Eddy streets. But it should be remembered that he is a very busy man, and that he has no time to keep in touch with the details of his numerous enterprises. No doubt if his attention is called to that fence he will have it removed. And as for the maintenance of rattle-traps on public thoroughfares, we presume he is deterred from making improvements by some very cogent business reasons. However, he is President of the Mutual Savings Bank and was probably largely responsible for the enterprise which found expression in the handsome Market street structure.

Session with the Knockers

But there are other matters that receive the attention of the scoffers, and we note them merely to enable our readers to keep in touch with current opinion, and in the hope that our foremost public spirited citizen may receive important inspiration. Mr. Phelan's activity as a savior of the city's credit is one of the matters that is the subject of widespread discussion. It has been suggested that he was the first to agitate the bond issue proposition, and as he is worth about ten million dollars, he should have purchased some of the bonds out of his own capital. They do not think he is entitled to any great credit for the action of the Mutual Savings Bank in appropriating money for some of the bonds, and they point out that the money to be so used is the money of the depositors. The total subscribed capital stock of that bank is only three hundred thousand dollars, and the money of depositors aggregates nine millions. They argue furthermore that instead of purchasing bonds to enable the city to buy lands, our public spirited citizens should do something toward securing a County Hospital and much-needed sewers. They feel that the land deals now in process of development are largely in the interest of certain rich men. They have ascertained that two-thirds of the block of land to be purchased for a library site is owned by one man who was formerly a director of the Mutual Savings Bank, and they say that the estimated value, six hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars, is nearly two hundred thousand in excess of its real value. It is certain that real estate operators are very much in favor of the land deals which are bound to have a good effect on the market, and consequently the knockers refuse to admit that there is any public spirit behind the movement. The Mission Park proposition has naturally received the ardent support of Mr. Phelan, and it is said that a certain bank stands ready to handle the bonds on a commission for the benefit of those who are anxious to sell the property to the city. But meanwhile the County Hospital and the sewers are falling into decay, and our public spirited citizens are overlooking necessities in order to secure luxuries. Their excuse is that they are afraid to trust the present Administration in the disbursement of large sums of money on contracts, in view of the suspicions that now attach to all contract work. Their fears are no doubt justified but it will be well to keep an eye open for "bugs" even in the real estate deals that are soon to be manipulated. And whatever may be thought of Mr. Phelan's activity, the fact remains that our enterprising business men never saw the advantages to accrue from the enterprises which he is now urging until he directed their attention.

The City's Damaged Reputation

The subject of the bond issue should not be dismissed without reference to the statement of one of our contemporaries, to the effect that Eastern capitalists were reluctant to invest in our bonds because of the evil reputation of San Francisco, resulting from our repudiation of our obligations. The statement is wholly unwarranted. The bonded indebtedness of this city was never repudiated. Our City Hall, Park and School bonds were always honored. Our contemporary evidently confounded city bonds with those private bonds issued for the widening of Dupont street and Montgomery avenue. The city was not liable for the bonded indebtedness created for those distinctly sectional enterprises. The cost was assessed against the property owners, and some of them repudiated the obligation. Conspicuous among the property owners who did not contest the obligation was the late James Phelan, father of James D. Phelan. If San Francisco has a bad reputation among Eastern capitalists it is because of the action of those wealthy citizens who repudiated their obligations, and put the Dupont street bond holders to the expense of carrying on litigation through the State and Federal courts.

Expose of The Stuffers

At the suggestion of Town Talk made several weeks ago the Merchants' Association turned its search light on the register of voters, and soon verified the suspicions expressed by this journal. We pointed out that there had been an unprecedented increase in the registration of certain districts and told why it was reasonable to suspect that there had been wholesale stuffing. Upon investigation it has been learned that there has been a great deal of fraudulent registration, and the importance of purging the register is apparent to all. But we may scarcely hope that the fraudulent names will be stricken off. The election machinery is in the hands of those who are interested in protecting the stuffers. However now that the crooked work has been exposed, steps should be taken in the courts to make it extremely hazardous for any stuffer to present himself at the polls on election day. It should now be very easy to scare off the whole gang. It has recently been made apparent that public sentiment against election frauds is strong, and that considerable risk is incurred in tampering with the sacred franchise.

Pinero's Dancing Doll

The optimism of those who are confident that the stage is gradually contributing to the advancement of morality and the reformation of society, must be rudely shaken when they read of the latest work of Arthur Wing Pinero, the foremost English dramatist, and its success in London. If Pinero's "Iris" and "The Gay Lord Quex" were considered appeals to carnal appetite, there should be no doubt that in his latest play he has sought to be humorous by being lewd, a practice that has frequently been indulged by authors who lacked the genius to delight a refined imagination. In most of his plays Pinero sought to grasp public attention by daring handling of social problems, but he has always been deft in the exploitation of unveiled immorality. In his latest play, "A Wife Without a Smile," he has succeeded in becoming shockingly vulgar. A dancing doll is one of the features of this play. It is attached to a string that runs through the ceiling, and is tied to the bottom of a sofa in a room above occupied by a newly married couple. The man in the apartment in which the doll is suspended explains to his wife that, were the people above to do no more than shake hands on the sofa, that act would be registered by a series of shivers. The purpose of the doll is to prove that the newly married couple spend a great deal of time spooning, and this bridal barometer performs some astonishing gyrations. Pinero

The Tardy Baltic Fleet

The despatch of the Baltic fleet of twenty-four vessels to the Far East is indicative of the desperate straits into which Russia has fallen. It is decidedly late to attempt the reinforcement of the remnants of the fleets that were in the Russian harbors at Port Arthur and Vladivostok at the opening of hostilities. It is certain that Admiral Togo will spare no effort to intercept the Baltic fleet and minimize its fighting capacity. He can scarcely hope to annihilate it on the open sea, but he will endeavor to reduce the hostile force before it effects a union with the vessels at Vladivostok or Port Arthur. It will take about two months for the Russian fleet to reach Far Eastern waters, and then we may expect one of the greatest naval battles of modern times. When it is over, the probability is that both Russia and Japan will have ceased to exist as great naval powers. The expense of the war so far has been so great that both nations have been seriously crippled financially, but the expense to Russia has been far greater than to Japan. Russia's weekly expenditure is five and a half million dollars.

Teachers' Institutes

The question of the advantages of Teachers' Institutes is agitating the minds of professional educators at the present moment, and one and all find something to say on the great good which is accomplished. That is from their viewpoint. Naturally the teachers are not invited to participate in the discussion, and even if they were to express an adverse opinion it would require a rare degree of courage, for it is necessary to keep on the right side of the powers above. County institutes might be made a source of both pleasure and profit if the teachers who attend under compulsion were permitted to discuss the difficulties which they must meet and overcome in some practical manner. They might also return to their classes refreshed and inspired, could any portion of the week be devoted to social intercourse in which they would have time and opportunity to identify each other even by name. The county institute as it is now organized closes the schools for a week out of a term already too short. The teachers are put under the expense of traveling, often long distances over rough stage roads, and of paying their board for a week in a crowded hotel. The sessions are called to order at nine in the morning and again early in the afternoon, at one or half-past one, and there is a lecture in the evening, which occupies the hours between dinner and bedtime. Professional educators take all the space on the program, and they are invariably enamored of the sound of their own voices. Some grammar school principal from San Francisco, who has made a specialty of mental work in fractions or rapid addition, will organize a class out of the teachers present and proceed to "put them through," and then make invidious comparisons between them and "my scholars." Some kindergarten faddist will be engaged to talk at the teachers in a county where there is not a solitary specimen of kindergarten, and like the predecessor, in the mathematical line, lay it up against them that they are not playing games or threading straws. A university professor will next complain that the elements of Latin are not taught betimes, and then some supervisor of drawing or an inspector of physical culture will have an inning. Meanwhile, the victims of all this balderdash are trying to study out some plan by which one teacher with a class of sixty-odd assorted sizes, sexes and degrees of advancement, can give each a modicum of individual attention, and how children whose parents speak no English at all, and who are practically cut off from hearing it during the long vacation, can be kept from slipping back, like the frog in the well, almost as far in the four months when there is no school as they are advanced during the eight months when they attend more or less irregularly. It is easy for a professor of penmanship to demonstrate curves and discourse on elements and principles, and leave specimens of his own beautiful chirography, but it is up to the country school-marm to guide fists that are more often closed about the handles of a plow or grasping a heavy grubbing hoe, or engaged in milking half a dozen cows night and morning and churning and working butter, or rubbing and wringing a heavy wash. The men who are engaged to address the teachers simply do not know what they are talking about. Their experience, when it has been practical at all, has been confined to the upper grammar grade of city schools, normal schools and colleges; pupils, by the time they reach their hands, are already manufactured articles, not raw products, and they have at hand not only all the latest fads for relieving themselves of unnecessary exertion, but some subordinate on whom to shift the responsibility of failures and shortcomings. Put them down in an isolated district where they would have no one to rely on but themselves, a library consisting of Bancroft's Native Races and the Rollo Books, and a set of trustees predisposed to fault finding and dissatisfaction because the munificent salary of fifty or sixty dollars a month is all "going out of the district," and their ideas of what would constitute a live topic for discussion would be seriously modified. Some of these gentlemen think a summer school would be a desirable substitute for the present institute. If the teachers might speak without incurring the risk of decapitation they would vote for an open meeting in which none but those conversant with conditions would be permitted to kill time, and have a chance to talk things over, compare notes and methods with each other informally, and consult the superintendent on difficult points. The teachers' institute as it is now conducted does not give the teachers even as much of a chance as the ordinary citizen gets at a political meeting. It is absolutely useless except to a chosen few, and an unwarranted expense both to the public treasury and the private purse.

Popular Patriotism

BY THEODORE BONNET.

A few years ago one of the professors of the University of Chicago precipitated a storm of harsh criticism by giving utterance to the heterodoxical sentiment that egotism was the basis of patriotism. The assertion struck me as ridiculous at the time, but upon recent reflection, prompted by contemplation of some of the most conspicuous and ardent patriots in this community, I have been drifting to the conclusion that the philosophy of the Chicago academician is not so fatuous as it appeared at first blush. But I think that the process by which he reached his conclusion bears no relation to that which I have employed.

In his opinion love of country is nothing more than love of self on an expanded scale. Though patriotism is generally understood to be love of country and the spirit originating in that affection which prompts men to the support and defense of their country's institutions, yet all men who are zealous in the safeguarding of those institutions, and who have therefore the right to pose as patriots, are not inspired by love of country. The patriotism of some men proceeds from a different species of egotism than that referred to by the learned Chicagoan. It is the self-esteem which glories in personal achievements rather than in those of the country. Theirs is the patriotism fanned by the hope of compassing ambition. In its wider sense the sentiment is applicable to State and municipality, for no man is a good citizen of the United States who is not a good citizen of the city of his nativity or adoption, and the good citizen of a city is an exponent of civic patriotism.

It is not to the good citizen's discredit that his self-esteem is more intense than his love of country. Such a man being sensible of his obligations to his country, may be prepared to fulfill them even to the sacrificing of his life's blood. And what more could be demanded of him? We cannot all be Arnold Winkelrieds out of pure nobility of sentiment. After all, the highest test of patriotism is willingness to die for our native land, and it is believed that men have done that ostentatiously for no nobler purpose than to win imperishable fame. The egotistical civic patriot who prefers to live for his country and enjoy the emoluments and glory of high office is capable of such heroism.

Patriotism is a word of lofty meaning. It has a thrill in it. It is a benighted land that has not caught its true import. The land illuminated by it is safeguarded from decay. But patriotism is not expressed in the cannon's boom, nor yet in the spectacular, vociferous protest of ambitious office-seekers against the corroding influences of the corrupt. There are silent patriots who seek unfalteringly to guard the interests of their country in time of peace, and who have not the incentive that comes to the soldier in time of war, when the blood is hot, the band is playing and the battle-flags are unfurled; who devote themselves to the propagation of doctrines that make for a purer atmosphere in and out of the field of politics, and that have for their ultimate object the stimulation of public conscience, to the end that the nation itself shall be perpetuated. They are idealists who glorify that patriotism which is an expression of the moral idea, which has for its inspiration the immutable principles of the moral law, a sentiment rooted in the depths of a sympathetic heart. It would be much better for the country if that patriotism which stands for the loftiest concept of human virtue and human endeavor were widespread, instead of being confined to the thin ranks of the idealists.

The patriotism of the idealists is a great virtue that is intolerant of a distortion of the moral principle, but it does not always animate those civic patriots of a great city, those eminent citizens who are ever zealous in their efforts to reform the machinery of government, but who are often indirectly responsible for the demoralization that prevails. Among those civic patriots are to be found men conspicuous in the commercial life of the city, and in the conduct of their business affairs they have not upheld the standards of integrity which they are so eager to apply in the political sphere. They are persons of arrested moral development with a misconception of the higher functions of business life, whose code of ethics justifies sham, pretense and disregard of the most sacred ideals. In politics they are stern advocates of the idealities, and by attacking corruption they seek to exalt, inferentially, their own virtues. They are sincere in their hatred of political grafters and of all men engaged in subverting the machinery of government, but unfortunately they never reflect that the most effective method of discouraging the abuses of which they so bitterly complain is to contribute to the creation of a wholesome public sentiment, and to promote an appreciation of the ideals in all the fields of human endeavor.

There are few of us who live up to our ideals, for it is hard to keep our compact with our good angel, but the man who has ideals, even though he is destined to sit among the ruins of the eidolon of himself, is more likely to be of benefit to the community in which he lives than the one whose sole inspiration is material success. If our civic patriots showed more concern for the idealities which are the inspiration of that nobler patriotism to which they are strangers, than they do for their own glorification, there would be fewer election frauds and less grafting to excite their virtuous indignation. The grafter and the ballot box stuffer are odious wretches who seldom have an adequate conception of the enormity of their crimes. They are victims of arrested moral development just as are the mercantile patriots who consider that it is not so heinous an offense to defraud the Government as to rob an individual, and who therefore scruple not at sequestering personal property sought by the tax collector, or smuggling goods through the Customs House. When the essential connection between patriotism and the moral law becomes universally appreciated, the political atmosphere will be clarified, and the passionate reformer will be found mourning the improvement of things in general which has put an end to his theatric activity.

Investigate the Missions

BY EDWIN H. CLOUGH.

There was a certain rich man, which had a steward; and the same was accused unto him that he had wasted his goods. And he called him, and said unto him, "How is it that I hear this of thee? Give an account of thy stewardship, for thou mayest be no longer steward."—Luke, xvi: 1-2.

Christianity was introduced in China about six hundred years ago. The new religion was preached at Peking by Friar Odoric of Pordenone as early as 1325, and he was followed by Friar John of Pian di Carpine and Friar William of Rubruk. Thenceforward the progress of Christianity in China was rapid and the conversions to that faith permanent. The Chinese took it for granted that all religions were good and that the profession of any faith was a virtual guarantee of an honest intention on the part of those who propagated the doctrine.

As late as 1846, when the Lazarist Fathers Abbe Huc and Abbe Capet preached the gospel to the pagans of Central Asia, there was no thought in the Chinese mind of persecuting the converts to Christianity or denying Christian teachers the right to preach their gospel; on the contrary, thousands who could not find comfort in the hopeless dogma of Buddhism or the cold philosophy of Confucius, gladly turned to the priests of the Christian religion for better assurance of divine truth than they had been able to find elsewhere. During the Ming dynasty the Christian cult was very strong at court and today there are descendants of that royal house who are devout Catholics.

When the Jesuits came they found that the great obstacle to their teachings was the hereditary custom of so-called ancestor worship. A brief survey and analysis convinced these astute logicians that while the spirit of this custom might savor of idolatry its basic principle was nothing more than filial reverence and they decided to treat the question as one involving nothing more than a civic rite. They accommodated themselves to the conditions as they found them, trusting to the truth and force of their teachings to differentiate in the minds of the people the sacred character of worship.

When the American missionary arrived on the scene he immediately attacked the custom of ancestor worship. He even went so far, in many instances, as to tell the Chinese that without doubt many of their ancestors were demons in hell. It was a sacrilege that they could not forgive, and it was this insolent objection to one of the most ancient rites of the Chinese race that has embittered the Chinese against all foreigners, irrespective of their purpose within the boundaries of the Middle Kingdom.

The ancient propaganda of the Christian Church in China was not maintained through the consul and sustained by constant threat of the gunboat. This method of preaching the "gospel of peace and good-will to men" is an innovation introduced by the American and English missionaries during the past fifty years. The necessity of the consul and the gunboat in the missionary scheme as promulgated by the "evangelical" cult of Christianity was induced by the effort to serve Mammon while pretending to serve God. It is a common defense of the modern missionary in China to declare that he is "the pioneer of trade"; and it is a fact that he is protected by the consul primarily because such protection is an excuse for foreign aggrandizement in Asia.

The missionaries of the older Christianity were sincere in their purpose; they were single hearted; it was their life work; they asked no aid from boards of foreign missions at home. The same conditions prevail among these missionaries today and the Chinese are wise enough to discriminate between the true and the false. It is only when the grafting missionaries have driven the common people to rage by their mercenary practices that the mob, rising in its wrath, makes a general slaughter of the "foreign devil" without inquiry as to his special faith. All the massacres of foreigners in China have been incited by the acts of missionaries whose greed and rapacity have induced them to interfere with the domestic affairs of the Chinese; or, as in the uprising in Shantung, by armed aggression of a foreign power intent upon wholesale robbery.

The founding asylums of China were instituted by the Catholic Christians to obviate the horrible crime of infanticide. As all the world believes, the murder of female infants is a Chinese custom closely allied with the rite of ancestor worship. Only the wife who bears man children is respected in China. It is the man child that sets up the tablet of his father in the village temple, and the citizen whose wife brings to him only girls is wretched in the thought that his ghost will wander through the land of shades unhonored and disconsolate. It is one of the bitterest curses in China to wish that your enemy's children may all be girls. The missionaries have persistently published abroad that infanticide in China was the result of a deliberate desire on the part of the Chinese to revenge themselves on the innocent for the perverse act of nature. They have told us that infanticide in China was a religious obligation, whereas it is nothing of the sort. No family able to support itself ever destroys its girl infants. Only the extremely poor throw their infants into the "baby towers" or expose them to the deadly rigor of the elements. It was the Jesuit missionaries who first learned the truth of this condition and it was the Jesuit who offered the mothers of China a refuge for their girl babies. All the great foundling shelters in China today are under Catholic direction.

The same general objection may be urged against the missionaries of the Roman Catholic faith that has been brought against the Protestants; namely, that they would accomplish more good among their own people by the same means adopted to ameliorate the physical and spiritual welfare of the heathen; but it must be remembered that the Catholic missionaries came into the field in an age when the injunction to preach the gospel in all lands and among all peoples was regarded as a literally imperative command. In that time there was no question of the divine inspiration that is formulated in a "call" to preach the gospel to the heathen. Once established under this condition, it is proper enough that it should continue, especially as there is no hint of ulterior motive in the acts of the apostles.

Furthermore, aside from all contention concerning the advisability of succoring the foreign heathen while our own heathen are so sorely in need of assistance, the object of this series of papers has been, primarily, to call the attention of the American boards of foreign missions to the abuses that are being practiced in their names by missionaries whose sole purpose is self-aggrandizement and mercenary emolument. If it is the intention of these boards to continue their work in China they should reorganize and remodel their system. They should appoint only men of unquestioned integrity to the various missions, and when it is demonstrated that these men are unworthy they should at once be removed. All others who may assume to direct independent missions should be repudiated. At the present time a searching investigation of the conditions prevailing in the mission field of China is imperative. The American missionaries are especially obnoxious, not only to the Chinese but to the foreigners resident in China as well.

The Dreamer

BY HARRY COWELL.

Or ever we are born, and what we shall see, and how we shall see it, and what we shall hear, and how hear it, is decreed. It is written in the book that one man shall be as Charles Lamb, who, though not "by nature destitute of those exterior twin appendages, hanging ornaments, and (architecturally speaking) handsome volutes to the human capital," had as he quaintly confesses, no ear—"for music"; and another, though not "by nature destitute of those"—(alas, I am no Elia)—shall have no eye—for beauty. Two men are walking together the same way, and this one is passing through a wilderness where no water is, nor any green thing that maketh glad the heart; no blessed song of bird, nor happy fragrance of flower, and that other beside him, through a paradise of sights and sounds and smells. Now, some are foreordained by Fate for dreamers; and these continually hold converse with the hidden gods, going through life strangely preoccupied, seeing things invisible to other men, hearing things inaudible. For them secret flowers bloom—flowers of unearthly hues and fantastic forms, with peculiar odors coming faint and as it were from afar. And pearls of price await their diving in the depths of mysterious waters. They are awake to all the wonder of the world. Indeed, only to the sleepy ones are they asleep. And not infrequently that which they do is done for all time, to the delight of generation after generation; for they make deathless songs of the inaudible things heard and immortal pictures of the invisible things seen. Have you never seemed to inhale as it were an exquisite perfume arising from the pages of some favorite author? Well, that is the gift of those secret flowers that bloom for the dreamer, and for him alone.

Practical men speak ill of the dreamer, to them he is but an idle fellow wasting the precious daylight hours of labor, and yet often is his work an object of worship when theirs has long been dust. How frequently, time bringing about its tardy vindication, has the historian to say of this one and of that: "He was a dreamer and knew the scorn of the doers around him and now what he did gives pleasurable pause to the breathless men of business." Even in the world of matter-of-factness, what a man dreams passionately and tells beautifully, tends to come true. Our common necessities were once wild dreams.

Those even who dream their lives away, and, lacking the power of expression, leave after them no objective result of their dreaming to gladden therewith the heavy hearts of the work-a-day world; if they be in truth foreordained by Fate to hold intimate communion with the gods, their fellows; to hear and understand the various voices of the great silences; to see and appreciate Beauty's very self behind her many masks, and know the meaning of beatitude; especially if they put not the burden of their daily bread upon the already bent backs of the doers: can have me for advocate, an' they will, when they are haled before the common court as vagabonds, or before the lunacy commission as persons of unsound mind. For I come upon them in out-of-the-way places, and they smile upon me understandingly with great, meaningful dumb mouths fast-closed on strange knowledge, and look at me and beyond me with eyes that have seen things; and I ask no more of them: I am satisfied. I have no mind to go up to them and, officiously shaking them by the shoulders, demand that they instantly to work, or else, the place of punishment. Great already is the multitude of toilers and spinners and grievous to behold; and more often than wisecracks wot, when the night cometh wherein no other man labors, may he, the vagabond dreamer, be found winning unquestionable right to a place at the table. For those who neither work nor dream, the treadmill, if you are minded to sit in judgment; but when it comes to the dreamer by divine right, the busybodies who are so anxious to set him to work might have learned toleration of the fanatics of the French Revolution who would fain have made cooks of their kings, and of their queens, scullery-maids. Under certain circumstances, of course, it is all very well to preach the gospel of work—especially when you want to make an easy living; but O, you busy-blind, let dreamers be. Mayhap, they are the dethroned Greek gods musing upon the glory that was. In such case it were fitting to build for each a sheltering shrine, could we but build them beautiful enough—build for each a shrine and bring offerings.

To him who is sorely sweating, the sight of the dreamer's inimitable, unapologized-for leisure is no doubt highly exasperating; moreover, to dream at all is to offer undeniable insult to the actual world, and this, the practical man, apologist for things as they are, resents. If it's a good enough world for him, why not for this fellow, he'd like to know. Poor P. M. cannot see beyond his own nose, and this seeing back of the beyond is, to use his own words, "all stuff and nonsense, to be flogged out of a man with a cat-and-nine-tails, no less." To dream is to decry the thing in hand; it is an evidence of discontent with matters of fact, of maladaptability to environment; an assumption of superiority. The behavior of the dreamer in Heaven will be that of one to the manner born. He will show none of the delighted surprise of the nouveau riche drudge. And until this sorry scheme of things, scorned of the Persian poet, be remolded nearer to the heart's desire, the alternatives for the fine man will be either to dream or to die.

From all manner of indignities and ills insufferable may we escape through the door of dreams. We open it beggars and close it on hovel and rags; and forthwith come to ourselves, kings with palace and purple, as is meet. Do not kings make themselves dream? and do not we who dream better than they condescend to them? Make-believe is the most princely of pastimes; and a man is known no less by his play than by his work. Men's make-believes are sure indexes of their souls.

The night for unbroken sleep; the day for dreaming—drowsy noon and the two half-lights, the latter for choice. Let who will take what dreams chance sends,—part creations of cheap pastry-cooks, and the like; I prefer those of my own making. What can you expect of dreams dashed off in a second? No great artistry, I take it. It was De Quincy, the day dreamer, and not De Quincy, the night dreamer, who wrote the famous passages in "The Confessions of an Opium Eater." He who dreams by day has no little scorn for him who merely dreams by night; when, of a morning, the latter tells all the "wonderful things" that happened to him at the hands of Death's half-sister, the former smiles at him like adult at infant and wonders at his wonder. Who would let his coffee cool to listen to such petty marvels? But I would go without breakfast at all—nay, I have gone—to hear the true dreamer tell what things he heard and saw and did in the land of his heart's desire. What the demon said to the dreamer, Socrates, that would be worth cold coffee even unto the time when time ceases, when fasts are no more broken and days and nights are alike dreamless.

Of all mankind the dreamer alone is not at the mercy of circumstance, of that which happens. In his world things fall out even as he wills. He is lord of an immeasurable universe. No dethroned god is he, Greek or Roman, but one still living in the clouds where towers high Olympus. If, on occasion, he condescends to your levels, flatter not yourselves, my practical friends, that you are his peers. Put him to ploughing, indeed! Is it not enough for you that he who has broken ambrosia deigns to eat of your bitter bread; that he who knows the brew of Bacchus' self is not above sipping of your sorry vintage? When the sense of your inferiority pinches you sore, you affect to despise him. Did you but show originality in your lying and you had my attention—at least for the time being; but this making of a cockshot of the higher Head is as old as Envy. To say so much as Bah! to your diatribe against the dreamer would be a waste of breath. What am I saying? My poor P. M., I pity you. You, too, dream—only in secret, and not so well. No? Then I pity you still more.

The Saunterer

Friction on the Bench

Those grave and reverend jurists of that high and mighty tribunal, the Supreme Court of the State of California, are once more at loggerheads. It is not unusual for judges to disagree, but it is only at rare intervals that the friction engendered by temperamental dissonance finds expression in the decisions of the court. Judges are constrained to safeguard the dignity of the bench, and they are therefore reluctant to air their internal dissensions. Justices Beatty and Garoutte were not on speaking terms for months, but the fact did not become generally known until shortly before Garoutte was retired. When Angelotti was elected it was thought that thereafter the luminaries of the State's highest tribunal would be as harmonious in their relationship as those of the celestial system, but they are not. Before Angelotti had time to warm the leather of his new chair he began to make trouble. He took a deep interest in the case of that pestiferous lawyer, Horace Philbrook, who had been disbarred from practice, and he championed his cause and insisted that the ban should be removed. Angelotti's associates, who had been pestered by Philbrook for years, and who regarded him as a malevolent and unrepentant sinner, stoutly objected to his reinstatement. But Justice Angelotti, who, it is said, took a personal interest in the matter at the solicitation of a clerical organization, agitated the matter persistently and succeeded in getting Philbrook restored. Ever since then there has been friction in the court.

A Judicial Bomb

It was not until the other day that evidence of something resembling an open rupture was presented. The bar immediately pricked up its ears and it has been on the qui vive ever since, for lawyers dearly love anything so diverting as a scrap on the bench. It was in a simple burglary case that the explosion occurred. Justice Angelotti handed down an opinion affirming the judgment of the lower court denying a motion for a new trial. The appeal was taken on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the record as presented to the Supreme Court contained none of the testimony taken at the trial. The defendant argued that the Supreme Court should presume that no evidence had been offered, it being his theory that the burden was on the Attorney-General to recite sufficient testimony to show that the verdict was warranted. Justice Angelotti held to the contrary, that the burden was on the defendant to sustain his position, and not having done so by reciting the testimony it should be presumed that he had abandoned the particular claim, that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. Justices Shaw, Van Dyke and McFarland concurred, making it the majority decision. And thereupon Chief Justice Beatty handed down a dissenting opinion in which Henshaw and Lorrigan concurred. This dissenting opinion might aptly be termed a corker. Justice Beatty not only dissented but also swatted his esteemed contemporary thigh, hip and mazzard.

Beatty's Sharp Criticism

In the opening paragraph of his sharp polemic Justice Beatty says that the case is of general importance on account of the question of practice which it involves—"a question destined apparently never to reach a definite settlement in this court." He then proceeds to argue that according to a long line of decisions it is the rule that, whenever the insufficiency of the evidence is attacked, the District Attorney should cite such evidence as he deemed necessary to show that the verdict was warranted. He pointed out that the rule had been established by recent decisions of the court, and that Angelotti had reversed those decisions, and he declared that by reason of his associate's action an injustice had been done the defendant. I believe this is the first time in the history of the court that one judge accused another of perpetrating injustice. But Justice Beatty goes further; he says that the rule of procedure laid down by Angelotti and those who concurred with him will involve great inconvenience and cause great expense to the counties of the State, for it will necessitate bulky records. During the course of his opinion he speaks of the "abandonment of a plain and simple rule, based upon a reasonable presumption, in favor of a rule so vague and uncertain, and necessarily involving the mischievous consequences which years of experience have taught us are entailed by a practice based upon the opposite presumption."

Angelotti's Supplemental Effusion

The Chief Justice's paper abounds in scintillant criticism scathingly deprecatory of the majority opinion of the young jurist from Marin county. In one paragraph he states that it should not be necessary to call attention to certain facts, nevertheless he enumerates and elucidates them as though he had taken judicial cognizance of the pitiable ignorance of his associates, and in a spirit of charity had undertaken to set them right. He regrets that Angelotti's opinion "totally ignores what is so clearly shown"; that "we have fallen back into the old rut," and will have to print numerous unnecessary pages at a dollar per page, "for no purpose except to cumber the record," and he concludes with the statement: "It may be that this defendant was shown to be guilty, and that a reversal of the judgment on this appeal would have enabled him to escape deserved punishment, but an affirmance of the judgment in this case is dearly purchased at the cost of unsettling a rule of practice which experience has demonstrated to be as useful and convenient and economical as it is simple and definite." The rich Latin blood must have coursed through the veins of Angelotti at a tremendous pace under the stimulus of this stinging rebuke, for lo and behold! he delivered himself of a retort courteous in the shape of what he was pleased to term a "supplemental opinion," something unprecedented in our Supreme Court. In this document he pleads that as the dissenting opinion had been prepared some time after the majority opinion, it would seem proper to notice briefly one or two suggestions made thereby." The logic of this statement is not obvious. If the reasoning were sound then it would seem proper that Justice Beatty should notice briefly the suggestions of the supplemental opinion, and thus an endless controversy would ensue. In his opinion supplemental Justice Angelotti undertakes to show that the Chief Justice's fears regarding bulky transcripts are groundless. Incidentally he defends his rule against the aspersions cast upon it. And the members of the bar are in high glee.

McFarland's Desertion

By the way, the lawyers were not a little surprised to find Justice McFarland's signature attached to the majority opinion. It was generally believed that the sympathies of that picturesque jurist were with the "other side," or, at least, were not with the Angelotti-Shaw-Van Dyke combination. But there have been whisperings lately of a congealed atmosphere on occasions when the eminent Chief Justice and his quaint associate meet. Naturally the whisperings have been soft and low, for the deference due the ermine of the court of last resort is considerable. It is something in the nature of lese majeste to talk about combinations and factions up there among the sanctified dignitaries of Justice's temple, who are supposed to be removed from strife and immune to petty emotions. We are expected to believe that the judicial calm of the modern Sinai is never disturbed.

Bierce Was an Afterthought

In a newspaper interview the other day, during which Gertrude Atherton discussed Californian authors, she was represented as having mentioned Ambrose Bierce and his short stories casually, "while trying to conjure up the names of Westerners who seek fame and profit with the pen." From the tone of the interview one might judge that Mrs. Atherton regarded Ambrose Bierce as some obscure writer with whose literary performances she had but slight acquaintance. But I am quite sure that she intended no such impression. I believe that she is grateful to Bierce for having given her a notable boost up the ladder of fame at a time when he was known throughout the world of letters and she was unknown even in many sections of this peninsula. Ambrose Bierce, ablest and most conscientious of critics, has a reputation for thorniness, and it is pretty generally understood that he would never condescend to log-rolling. When he says a word in commendation of book or author, the question of merit is put beyond discussion. Ambrose Bierce was the first critic of influence to discover the ability of Gertrude Atherton, and yet she is now represented as having recalled, as an afterthought, his short stories, but without wasting any adjectives on them. Well, it would be a neat bit of irony if attention were directed to Bierce through this feeble recollection. His two small volumes remain undisturbed on the shelves of the libraries year after year, though some of his tales rank with those of Poe. One series of his gruesome stories was related with such verisimilitude as to the material setting and seeming that the Society for Psychical Research wanted "further particulars." No one has a higher appreciation of the genius of Ambrose Bierce than Gertrude Atherton, and if she mentioned him but casually it was because she felt that it would be unjust to speak of him as a Californian author. Men of Bierce's towering genius are not classified geographically.

Nothing Freakish About Her

Mrs. Atherton stood the ordeal of the Sequoia Club dinner very well. She accepted the homage of the lion worshipers graciously, but disappointed a few of them who were all keyed up for a talkfest. She gave them all to understand that she would not be talked at except in ordinary conversation, for she abominates set speeches. Moreover she would not address them. Some of those who conversed with her found that she talked like a human being, but with a staccato delivery similar to that of Mrs. Fiske.

What Really Interested Them

There were some pretty costumes worn at the dinner. Mrs. Atherton, stouter than of yore, was in white with white lilies and green leaves about the corsage. Mrs. Ashton Stevens was very attractive in yellow with yellow daisies about the decolleteage. Mrs. Gerberding wore black with heavy black passementerie below her splendid throat. Mrs. Gertrude Norris wore black chiffon and Mrs. Lansing looked handsome in black and white. Miss Frances Joliffe wore a pretty white gown with point applique trimmings

She is very good looking and does her hair well, parted in the centre and drawn over her ears. The sisters Withrow were the centre of attention in queer decollete frocks and poke-bonnets. It was quite a distinguished gathering of people of brains and people who make a very good bluff.

Bruguiere and His Operas

Instead of being vexed at my gentle twitting, Mr. Emil Bruguiere should be grateful that I prodded him into action. I have never questioned his musical genius, having never listened to one of his compositions, but I grew weary of reading, year after year, that "the talented young composer" had written "a new opera" which would "soon be produced by Manager Blank, who had pronounced it the greatest ever," or words to that effect. I began to suspect that the newspapers were being imposed upon by the "talented young composer" who was always composing, but the fruits of whose industry had never been offered to the public. Mr. Bruguiere may be a second Offenbach or Puccini for all I know. I have only asked him to make good or suppress his press agent, and I am prepared to acclaim his genius as soon as it finds expression. I believe that he is about to do something, for the newspapers are being worked more systematically than ever, and the other day I received the following despatch, the sender of which I presume is Mr. Bruguiere's industrious press representative:

Editor Town Talk, San Francisco:

Shubert, owner of New York Casino, has postponed Lillian Russell in Lady Teape three months, to give time to Emile Bruguiere's new opera, The Baroness Fiddlesticks, which opens at house Monday, November twenty-first. Your comment on Mr. Bruguiere has never been kind, but it may interest you to know that he has won out here, and that the Shuberts open their new London house, the Waldorf, with Bruguiere's opera, The Three Kings of Korea.
Heber Macdonald.

Indeed, it does interest me to know that the young Californian is coming to the front. To "arrive" in both London and New York is a big achievement, and I sincerely hope that Mr. Macdonald has not wired me any hot air. If I am still skeptical it is because I recall all those years of fulsome boasting with nothing doing, during all of which Mr. Bruguiere had the money to produce his operas but lacked the courage of his muse.

The Successful Shuberts

The Shubert brothers, by the way, who are to exploit the Bruguere operas, have not had very long experience in the theatrical business in New York. Only a few years ago they were conducting a collar button emporium in a small Middle Western town. By the successful application of their commercial methods to the theatrical business they have prospered, and are now prominent representatives of the Syndicate which has become famous for its prostitution of art and desecration of the histrionic temple. Many of the most amusing stories illustrative of the illiteracy of the Syndicate have one of the Shubert brothers for the central figure. I recall one that I heard not long ago. Wilton Lackaye was asked to dine one night with a Shubert and he pleaded a prior engagement with Charles Dickens.

"Who is he?" asked Shubert. It seems to me I've heard of him lately."

"Very likely," said Lackaye. "He's a great English author; 'The Only Way' is a dramatization of one of his stories."

"Well, say, what's the matter with bringing him along. I might do business with him," said Shubert.

Murphy Wouldn't Loosen

Last week I related that at a meeting of bankers called for the purpose of raising money for the Republican campaign fund, one of the financiers announced that he would not put up until it had been ascertained whether Mr. S. G. Murphy, President of the First National Bank, would separate that institution from a little of its coin in furtherance of the Rooseveltian cause. The kicker's sentiments were warmly approved for the reason that an immense volume of Federal business is done through the First National Bank. It was agreed that Mr. Murphy should start the financial ball a-rolling. I have now to report that Mr. Murphy did not keep the gentleman long in doubt as to what he would do. When called upon he stated that the First National was not contributing money to campaign funds. His reply made it very easy for all the other bankers. They were very sorry, they would like to prove their devotion to Republican principles, but of course if Mr. Murphy, the financial representative of the Administration, did not think it worth while to loosen up, why of course they would consider it presumptuous to make a donation. So, as a consequence of Mr. Murphy's economy the Republican campaign committee lost a big contribution.

I am told, by the way, that Mr. Murphy's sympathies were with the South during our Uncivil war, and that he has never forgiven the Republican party. However, he is credited with being a very shrewd financier, and it would seem that if he were sensible of his duty to the bank he would have smothered his prejudices. But it is the spirit which he displayed when interviewed by the committee that makes him such an efficient official.

Governor Chamberlain of Oregon was the drawing card at the Democratic meeting last Monday night, and his speech was to have been the "event of the evening," but it happened that Franklin K. Lane was the chairman, and that with characteristic loyalty he gave Mr. James D. Phelan a chance to butt in. In the circumstances it is easy to guess what happened. Californian hospitality is world-famous, but San Francisco politicians play no favorites when the spot-light is on. It is a gross impropriety for the chairman of a public meeting to tire an audience out before surrendering the platform to the speaker of the evening, and when the latter is a distinguished visitor he is entitled to more courtesy than is extended to the ordinary star spellbinder. The treatment accorded Governor Chamberlain by Franklin K. Lane and James D. Phelan was shocking. Mr. Lane was trained to the minute for a talk to the end of the chapter, and he showed wonderful recuperative powers at every period. He discussed in ponderous platitudes Parker, Roosevelt, Democratic achievements and Republican follies, and it was along about nine o'clock when he wore himself out. Then came Mr. Phelan, who was so graciously received that he beamed with delight. The manifest change of sentiment was so refreshing that he consumed about an hour or so, and just as the audience was beginning to yawn Governor Chamberlain was vouchsafed the floor, grudgingly, perhaps, but nevertheless he got it. His speech was a masterly effort but owing to the lateness of the hour he prudently cut it short.

fessor Lisser gave a piano solo and Chester Bailey Fernald read an original story of the admiralty series—tried it on the dog, as it were. Mr. Wheeler's paper was his premier and it was well received. It was an allegorical skit dealing with San Francisco's political situation. At the outset he said that the keys of the city had been delivered to Abraham, but neglected to tell who was in Abraham's bosom. Charles K. Field contributed the following, addressed to "The Prodigals":

They wander through the world afar,
Neath many an alien sky,
Where unaccustomed pleasures are,
Or fancied fortunes lie;
But still they seek the friendly fires
That star Bohemia's dome,
And dearer than the world's desires
They find the welcome home.

It matters not what music weaves
Its spell in foreign air;
The voice that sings through redwood leaves
Will haunt them everywhere;
Whatever joy may sparkle up
Through stranger wassail-foam
The love-light in Bohemia's cup
At length must guide them home.

Then here's to every man away,
Who sails on other seas;
Good fortune speed the shining day
He finds the homeward breeze.
If glad or sad the heart he brings,
If rich or poor he come,
The Owl will spread his big brown wings
And give him welcome home.

Mrs. Martin in a Quandary

Society people are wondering how Mrs. Eleanor Martin will manage the ball she is to give in honor of her granddaughter, Anita Harvey, without offending any of her innumerable friends. Nothing short of the Palace would hold all the people to whom this vivacious dowager is socially indebted, but it is said that she intends to pull off the affair at her big but inadequate house in Broadway. Her calling list, even when confined to the younger set, includes four or five hundred, and not many may be overlooked without giving offense. Mrs. Martin has a puzzling and disagreeable problem to solve, for she hates to give offense. Every body is wondering where she is going to draw the line. Like Mrs. Astor, to her drawing the line is an exceedingly distasteful operation. She has spent half her life letting down the bars, and she cannot very well raise them at a ball given under her auspices.

Last Saturday's Teas

Last Saturday was a great day for teas. The Kohl tea was crowded and the two in Broadway were crushes. At both the Coffin and Moore teas the flowers sent to the debutantes were gorgeous, Miss Coffin having such an unusual number that the walls were banked. Both of these young girls are pretty. Miss Coffin is dark with a brilliant smile, fine teeth and complexion and good eyes and hair. She also has an interesting and expressive face. She is tall and resembles the women of her family, though she is darker. Miss Moore is a perfect type of pink and brown prettiness, with a most piquant, vivacious face, beautiful coloring and regular features. Both girls, with pretty clothes, a recent season of European travel, money and family connections, are sure to be successes. A very large number of pretty girls received at the Moore tea, which was emphatically a girl affair. Family friends received at the Coffin home, a number of matrons being among them. At the Kohls, Mrs. Kohl wore her magnificent diamonds and Miss Kohl a beautiful imported Pompadour gown. The hotel parlor was handsomely decorated, but somehow a hotel tea fails of the certain atmosphere which distinguishes a home.

Some Beauty Frocks

The most handsomely gowned woman at Saturday's teas was undoubtedly Mrs. "Billie" Bourn, who has just returned to town after fifteen months spent in foreign travel and at the Bourns' country house. The dress was a blue chiffon velvet or plush of the color once called "gendarme" and was simply covered with most magnificent hand-wrought embroidery. Exquisite lace ruffles fell from the very short sleeves, bringing the sleeve to the elbow. Long white gloves and a wide flat black hat completed the costume. The sole trimming of the hat was a long black feather "lobstered," which wrapped the crown about and fell over the brim at both sides. Both Mrs. and Miss Bourn are said to have brought some exquisite costumes from abroad. The Bourn dinner dance next week will be a charming affair for the younger set, as the Bourns entertain beautifully in their well-appointed Italian house, and Miss Bourn has returned with renewed interest to society, which rather bored her in her first season.

The Dutton Dinner

The very large Dutton dinner given in honor of two brides-to-be—Miss Dillon and Miss Dutton—was a very expensive and elaborate affair, with handsome decorations in the column effect which cuts off the views and conversation but makes the room charming at first glance. Some stunning frocks were worn by the women, especially by the guests of honor and the hostess, though some of the young matrons also looked exceedingly well. Mr. and Mrs. Dutton are contemplating another trip around the world. They have nothing to keep them here and Mrs. Dutton has more than a sisterly passion for her pretty young sister, Mrs. Macfarlane, whose home is in Honolulu. Miss Dillon wore white, Miss Dutton black and Mrs. Dutton pink. After dinner dancing was languidly indulged in. After all, the only people who really enjoy dancing are debutantes.

"She says her husband is hard to please."
"And yet he married her."

A Retort Without Words

Lander Stevens, actor, is at times more dramatic off the stage than on. The other night he did a piece of acting without the aid of footlights, and even without rehearsal, that was positively startling in its realism. The performance was witnessed by a few deadheads, in an Oakland cafe which the actor visited after his show in an adjoining theatre. Though they do not pose as critics they assert that if the scene that they witnessed had been enacted on the stage the gallery gods would have torn off the roof. Mr. Stevens's foil for the impromptu scene was an Oaklander named Woodward, whose make-up consisted of a dainty pointed beard, hand raised. He opened the dialogue with a query addressed to Mr. Stevens in a bantering tone. It was a grossly impertinent query, touching domestic affairs, and one that would justify the man to whom it was addressed in committing almost any breach of the peace involving bloodshed. Mr. Stevens indulged in masterly repression for a moment, and then went over to Woodward, seized him by his pointed beard with one hand, and by the tip of his nose with the other. After carefully adjusting his hold he opened the face of his waggish interrogator, and subjected the interior to the same desecration that Shylock's gabardine suffered on a notable occasion. It was a thrilling bit of business.

To some men not even the vices of their friends are sacred.

Williams Returning

Tom Williams, business manager of the Examiner, is on his way back to the city after an absence of nearly a year. Mr. Hearst has been anxious to keep Mr. Williams in the East where his services have been of greater importance than any that he could render in this city. He has been attending to the business management of all the Hearst papers in the East, but he longs to be back in San Francisco. He will be enthusiastically greeted by his many friends.

The Mayor and the Merchants

Mayor Schmitz should congratulate himself on the outcome of his correspondence with the Merchants' Association on the subject of the annual dinner at which James D. Phelan, Gavin McNab and Fairfax Wheelan were scheduled to discuss good government and primary and general elections. At this stage of his political career Mr. Schmitz finds himself in a predicament similar to that of Mr. Joseph Gans in his encounter with James Britt Esq. When it was futile for Mr. Gans to proceed further on his merits he invited a few fouls and turned defeat into victory. That is what Mr. Schmitz is trying to do, and the Merchants' Association is doing the Britt stunt. In his letter to the Merchants' Association Mr. Schmitz represented that "Open declaration is made that it is proposed in these speeches to attack the present municipal administration of San Francisco and to predicate upon them a demand for a change to better conditions"; and he requested that he be permitted to have a representative at the meeting to defend his administration against aspersion.

Obvious Misrepresentation

To that letter the Merchants' Association replied, "Your communication would seem to imply that the announcement of our annual dinner and the program of addresses scheduled for the occasion are equivalent to an open declaration of a proposed attack upon the present municipal Administration. We see no apparent grounds for this assumption," etc. This reply is in the nature of a brittism. It is unfair. I am not in sympathy with the Schmitz Administration. I am heartily in favor of a change, and therefore I regret resort to tactics that enable Mr. Schmitz to strike the pose of a martyr. His communication does not seem to imply that he assumes anything. He states in plain English that "open declaration is made that it is proposed in these speeches to attack," etc. The only thing that the letter implies is that the Mayor has been told that he is to be attacked, some one of the speakers possibly having made assertion to that effect. It remains to be seen whether he was correctly informed, and if the attack be made it will appear that the Mayor was denied a hearing for some reason. I should not care to argue that he is entitled to a hearing, but merely to submit that it is not good politics to hit below the waist.

My attention has been called to the fact that some of our young plutocrats have ceased to vie with one another in ostentatious display and now prefer a modest and unpretentious mode of living. Among them are the Laurance Scotts, who have become surprisingly quiet for fashionable folk. Their apartment consists of but six rooms and they keep only two servants. Nearly all the set that Mrs. Scott moves in lives in a similarly unpretentious manner. Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. Will Taylor and Mrs. McNear are all content with small establishments, and they are no longer ambitious of setting the pace in gorgeous apparel. Society has an economical streak on, and I am told that some of the young matrons who have their weather eye open for good things at bargain sales are always in deadly fear of being overcharged.

"I hardly think the story of my life will go down."
The speaker was Jonah, who had just been coughed up.

Central's Victim

An irate, disheveled citizen dashed into my office the other day, deposited some manuscript on my desk, muttered an imprecation, and shot out again. All signs seeming to point to an unquiet mind, his communication received "our immediate attention." It is printed herewith, in a forlorn hope that some "Central's" heart may be touched:

O blessed, blessed telephone!
'Twould send us all to hell if one
Meant always what he says.
For when we're in the greatest haste —
Without a second's time to waste —
Sweet "Central" for us lays:
"Line's busy," or, "This switch's not yours."
(Meanwhile one forth invective pours —
It makes for peace of mind!)
We truly feel like sending hence
Those pompadoured incompetents — (Another nickel find).
Ad infinitum — yet again
The same reply; the old refrain
From "Central," haughty dame;
Should we entice her 'cross the Styx
Old Charon would get in his licks
"Line's busy!" he'd exclaim.

Bachelor Dinners Tabu

There is some talk in society of organizing a crusade against the farewell bachelor dinner. One of our cultured belles remarked the other day that the romance of matrimony had come to a pretty pass when the theoretically happy man felt constrained to hold a funeral feast over his single blessedness. The least sophisticated of bridesmaids knows her adorer's farewell dinner, as a rule, is only an excuse for a spree bigger and wilder than any predecessor of his bachelor career. Some of the girls are talking of pledging their sweethearts to forego the formal leave-taking of club friends and clubby fellows. Once the prejudice against the Eveless banquet becomes general among society girls it is doomed.

Ashbury Heights society has been threatened with disintegration as a result of the Hirschfeld diamond robbery.

The aristocrats of the Heights have been shocked by the conduct of Mrs. Hirschfeld. In their opinion she was guilty of an unpardonable impropriety in entering into business relations with the vulgar police. Many of the members of this haughty set have sporting blood in their veins, and in their opinion it behooved Mrs. Hirschfeld to show that she was a good loser. It is their opinion that a woman who cannot lose two thousand dollars' worth of baubles without making a disturbance over the unimportant incident lacks repose. They are particularly aggrieved that the fact should be disclosed that in their set a tea hostess deemed it advisable to secrete her jewels while entertaining a few friends. On the whole it was a very unfortunate affair. The question, Who stole the diamonds? may eventually be sent to Egypt and submitted to the Sphinx. But I am surprised that nobody thought of casting suspicion on the policeman on the beat.

Want, grim visaged on the highway walks
While Plenty in her carriage fine does ride;
Yet ere a single twelve-month—ah, who knows
That Plenty won't be shivering by Want's side?

Not For Alphonso

One of the dailies published the ridiculous report this week of the betrothal of the King of Spain and the Duchess Marie Antoinette of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The marriage of the King of Spain with a Lutheran Princess would obviously be impossible. It is pretty generally understood that Alphonso will soon seek a bride in Austria or Bavaria, but the most popular match for him in Spain would be Princess Louise d'Orleans, youngest daughter of the Comtesse de Paris and sister of the Queen of Portugal and the Duchess of Aosti.

Can't Overlook the Studs

Army officers are apologizing for Lieutenant Granville Fortescue, relative of the President, who recently ran amuck in the tenderloin. The impression prevails among them, as well as among many civilians, that he rendered the public a service when he administered a sound drubbing to a representative of our extortionate crew of hackmen. They think that his noisy behavior in the Techau Tavern should be condoned on the score of exuberant spirits, consequent upon the relaxation following the hardships he experienced at the front in Port Arthur. It is pointed out to his credit that he availed himself of a leave of absence, in a journey to the scene of war, at his own expense, for the sole purpose of professional improvement for the benefit of the army. They can forgive everything but the diamond studs in his evening dress shirt, which they regard as a gaucherie unworthy of a relative of the great exponent of imperialism.

The Gallant Twenty-Eighth

It is with sincere regret that San Francisco will receive next Monday the adieux of the gallant Twenty-eighth infantry, which leaves on that day for its new post in the East. During its stay at the Presidio, the Twenty-eighth has, I believe, made more friends and won more admirers than any regiment that has visited here for a long time. The regiment is not only highly efficient from a military standpoint, but is officered by as fine a lot of thoroughly good fellows as the army can produce. From hearty Colonel W. L. Pitcher down to the youthful subalterns the spirit of good fellowship is characteristic and the regimental mess is like a scene from one of Charles Lever's novels. At the mess table may be recognized at once the Jack Hintons and the Charles O'Malleys of the famous novelist, happy-go-lucky, devil-may-care soldiers, as ready for fight as for rollicking fun.

Concerning Our Guests

Lieutenants H. A. Hanigan of the army, and W. P. Cronan of the navy, who have been the military aids to Vice-President Corral of Mexico during that official's presence in San Francisco, have been kept busy. Possessing the ability to talk Spanish fluently, and at the same time being unusually bright, active and energetic young men, these two officers were selected for a delicate and, as it has proved, arduous duty, which they have performed admirably. From early morning until late at night Hanigan and Cronan have been on the go, and they won the admiration of the Mexicans for the tact with which they performed their duties. But I am willing to wager that neither of them will hanker after so strenuous a job again.

That Military Camp Deal

Some very artistic wire-pulling is being done these days by the owners of the large tracts of land which have been offered to the Government for military camp purposes. If there is a grain of truth in the stories one hears about the influences that are being brought to bear upon Congressmen and Federal officials, in the interest of certain owners, there is likely to be a big scandal before the deal is consummated. Baron von Schroeder and J. H. Henry are doing most of the wire-pulling. Henry is the owner of Camp Atascadero, and he administered a body blow to the baron when he lured the army to his ranch a few months ago for the military manoeuvres. I believe it is five hundred thousand dollars that he wants for the land, which is, of course, a fancy figure. The Government never gets anything at bargain prices. I have heard it suggested that Mr. Henry might be persuaded to sell his land to a private individual for three hundred thousand dollars, but then it must be remembered that it is very expensive to conduct negotiations with the Government. One must make frequent trips to Washington, and one must employ lobbyists, and one must do a great many things that are not required in closing a private bargain.

Belle—Charley told me a risque story last night.
Clara—You mean a story sans chemise, I presume.

The Wilson Tangle

This is penned for the enlightenment and benefit of the bavardes of the local dailies, and I should suggest that they cut it out and paste it somewhere convenient for reference. They are constantly confusing their Wilsons, and I feel that they should be set right. Emily and Charlotte are the daughters of the Russell Wilsons; Margaret is the daughter of the late Major John Wilson; Bessie and Bernice are the offspring of the Alexander Wilsons; Grace and Marie are children of the James K. Wilsons.

personated, with credit to herself, heroines of Racine and Browning, and now desires to essay two Shakespearean roles before spring. I also hear that Miss Jones is ambitious to play in Italian, probably one of D'Annunzio's tragedies, and in one of the little German plays. She understands and speaks both tongues.

Their Gowns Rip

Some of the local modistes have been so rushed with orders for the Greenway ball and other big functions that in their haste they have fairly thrown the materials together. Their carelessness has had dire results. Several young women who accepted dinner invitations last week were covered with confusion when their frocks began to rip under the arms and at the waist. One girl had just entered the drawing-room and was shaking hands with her hostess when rip! went her sleeve. She had to retire at once and put herself into the hands of a maid, who was a good hour repairing the damage. Meanwhile dinner was delayed, of course. And it was not the only mishap of the evening. Two other gowns came apart, one at the neck and another at the waist. The dressmakers, however, say it is not their fault; that the girls do not give them time to do their work properly.

Mrs. Joe Tobin will shortly go to New York for a brief stay.

Back From the Grave

The society belle who wanted to meet the Brownings at the Browning Club last week is probably the same young lady who, under the nom de plume of Sally Sharp, is writing society notes for the Call. In one of her paragraphs the other day she wrote that the Polyglot Club was going to give an entertainment "in honor of the Italian visitor, his Eminence, Cardinal Mezzofanti." Strange that I never heard of the resurrection of his Eminence, or even of his coming.

Men Were Plentiful

The Draper dance was a great success, Miss Draper having taken the precaution to invite two men for every girl. As a consequence the girls had a glorious time. Usually the girls predominate at local dances, and in such cases there is much dissatisfaction. The unusual number of men at the Draper ball made the function a most enjoyable affair. The girls not only danced every number but they had their choice of two or three men for every waltz and two-step. The men were pleased to know that they were not obliged to give a continuous performance, and that they could go out and get a smoke without invoking glowering glances.

Soon to Be Formally Announced

An engagement now on the rug is that of Hazel Noonan of Los Angeles and Dr. Walter Gibbons. Dr. Gibbons is the son of Dr. Henry Gibbons. His sisters, Ida, Marjorie and Florence are very popular in society. Miss Noonan is at present visiting her friend, Louise Redington, and is being much entertained.

The penance for sinning lies in being found out.

The McKinstry Sisters

Laura McKinstry has not, I am told, entirely recovered from the accident that befell her at the Carolans' Burlingame place last summer. Her arm is still lame and gives her an occasional twinge of pain, even at the bridge tables. Like so many of the girls of the older set, Miss McKinstry has caught the bridge fever and is nearly every afternoon called upon to take a hand at the game. Her sister Frances cares so little for society that it is considered quite an honor when she accepts an invitation to a social function. The younger Miss McKinstry is of the intellectual type, and delves into the deepest books of historical and religious lore. It seems hard to believe that this can be the same young girl who made her debut two years ago at the most vivacious entertainment chronicled in the annals of San Francisco society—the famous food-throwing dinner which Ethyl Hager gave in Frances McKinstry's honor.

The Pretty De Sablas

The de Sabla children attracted much attention at the Russell-Tobin wedding by reason of their beauty. They were their half-sister's attendants and were exceedingly calm and self-possessed. Leontine was named after her Uncle Leon, who is very fond of her. An interesting and interested spectator at the ceremony whose name did not figure among those present in the dailies' reports was the bride's little Japanese sleeve-dog. This tiny canine has had a very pleasant experience since it became Miss Russell's property. She does not permit a servant to take care of it but attends to all its wants herself.

The Dainty Countess Going

An occasional correspondent writes me from Washington that half the members of the Diplomatic Corps are in despair and American society at the Nation's Capital is torn with anxiety over the report that one of the brightest, prettiest, daintiest and altogether most charming of Europeans ever entertained in this country is to leave soon in the person of Countess Marguerite Cassini, niece and adopted daughter of the Russian Ambassador, and it is said that she is going away in a fit of pique.

She Won't Retrench

Countess Cassini to go? What, then, will Miss Alice Roosevelt do for a chum? Everybody who is anybody in Washington is aware of the strong friendship between the President's daughter and the dashing countess with whom she contemplated visiting this city next spring. My correspondent tells me that Countess Marguerite is poisoning her gauzy wings for flight across the water to Russia's snows because—because she is at variance with her august adoptive father. Frightful! Doddering old gentlemen of the Diplomatic Corps, reared in countries where the smallest misunderstanding with her parents would cause any young woman to be sewn in a sack and rolled downhill into whelming waters, shake their heads ominously at the news. Yet true it is. The Countess has been too extravagant for the rather heroic ideas of her natural guardian and the Ambassador has called a halt. In fact, he called it several weeks ago, when the Countess was in Bar Harbor, but a lot of good it did him. Countess Marguerite arched her bewitching brows, lowered her soft-fringed lids, sighed deeply, promised to be more economical, and then, just to show her independence, proceeded to spend twenty thousand dollars more as fast as she could. That is the precise sum—with perhaps a little fractional currency for tips—she has expended since her departure from the fashionable Maine resort. Count Cassini is a patriot. His country is pushed for funds in consequence of the unsuccess of certain transactions in the Orient, and, like the true nobleman he is, he regards it as his duty to strip his vast estates if necessary in contributing to the Government's needs. The Czar, he reasons, has given him all he has and to the Czar it must be yielded on demand. From the moment Russia felt the need of money he began to mail drafts on his banker to the imperial treasury. Even his wealth was affected by the drain, so he hastened to curtail his enormous expenses for the sake of his country and his Czar. It was a matter of course in his eyes. Any real Russian would do the same. So, at any rate, reasoned His Excellency. But he reckoned without his lovely daughter. The Countess refuses to retrench. By the way, during her first season in Washington many people suspected that she was the old gentleman's wife and not his niece. It was probably to silence rumor that he adopted her as his daughter. She is a Russian beauty, and she is the most popular woman in Washington society.

Women's Exchange Benefit

For the first time in several years, the lady managers of the Women's Exchange are making an urgent appeal for the renewed interest and assistance of the public. Outside of the continuous help that would come through an additional number of associate members which is solicited, the immediate help will come through the sale of tickets for the benefit performance to be given at the Tivoli, Tuesday evening, November twenty-second. Tickets are to be had at the Exchange or from any of the members of the board.

The Exchange works along so quietly that one forgets how important is its endeavor. It helps hundreds of gentlewomen to help themselves. The machinery for such an enterprise is costly, and recently twelve hundred dollars a year has been added to the rent of the premises occupied by the Exchange in Post street. This and the increased cost of materials used in the lunch room have brought financial embarrassment.

Our Gayley

It is not long since a professor from Europe was discussing, at Berkeley, a great book that was just from the press. He told of its perfect diction and of the beauty and smoothness of the lines, when suddenly he awoke to the fact that not a person from President Wheeler down to the most unimportant assistant was one bit enthusiastic over his description. "You do not seem to care for new and powerful writers," he remarked, interrogatively, to the man who sat next him at table. "No," was the quick response; "you must excuse us if we are indifferent. We do not mean to be discourteous to you but, you see, you do not know our Gayley. He is just what the men of his class call 'a wonder.' We consider 'our Gayley' capable of doing anything that can be done in the line of literature and of doing it a trifle better than any modern author. That is why we do not wax eloquent over your tale." And now all Berkeley is interested in the coming production of Professor Gayley's play, "The Star of Bethlehem," by Ben Greet's company. Ben Greet has received a great deal of valuable advertising at the university, and he is therefore quite enthusiastic over the Gayley play. By the way, he has had his letter-heads engraved with the scene in the Greek theatre of Hamlet instructing the players. Beneath is the inscription, "To hold as 'twere the mirror up to nature."

President Wheeler has been entertaining a number of distinguished visitors this week at his Berkeley home, among them Lieutenant Santander of the Chilean training vessel in the bay. He took over a number of cadets from the training ship in order that they might inspect the various engineering departments of the university.

A Modest Hero

Commander Carl Gilman Calkins was among the passengers for Japan last Thursday. He has been stationed in Portland during the last three years, having had charge of the coast defences from Alaska down to the mouth of the Columbia, and has gone to the Orient to join his ship. It was Commander Calkins, then a Lieutenant, who navigated the Olympia into Manila the morning of the famous fight that ended in the Americans taking possession of the Philippines. In answering a letter from a friend who wrote to congratulate the officer upon his bravery, Mr. Calkins said: "I must confess that I never thought of going ashore. I do not see the special 'bravery' of which you speak; I was on the ship and I navigated it—that is all, and I am not much of a swimmer, anyway."

Frank A. Gale of the Christian Science publication committee writes to inform me that I erred in my paragraphs anent Mrs. Eddy and her edict against women's clubs, in the issue of October fifteenth. Mr. Gale sends me Mrs. Eddy's explanation of the much discussed by-law and adds: "Any resignations from clubs or organizations by Christian Science members were purely voluntary and not under orders or demands."

In Reminiscent Vein

August Hemme, who died this week, was one of the first members of the old Central Presbyterian Tabernacle in Golden Gate avenue. He was at one time very wealthy and gave a great deal of money to the church. His eldest daughter, Minnie, was a very beautiful girl, and taught in the Sunday-school. That was the period when the late Judge Thornton was superintendent of the Sunday-school, and the church was attended by many prominent people who afterward left to join other sanctuaries. "Joe" Tippet, the Bohemian Club tenor, led the choir. Mr. Tippet later went to Boston where he and his wife, Clara Buetler that was, became well known in the musical set. Their daughter inherited her musical talent, and has lately become known as a successful writer of operettas.

Miss Younger's Return

Maude Younger, who is visiting her old home after many years of absence, is the only unmarried one of the children of Dr. William J. Younger. She is a decided bachelor maid, and has a large income from the fortune left to herself and sisters by their mother. The present Mrs. Younger, who was the widow of Henry Egerton, is the stout dentist's second wife. She made an admirable mother to her step-children and married all of them off but Maude. Two of the girls wedded into the Almanach de Gotha. Maude was engaged to a physician who was one of Roosevelt's Rough Riders, but the affair was broken off, and Miss Younger went to New York where she devoted herself to College Settlement work. She is a generous and clever girl and a fine musician.

A Bud and Her Aunt

If Ruth Houghton is anything like her Aunt Minnie in temperament and manner, her debut this season will be a pronounced success. Miss Minnie Houghton, though a seasoned belle, is still one of the most attractive women in society. It seems absurd to speak of her "chaperoning" her young niece, yet that is the way she puts it herself. Miss Houghton, Ruth's aunt, is a fine equestrienne and was one of the first of San Francisco's society girls to take up riding as a pastime. She is very stately and highbred, and has the entree to the holy of holies, so her niece is sure to be invited everywhere.

Her Last Function

Few old-timers survive to lift the veil of the long-dead past and reveal the pomp and circumstance of the social whirl that knew Mrs. Lizzie Allen, who passed away in the Crocker Old People's Home the other day in the ninety-ninth year of her age. For her years strong in body, and as vigorous of mind as a woman of thirty, she seemed as one whom Death had unmercifully forgotten. Until far along in middle age her life was one of gayety, wealth and great happiness. She was socially prominent in Boston before she came here, more than forty years ago, and she was a brilliant light of early San Francisco society. Her daughter, Mrs. Lizzie Riddle, who was the gayest and most sought-after matron of the long ago, was beautiful, full of life and highly accomplished. So many moths fluttered about her that her husband and she agreed to disagree. Few survive of all that mad throng who recall the brilliant Mrs. Riddle and her train of admirers. Her only daughter married William Mestayer, the actor, and that marriage, too, turned out unhappily. Mr. Riddle bequeathed his mother-in-law an annuity and it was upon that she lived until her closing days. Her vivacity, charm and cultivated mind would have been remarkable even in a woman of three score.

Her Engagement Watch

Alice Bacon, who is to marry Tom Driscoll in January, appears little more than a child in face and figure. She is slender and rather short, but quick of speech and is noted for her quaintly appropriate witticisms. She has just received her engagement ring, a perfect turquoise—her birth stone by the way—set around with superb diamonds. She received at the same time that Mrs. Driscoll gave her kiss of congratulation, a dear watch set thickly with diamonds. That time-piece is the little fiancee's pet and pride. Mrs. Bacon and Miss Bacon are visiting Rear-Admiral and Mrs. Tilley, at Mare Island, and, in company with Miss Tilley and Miss Menefee, they came over on a Government tug for the Kutz luncheon last week. Cupids were used in the decorations at this affair, the chair of the guest of honor being draped with tulle caught by a garland of orange blossoms.

Her Engagement Dog

One of Paula Wolff's engagement gifts from her fiance is a tiny cocker spaniel pup, seven weeks old. The fashion of presenting dogs as betrothal gifts was introduced by the Duke of Manchester when he engaged himself to the Cincinnati heiress. Her first gift from him was a valuable French bull-pup.

A Romantic Engagement

Any enterprising young matron who wishes to take a trip to Europe may make her expenses, easily, simply by intimating her readiness to chaperon a select little coterie of Oakland society girls. Every girl who has made the grand tour has come back to little old Oakland engaged to some man who was distinctly worth while. It was while in Europe that Lillian Moller became engaged to Frank Bunker Gilbreth, of Boston, whom she married last week. It was not however in Europe that they first met, but in Boston, where he called upon his cousin, Miss Bunker, who was chaperoning Miss Moller, Miss Barker and Miss Powell, in a year's trip across the ocean.

"Why there's Spender over there in that private box. I wonder who the woman is he is with?"
 "Why, that's his wife."
 "How shocking!"

Amateurs in Opera

Oakland has no more energetic society great dame than Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, of Fruitvale. It is to her that the little Congregational chapel of Fruitvale owes most of its support and she is always devising some way of adding to its funds. The Armory is regarded as the gift of this same munificent woman, who worked and planned for its erection. Just at present she is arranging for the production of "Pinafore" early in January. The principal parts will be taken by leading amateurs in Oakland society, while the chorus will be drawn from the same belles and beaux. Rehearsals are now being held at the Wetherbee home in Fruitvale avenue, and are the gayest little affairs that can be imagined.

Wheeler's Folly

There is a rumor from Berkeley that President Wheeler is about to finish, furnish and inhabit his big house in North Berkeley, that stands about a block from Mrs. Hearst's residence and from the Frank Wilsons. It is a dismal sight with the white cloth flapping in the spaces that are cut for windows and doors. It has been said that to furnish "Wheeler's Folly," as the place is called, would take a large amount of money, for it must be fitted up to harmonize with the beautiful interior.

Gayley Songs

Under the supervision of Professor Charles Mills Gayley, of the University of California, a book of college songs is to be given to the public. Professor Gayley is almost in despair and says that although the volume is not in press he hardly hopes to see it take form before the Christmas sale is over. The cover is to be gaily illuminated; there will be about ninety quarto pages and about sixty songs. Robert A. Waring was to have had charge of the compilation but his absence made it necessary for Professor Gayley to put his hand to the wheel.

Mutiny in "California"

For the first time in the history of the University of California there has been an open mutiny in class. Senior men, who are not required to drill but who must attend lectures on military science, have come to regard these lectures as a bore. A few days ago they decided to take matters in their own hands and began by singing college songs and yelling in chorus, as the lecture was about to begin. Captain Nance, the new commandant at the University, turned upon the upper class men, affecting to regard their conduct as the result of improper training: "Here you are, after three years' military discipline, acting like a number of naughty boys, dragging chairs, playing when you ought to be working, and setting a bad example to your little brothers," he remarked, severely. The men left the room, uproariously whistling, giving cat-calls and generally misconducting themselves. Both the commandant and the seniors have determined to carry the matter to President Wheeler. The men declare that they will not endure being treated as babies. Captain Nance responds that in that case they must conduct themselves as gentlemen. He is about to ask that the military students be instructed to wear proper uniforms and not military trousers, civilian coats and college plug hats.

To Don The Classic Garb

Before many months, the women students of the university will wear cap and gown as they wend their way across the campus. The co-eds say that the cap and gown is customary in college towns and has, for centuries, been associated with ivy-covered dormitories and cloistered halls. It is probable that the movement will take in favor and that the blue and gold, colors dear to Californians, will be used in the flowing gown and mortar board of the women students. They have a grievance, of course, the co-eds. They wail that the men of the different years have distinctive types of dress so that no college man could mistake a freshman for a sophomore or senior. It is also argued that the cap and gown will draw more women to the University of California as the classic garb appeals strongly to the artistic instinct of the sex. It is thought that this very argument may serve to kill the movement before it has ever borne fruit, for the professors, as everyone interested knows, are not in favor of doing anything that may serve to increase the attendance of women at the college. They would rather see them dwindle in numbers.

Those Naughty Students

But Professor Centner, of the department of German of the University of California, is a great admirer of the co-ed. He considers her as modest as a flower and shudders when he thinks of the rough student element into which she is flung. "Keep away from the shows that are coarse," said Professor Centner, recently, in discussing the action of the girls who left the Boating Club show given at Idora Park. "There is something 'rotten in Denmark' when students who are presumed to be gentlemen tell risque stories in the presence of ladies and recite things at which their fathers' faces would have burned. It is all wrong that the university should be held responsible for this species of blackguardism. It is not safe for a woman to attend many of these shows, and I am glad to see the women-students resenting the coarseness of the men with whom they are thrown, at least in class."

Berkeleyites Were Shocked

Ultra conservative Berkeley people, somewhat prudish, are protesting loudly against the license that is being granted the students. They are indignant that a great body of grown men should be permitted to prance around in pajamas, to say nothing of the nighties that displayed bony legs and ankles and were cut sufficiently low in the neck to give more than a hint of massive chests. It was after the Pajama rally in the Greek amphitheatre, where three hundred and fifty students in their various garments gave a performance for the purpose of stimulating enthusiasm for the foot-ball game between Stanford and Berkeley, and which was witnessed by a great crowd of men, that the scantily attired students marched with torches around the city. Refined Berkeley people were shocked and they say they are getting very weary of the "stunts" of college men and women, and there is talk of interposing a public protest. The students say that the townspeople should move, if they are of such refined sensibility as to be unable to appreciate the spirit that animates college men.

That Haunting Feast

That highly intellectual young woman, Emily Rosenstirn, is going abroad. I hear that Miss Rosenstirn is anxious to live down that appendicitis dinner which haunts her as the Intermezzo does Mascagni and the Purple Cow, Gelett Burgess. It was a weird inspiration, but Miss Rosenstirn had no thought of the notoriety that followed the uncanny feast.

The Latest Caprice

Monkeys and dogs as dinner companions no longer appeal to the jaded appetites of the capricious Newporters. A correspondent writes me that one of the rich matrons is preparing to give a "Florida" dinner, and that the scheme of decoration includes a tiny canal winding among ferns and moss fringed with flowers and grasses from the land of sunshine, in which will swim baby alligators rushed from the sluggish streams of their nativity by special train so they may be as lively as possible when the guests assemble. The water will be heated to normal temperature, and will swarm with gold-fish and purple mullets. Ebon singers from Florida groves are to warble plantation melodies, strum the banjo and contribute to the atmosphere as only negroes can.

Marcia's Letter

BY BESSIE L. RUSSELL.

Dear Girl:

I got your letter. I don't often get letters. Girl, I was surprised. This one, too, is so different from the letters I get, Girl, that I am hesitating a lot before answering.

Time was when I did not hesitate, Girl, when hesitating was the card I should have played, but that's long past and with the past never can be recalled.

I think of myself as I was then, Girl, and the picture is not a bad one.

Seventeen, you say? Yes, I was seventeen once, and oh, the wild dreams of seventeen! Nothing can touch them!

Even the sparkle of the champagne at thirty cannot bring the ripple of delight of one mad dream at seventeen! I, too, pined just as you are doing, Girl, for the city, the limitless city; for the clatter of the hoofs upon the asphalt, for the strains of maddening music in my ear.

In fancy I beheld myself strung with diamonds and topaz and pearls; I felt the rustle of a silken gown, the downy softness of a lace draped couch.

Then the dream passed swiftly.

I felt the clover at my feet; I heard Mother's voice at the well. Yes, Girl, I too was country bred and seventeen.

Then one day, a wild impulse led me to forsake the green meadows, to say good-bye to the country. That was years ago, Girl, although they still call me young. That was in the days when a hand outstretched could have saved me, Girl, but there was no hand outstretched. Girl, you ask me for my advice. You have heard me, you say, me—Marcia? You would hear what I would say? Then don't, Girl—don't!

I had not intended to say just this, Girl, I had not indeed, for when your letter came I read it aloud over the wine and cigarettes. I laughed and chuckled, and laughed again at the thoughts.

"Ah, she shall know what it means to go the pace," I said fiercely. "I shall show her. I have money—oh, so much money—I shall show her what it means—to go—the pace!"

Lord, Girl, I wrote the letter—I did, Girl—but just at that time the Cathedral chimes rang out across the way. They rang out "Just as I am, without one plea," and, Girl, I had not the heart to write you then. I burned that letter, Girl.

No, Girl, it's not what it's cracked up to be. It's not, Girl. This life of ours is a delusion, a mocking, a snare. What am I saying? Oh, my God, it—is—hell! Yes, hell, with demons all about you clamoring for your body, Girl, clamoring for your soul.

Girl, don't you believe it's a "charmed life." It's not, Girl. Yours only is.

You in the flush of girlhood, innocent of wrong—you are the happy one. In the rural freshness of the woods and fields only does God seem to walk with man. When the buds burst into blossom, and the birds chatter into song, there, there is the heart of man noble and the heart of woman pure! Oh, Girl, Girl, believe what I say; promise me that you will, and—over the placid commonplaces will shine the light of peace and happiness, with never the red glare of hell!

Good-bye, Girl.

Remember what I have said. You will, now—won't you, Girl? Marcia.

Her Ideal

BY ROBERT MACE.

Madge Gordon was a beautiful young woman, cultured and vivacious. She was the daughter of an English army officer and had been educated in Paris. Her principal heritage was a divine gift of music. The slender fortune her father left having been expended on her education, she was obliged to resort to the honorable drudgery of teaching music. But she added to her income by writing musical criticisms for a daily paper. Those criticisms attracted attention to her, for they bespoke a cultured mind, and a rare knowledge of the art which she so enthusiastically discussed. In time she was much sought after by the musical people of the American city of her adoption. She had the entree to the higher Bohemian set in which there were several people of congenial temperament, and being scornful of the conventions she was soon very warmly admired by the men. She had the courage of her convictions, and that was why she afforded a pleasing contrast to other women. But she was so beautiful, so immeasurably superior to other women, that she all unconsciously inspired malicious jealousy. The cruel suspicions of the envious, the veiled hints of slander they dared not openly assert, in time affected her social standing. Perhaps she was not as circumspect as she should be, but Madge Gordon was no ordinary woman. She did her own thinking, and she was true to her own philosophy. She possessed many virtues of mind and heart that are unknown to women who are proud of their purity of body. She cherished high ideals and her sentiments regarding honor and integrity were of the loftiest character. She abominated feminine cunning and she scorned the dissembler of either sex.

Madge Gordon was indeed an unusual woman. But with all her uneffeminate traits of character she fascinated men. She had had many flirtations and through them acquired a past.

One day the announcement was made of her engagement with Robert Fleming. And society stood aghast.

Robert Fleming was a successful young business man, whom match-making mammas had been angling for with untiring persistency. He had accumulated a fortune and was now winning political honors. He had served the people as Governor of the State, and in that office had achieved a reputation for probity and rare executive ability. Society was beginning to regard him as a hopeless bachelor, for no woman seemed to appeal to him.

When his engagement with Madge Gordon was announced, society was shocked.

"Poor fellow!" said one wealthy matron, "he does not know what he is doing. Of course he does not dream that she has a past. He has mingled so little with society that he has never heard any of the gossip. Well of course she will lead him a merry pace right into the divorce court."

"Poor Bob!" said a club friend in discussing the engagement. "What an awful awakening he will have. Something should be done to protect the unsophisticated from those vampires who steal into men's hearts through the channels of sympathy, or solitude, or circumstance—more often passion."

It was a quiet wedding. None but the intimate friends of the bride and groom attended the ceremony.

Sitting in the drawing room of the Pullman car on which they were journeying to the mountain resort where they were to spend their honeymoon, Robert Fleming and his wife talked of their mutual love.

"No woman ever touched my heart till I knew you," he said, "and dear, this is no boy telling his love tale, but a man of forty-three who knows life in every phase. You have awakened in me the best of which I am capable."

He drew her closer to him and gently stroked her gold-bronze hair.

"I have often wondered," he said, "how I succeeded in making an impression on you."

"You made an impression on me before we met," she said.

He looked at her in surprise.

"Yes," she continued, "I had followed your political career in the papers, and I grew to admire you for those traits of character that won so much praise from press and public. I knew that you were a man of unflinching integrity and that you could not be moved by any of the degrading influences that are brought to bear upon public servants. And then when I met you it was the easiest thing in the world to fall in love with you."

"Then," said Fleming, laughingly, "I have to live up to my reputation," and he embraced his bride again.

Six months later Robert Fleming and his beautiful young wife were engaged in serious conversation in their drawing room.

"So you have been disappointed in me," he said, and his voice trembled with emotion, while he vainly tried to maintain composure.

"Yes," she calmly replied, "I have. You know that I know that you have been wearing a mask. Love is so fragile that a breath may extinguish it. My love for you was the supreme part of my being, but it was love for you as you appeared to the world and as you appeared to me. I could never have loved a poseur, one who made pretension to virtue he did not feel."

The news of the suicide of ex-Governor Fleming caused a profound sensation, and society said, "I told you so."

The newspapers hinted at a domestic quarrel, and the gossips were sure that a scandal would develop. They wondered whom did he suspect or did he really know.

The Elusive

I am that hope held sacred at the start
Of love's desire;
I am that dream that fades, when dies
Its smoldering fire.

I am that sweet, elusive music heard
Above the theme;
I am the soul, intangible,
Of things that seem.

I am that subtle longing most of all Misunderstood;
That joy men seek to hold within
A jess and hood.

Some bubble ever floats beyond the hand,
For which man sighs;
Some ignis fatuus ever lures,
For which he dies.

Illusion all. No heart, that knows the full
Of love most prized,
But still, close-hidden, holds some dream Unrealized.

November, 1904.

Mabel Porter Pitts.

Star Dog and Kangaroo Walk

Hugh Morton, author of "Glittering Gloria," the latest Columbia attraction, knows his public and writes down to it. People of passive temperament who take their amusement in the spirit in which it is offered will find much to divert them in this superbly inane farce. It has the merit of coherency and its absurdities are so abundant that they occasionally threaten to bore, whereupon the dog, a most important member of the cast, comes on to lend verisimilitude to the plot. The company gives a good performance though there are no stars in the cast if we except the dog. To me the funniest feature of the performance is the kangaroo walk of Isadore Rush. I do not know whether this affectation, macropus salabatus in suggestion, is intended as a joke, but candidly it is much funnier than the singing of Miss Rush, which is beyond doubt the boldest thing that she does. Miss Rush first introduced this style of locomotion in "Florodora," but she has accentuated it probably by having her French heels Gallicized an extra inch. There has been no change in her singing, however, and her genius for clothes is still beyond question.

"The Messenger Boy"

It is unfair to the Tivoli company to represent that "The Messenger Boy" was a great success wherever it was produced. It was a great success nowhere, and therefore it is not particularly discreditable for the local stock company to fail to shine therein. Even in New York, with James T. Powers and May Robson in the cast, it failed to create a furor. It is one of those pieces that depend mainly on the personality of the cast and just a wee bit on the book and music. If it did not go very well in London or New York with picked people it should not be surprising that it does not arouse enthusiasm here, especially at this time with the Tivoli company out at the elbows so far as talent is concerned. Messrs. Webb, Sims and Schuster and the Misses Young, Leicester, De Fillippe and Reynolds all try dreadfully and obviously hard to be vivacious, amusing and up-to-date from a musical comedy point of view. Yes, they do try. The burden is on Mr. Webb, who was so funny in "The Toreador." In New York the burden was on Mr. Powers, who has a way of playing between the lines which is often more amusing than the lines. Mr. Webb hardly lives up to his Toreador reputation.

Another Californian Girl's Success

Though Jane Corcoran's art is as yet too immature to meet the requirements of a Peg Woffington, the young actress herself has such a charming personality and such undoubted talent that one easily sees a remarkable career before her. There is indeed a touch of genius in her temperament, and there is little doubt that before many years have passed she will have reached the heights of her profession. In her girlish manner and figure there is something reminiscent of Maude Adams, and she has all the charm of the older actress. "Pretty Peggy" is a well-woven play, into which Frances Aymar Matthews has gathered the more striking incidents of the famous actress's career. The story is centred about Peg's love for David Garrick, and the great actor's infatuation for another woman. As a love story it is full of interest, and keeps the audience's sympathies to the tragic end. One would have liked a more graceful, winning Garrick than Andrew Robson gives. Mr. Robson is a magnetic actor but his personality does not harmonize with Garrick's. I have seen a good many David Garricks, and of them all none was so true to the character as was Lawrence Hanley. Altogether the characters in the Grand production of Mrs. Matthews's play are capable and intelligent, but not brilliant. The young star is the exception.

Probably an Early Effort

Franklin Fyles did not construct a very good melodrama in "Drusa Wayne." I am inclined to believe it is one of the works he penned before "The Girl I Left Behind Me" brought him fame and cash. It is like those first manuscripts of struggling novelists who, when later they manage a best-seller, bring the old novel from its cupboard and sell it on the strength of their newly attained popularity. "Drusa Wayne" has plenty of material in it for a successful melodrama of the howling type, yet its sensations are not well enough presented to awake any excitement in the audience. It is slow, in fact. It is a pity to see such good acting wasted as is brought to it by John Craig, Lillian Lawrence, Luke Conness and the other members of the sterling Alcazar stock. The most convincing part of the play is the mounting. The scenery has no weak points.

At the Orpheum

The best turn on the Orpheum's bill this week is the sketch, "The Vaudeville Exchange," in which appear Watson, Hutchings and Edwards. A furniture smashing episode is the climax of the skit, which contains a lot of laughable business. Halley and Meehan are quite original in their black-face comedy and the Petchings show something out of the common in their musical flower garden. The Delmore sisters have some new things in their act, and they received a warm welcome from the audience on their reappearance after a considerable absence from this part of the world.

Full of Thrills

It is some time since the Central's leading lady has had to perform such a thrilling stunt as the one that falls to the heroine in "The Worst Woman in London." This is a walk of thirty feet in midair on a wire, in escaping from a building which the villainess has fired. I can fancy Miss Clifton would rather have a thousand more words added to her part than perform this feat. However the gallery gives her her fill of applause, and this appreciation may compensate for the hazardous task. Mayall, as the hero, also has some strenuous stunts to perform, and even when villain and villainess are pursuing, the hero always manages to get there in time to prevent a catastrophe. To Miss Ellsmere and Shumer fall the roles of the wicked ones, and they are heartily hissed whenever they make entrance or exit, a tribute to the cleverness of their acting. The scenery is as thrilling as the plot and situations.

John Craig, as Prince Karl, at the Alcazar

Pinero's Doll

Pinero's latest play, "A Wife Without a Smile," is soon to be brought to this country by Charles Frohman. This is the play with the mechanical doll which keeps tab on the spooning of a honeymoon couple. There has been much speculation over the dramatist's reason for introducing this novelty, and now it is generally accepted that Pinero, in disgust over the scant favor shown "Iris," resolved to write down to the average run of playgoers. There is no denying that Pinero has been nursing a grievance over the cool reception of "Iris" in this country and England. He put forth the play as his most ambitious work, and hotly resented the criticism of its sordidness. It appears that in "A Wife Without a Smile" the dramatist is really having fun with the theatre-going public. In a sense he is almost holding it up to ridicule by illustrating how it laughs at petty nonsense and turns away in indifference from the serious worth of "Iris." If this is Pinero's way of thinking no one will quarrel with him as long as "A Wife Without a Smile" is of mirthful quality. But how difficult it is for Pinero to get away from his wilful characters is made clear by a reading of the plot. There has been severe denunciation of his dancing doll in London, and the dull-witted censor has at last been moved to action. Doubtless the doll will be the theatric sensation of the season, and it is not at all praiseworthy that this seems inevitable. The reason why the doll has created a tremendous stir in London is manifest to every one, and for the same reason it will repeat the performance in this country. Mr. Frohman will present the play exactly as in the original. The will of the British censor will not be observed in hanging the doll.

CROWN JEWELS PAWNEED BY MONARCHS.

It is a well known fact that rulers have been compelled to pawn the royal jewels in times of need to carry on affairs of state importance. The private citizen of today need not feel skeptical about doing likewise if necessary. A special department for this purpose exists at the Baldwin Jewelry Store, 906 Market street, where liberal advances can be obtained at banking rates.

Arrivals at Hotel Del Monte for the week included Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Innes, Mr. and Mrs. Morgan Ross of New York, C. L. Scripps of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Patton, Miss Patton, Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Cheney, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Borlein, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Nichols, Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Bentley, Dr. and Mrs. Grant Selfridge, W. L. Greenbaum, Mr. and Mrs. Thos. P. Greaves, Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Curtaz, Mrs. E. E. Whitney, Miss F. L. Wadsworth of San Francisco.

It is more than likely that George P. Fuller and M. C. Harris will go to Del Monte in the near future and attempt to get all the world's records up to twenty-five miles for stock cars. Mr. Fuller holds the fastest mile record ever made by Eastern enthusiasts, but the habit is also being acquired by California automobilists, as the Pope-Toledo Touring Car Company has taken an order during the past week for a 60 h. p. Pope-Toledo, costing eight thousand dollars, with an extra Pullman body costing two thousand dollars, total cost being ten thousand dollars.

The Bulletin announces that their next Sunday morning edition will be a very attractive number. They will publish a "Special Feature" section, containing articles by Dorothy Dix, Madame La Bavarde, Grant Wallace, Lowell Otus Reese, A. J. Waterhouse and several other writers who have been specially engaged. "Love's Old Sweet Song," in sheet music, will be given free with each paper; fifty prizes for the children; the illustrated magazine, and ten Green Trading Stamps. With these many special features added to The Bulletin, it should make it the most popular Sunday paper issued.

"The Second Mrs. Jim," a short, entertaining narrative, filled with quaint humor and homely common-sense, from the lips of the Second Mrs. Jim herself, will be published complete in the Sunday Call Magazine tomorrow. As an exponent of what the ideal step-mother and mother-in-law can be, the Second Mrs. Jim, with her tact, wit and shrewd common-sense, takes front rank. Other features of the Sunday Call will be: "Adventures of Reuben," by Edward W. Townsend, which are concluded; "On and Off the Bread Wagon," by Charles Dryden; a droll Southern story, "Colonel Bunker: He Tells of a Poem and a Duel;" a football story, "Whipping a Big Team Into Shape," showing the perplexities that confront coach and trainer in the days before the big intercollegiate game; women's pages by Madge Moore and Augusta Prescott; the book reviews by Robert W. Ritchie, and the puzzle page. Especial attention is called to the prize short story announcement.

The London publishers of the "Temple Shakespeare" say that there are a quarter of a million sets sold annually, about one hundred thousand of which go to America. And yet the "Temple Shakespeare" is never mentioned amongst the lists of "best-sellers." The truth of the matter, a point usually lost sight of, is that the "best sellers" are listed from the new books only, and therefore they do not necessarily particularize the books which most people are reading. The Bookman, which compiles a monthly list of the six new books most in demand in the larger cities of the United States, makes no attempt to indicate how many copies it is necessary to sell in order to claim mention, and for that matter, unless in New York, where two lists are given, for "uptown" and "downtown," we do not even know whether more than one dealer is asked to supply information. It would be quite within the bounds of possibility that a book could enjoy a "boom" as far as being a best-seller is an indication, if one copy a day were the average for two weeks in any particular month. On the other hand, a good book is as good ten years after date as when it first saw light in the show window, and since the system of remainder sales makes it possible to purchase copyrighted books, new in every respect but the date of publication, for the nominal price of fifty cents, thrifty book-lovers borrow the current crazes from the libraries and if, on perusal, they develop qualities which will entitle them to a third and fourth reading, it is a simple matter to watch the reduction sales until the desired volume appears. It is fairly safe to say that many books the names of which are forgotten now by the polloi are selling as well today as when they were in every hand.

In Financial Circles

Trading during the week past was dull and featureless. The volume of business was considerably reduced, transactions aggregating $232,000 in bonds and 4,966 shares, distributed as follows: 799 lighting, 490 water, 1,787 miscellaneous, 40 bank shares and 1,850 sugars.

S. F. Gas & Electric gained about three-fourths of a point. Alaska Packers' Association lost two points, closing at $98. The Board of Directors of this company, strengthened by the addition of two local financiers, is still considering the way to better the financial condition of the concern, but nothing tangible has been decided on. The pressure to sell has somewhat abated; on the other hand, investors are not coming forward.

Sugar stocks showed considerable strength, yet without a material increase in prices. I am assured from reliable sources that three of our companies listed on the Stock and Bond Exchange will resume dividends before the end of the year.

Raw sugar prices are ruling very strong. Eastern and European reports predict a further substantial advance.

JUST READ THIS — YOU'LL BE GLAD

This is written to remind you that every man or woman needs at intervals a change of scene and climate in order to feel well and to do one's best. It's to remind you, too, that just after the early rains the California country, and particularly the region about Hotel del Monte, "field and tree, and sky and sea," is most alluring:

"Then, if ever, come perfect days."

This is to tell you, also, that by reason of remarkable natural conditions, this present fall and winter season of 1904-05 is far advanced, so that the months of October, November, December and January are sure to be like Spring, with Summer peeping around the corner. The golf links sweeping over the hillside that slope from blue Monterey bay were never greener, meadow larks carol among the live-oaks, palms and pines send forth young buds and branches, flaming dahlias wave in the breeze. This isn't the season for midsummer gaiety, but it's just the time and the best time for you to take a week or so of idling rest, cheerfully mingled with sport on the golf links, on horseback, climbing the mountains that rise to the eastward, or angling for the game fish of the bay.

Remember this, that Hotel del Monte offers more natural attractions and more comforts and luxuries than any other resort in the world. Remember, too, that the climate here is delightful every day in the year, and should the warm rains keep you indoors, there's bowling for exercise, and miles of corridors and glass-enclosed porches. Remember, too, that this hotel is fashionable only because it offers the best; that it is popular because every one can here have a good time, any time, every time. Remember, too, that it's a home place, where the children can be happy, and families can enjoy themselves for months without disturbing household cares.

Why not plan to spend a week or two here? Get out your golf sticks and woo Mother Nature and good health on the luring links. Write for terms, or run down any Saturday or Sunday and see for yourself. Special Saturday-Monday rate from San Francisco, including railway fare and two days' board at the hotel, only ten dollars. Leave Third and Townsend-street depot at three o'clock (parlor car), reaching the hotel at six forty-eight.

A Suggestion from Labby

Mr. Labouchere of London Truth suggests, in the latest issue to hand, that if playwrights would only admit that a considerable proportion of their goods were prepared for the popular market as frankly as Messrs. X. Y. Z.'s cotton goods, critics could start two standards of criticism, and the newspapers could employ two critics—one gifted with intelligence to criticise ambitious plays, and one without intelligence to deal with commercial wares, and then we should see announcements of new plays in this style: "His Majesty's Servant." A good crusted Restoration melodrama. Genuine Wardour Street dialect, with Yankee finish. Full-bodied episodes. Historical outrages guaranteed. Sound domestic heroine. Genuine vicious villainess. Persecuted hero of the most approved pattern. King Charles II (with wit) in real oak tree. Full Imperial company. Waller stamped on every act. None other genuine.

Miss Laura Kinze von Kisielnicka, a distinguished contralto, will give a concert at Steinway hall, Tuesday evening, November twenty-second. Her voice is equally trained in all registers and in Europe she has been accorded great praise. She will be assisted by Miss Hulda Anderson, pianist, and Hother Wismer, violinist. Mrs. Frank Washington will be the accompanist.

We will have our grand opera season next year, in April. Conried will produce "Parsifal" and other novelties, and will bring all his principal singers.

Next Week's Bills

Theodore Roberts, the Californian actor, heads the cast of "The County Chairman" at the Columbia. William Lamp, also well known and a favorite here, and Florida Kingsley, are of the company. The cast contains forty-nine speaking characters.

"An American Citizen" will succeed "Hamlet" at the Majestic. The policy of the house in carrying two such leading men as Howard Gould and J. H. Gilmour finds its justification in the production of such attractions as "Hamlet" and also in the play that is to follow. "An American Citizen" was the medium in which Nat Goodwin and Maxine Elliot scored not a little of their theatrical success.

One of Richard Mansfield's successes was a comedy by Archie Gunter, "Prince Karl." On Monday night it will be given at the Alcazar with John Craig in the title role. Mr. Craig starred in this comedy for two seasons in the East. The scenes will be reproduced in the same manner that always characterizes the productions at the Alcazar.

"Pretty Peggy" will have but one more week at the Grand, when will come the successful melodrama, "The Fatal Wedding."

"The Messenger Boy" will continue at the Tivoli.

A strong melodrama of modern times will be produced at the Central. "Her Marriage Vow" is a four-act comedy drama with startling and realistic effects. A great scene takes place in the last act when two full-size trains dash across the stake in full view of the audience and nearly collide.

John T. Kelly, last seen here with the Weber and Fields aggregation of stars, will make his first vaudeville appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum in a one act farce, "Senator McPhee." "The Navajo Girls," twelve vivacious and talented young ladies, come direct from New York. They are singers, dancers and instrumentalists, change their costumes several times during the act and carry some beautiful scenery and stage accessories. John Canfield and Violet Carleton, who have not been seen here for five years, will return with "The Hoodoo." Reed and Shaw, a pair of muscular marvels, will make their first appearance here, presenting a novel gymnastic specialty.

At the Chutes will be the Fetching brothers in "A Musical Flower Garden," Samson and Zaccho, a strong man and an athletic woman, and the Huegel brothers, comedy acrobats.

TWELVE NAVAJO GIRLS. The latest musical novelty, at the Orpheum next week.

Gilmour's Hamlet

San Francisco has been particularly fortunate of late in having the opportunity of witnessing four different Shakespearean plays, all creditably presented. There have been three different Hamlets—Ben Greet at the Berkeley Greek theatre, Landers Stevens at the Dewey in Oakland, and last of all, Joseph Gilmour as the melancholy Dane at the Majestic theatre. The latest Hamlet is a thoughtful, brooding man whose mournfulness is changed to inexorable hatred and desire for revenge from the time his father's spirit appears and talks with him. Mr. Gilmour's Hamlet is modeled somewhat after that of Sothorn's. Feigned madness is the salient feature of it. This, the actor emphasizes to a degree throughout the entire play, showing clearly that he is sane both in his conversation with the players and with the courtiers. Though thoroughly intelligent in conception, Mr. Gilmour's portrayal of the character is marred by his delivery, which is often unintelligible. The famous soliloquy was nearly spoiled on account of this, although so far as the spirit of the thing was concerned it was given with an eminently thoughtful interpretation. His performance was notably free from mouthing and rant; in fact it was given with a modernness that made it refreshingly human. Miss Gardner's Ophelia was effective. In the mad scene she was particularly good, making a truly pathetic figure of the lovelorn maiden whose misfortunes had unseated her reason. The Horatio of Harry Mestayer was a handsome, virile picture of noble friendship and faithfulness. Eleanor Gordon played the part of the Queen excellently. She looked very regal in her queenly robes, delivered her speeches intelligently, and in her scenes with Hamlet was exceedingly dramatic and forceful. Others in the cast who give admirable presentations of the different roles are Howard Gould as Laertes, Frank MacVicar as the King and George Woodward as Polonius. Richard Thornton as the Ghost is almost funny in his attempts to make weird and frightful the dead King's spirit. The performance was mounted with a great deal of care, but on Monday night there seemed to be a little uncertainty as to lighting. The costumes are rich and elegant and the supers the most graceful and intelligent of the kind.

EDNA ELLSMERE,

Who for some time past has been at the Central theatre, has become deservedly popular with the patrons of the house on account of her ability. Seldom does Miss Ellsmere play a gratifying part, as she is usually cast in the role of an adventuress, but she has an artistic temperament and a finish that has called for only the most favorable criticisms.

SCENE FROM "THE COUNTY CHAIRMAN,"

George Ade's quaint comedy, which Henry W. Savage offers at the Columbia for two weeks beginning Monday, November seventh. It is regarded by authorities as the nearest approach to the one distinctively great American drama that has been so far produced. After all, it seems fitting that Ade should write the long looked for American play. He is American through and through; was born on a farm in the Middle West, went to the village school and when he grew up settled in Chicago, where he became a newspaper man. It is an old story how he attained lasting fame as the author of "Fables in Slang." Henry W. Savage admired his genius and produced his opera, after other managers had refused it, "The Sultan of Sulu." Its marked success as well as the success of his later plays under the direction of Henry W. Savage are now matters of history. In "The County Chairman" Ade has done the best work of his career, because he has merely sought to set down the scenes with which he was entirely familiar—the scenes where he spent his boyhood days.

She's a Californian

Mrs. Lotta Day Coleman, whose first play was successfully produced at a local theatre a few seasons back, has just finished her second, a comedy-drama written for one of the syndicate stars. The play will be produced simultaneously with the publication of a novel of the same title, arranged from the drama, and which is to be illustrated by poses, scenes and tableaux from the stage production. Though many have fancied that Mrs. Coleman is a Southern woman, from her appearance and manner, she is really a Californian by birth and education. Almost unknown, she went to New York last summer to consult with managers and publishers, and her evident sincerity and the merit of her work at once won her their favorable attention. New York managers and publishers, however, seem to look with kindly eyes these days upon Californians, for so much promising work has been turned out by Western brains.

Shocking!!

The New York papers say that they heartily endorse Chicago's verdict of approval in the case of Henry Miller and "Joseph Entangled." Are we indeed so provincial that our verdict doesn't count? What is the use of playing dog for theatrical managers if our judgment is considered of no importance? It is humiliating enough to play the dog, but what could be worse than to have the fact thrust home that the porcine culture of Chicago is appraised above that of this city of salons.

The Great American Playwright

Augustus Thomas has announced his intention of living abroad. It has been suggested that as he has successfully dramatized a large portion of the American States, he should delay his emigration until he has staged the whole Republic. The latest of his great successes is "The Earl of Pawtucket" which is two seasons old now, but which has not yet been crowded into the provinces. It is one of the rare treats in store for Columbia audiences.

Grace Reals, who came to San Francisco as leading lady of the Majestic stock company, was for several years prima donna with the Bostonians. She still has her fine voice, which was heard in the Japanese Nightingale's plaintive song in the Watanna play.

In the cast of Pinero's "Letty" in New York, a small part is played by Olive L. Oliver, who is one of the army of Oakland girls who have made successes on the stage. Miss Oliver was Calypso in "Ulysses" last season.

George Ade's comedy, "The County Chairman," will follow Glittering Gloria at the Columbia. Maxine Elliott in "Her Own Way" will be here next month.

The Kruger Recital

Miss Sannie Kruger's song recital at Lyric hall on October twenty-seventh was an interesting musical event. The pretty songstress looked very sweet in pale blue and sang a brilliant program in a manner that delighted a large audience. She was magnetically assisted by Frederick Maurer as accompanist. Miss Aileen McCabe (pupil of Nathan Landsberger) played an obligato to some of the numbers and won enthusiastic applause for a violin solo. Miss Kruger intends to resume her vocal studies in Europe where for some years she has already studied. She shows much talent and with "Preparation and Persistence" for her motto there is no reason why she should not succeed in concert or opera.

First Kopta Quartet Concert

The Kopta-Mansfeldt concerts are certainly becoming very popular with our musical people. Last Sunday, when the first of this season's series was given, the hall was comfortably filled with a fashionable crowd of music-lovers who were very enthusiastic over the skilfully rendered program. The first number was the String Quartet No. 12 by Mozart with its several beautiful movements, allegro vivace, assai, menuetto, allegretto, andante cantabile, molto allegro. The last movement, which is the most interesting of them all, was exquisitely played. Two novelties, the Andantino from opus 1st by Svendsen, and the Scherzo op. 6 by Corsanego, were played. The Andantino has a full, melodious theme which interweaves itself through the different instruments in beautiful harmony. The Scherzo is a breezy little composition, light and trifling as the Andantino is solemn and stately. The concluding number was the piano quintet op. 5 by Sinding. This composition was played last year by the Kopta Quartet with Mrs. Mansfeldt and made such an impression that it was played again last Sunday by request. Mrs. Mansfeldt was entirely en rapport with the quartet and played in her usual sympathetic and finished style. The second concert will take place Sunday afternoon, November thirteenth, at three o'clock in Lyric hall, when the program will be: String Quartet, op. 18, No. 2, Beethoven; string quartets, Andante, from op. 29, Schubert, Two Waltzes (by request), Dvorak; piano trio, op. 50 (first time), Tschaiikowsky.

An Interesting Concert

Miss Alta Yocum, pianiste, and Miss Stella Silverstein, dramatic soprano, pupils of Professor and Mrs. Joseph Beringer, were the principals at a recital given on Friday evening last. The affair was invitational, and Steinway hall was filled with an appreciative audience. Miss Yocum at once made it apparent in her opening number, the Gluck-Saint-Saens "Alceste," that she is a pianiste of ability and musical feeling. This impression was more than justified by her succeeding pieces, all of them played with sureness, grasp and excellent technique. I enjoyed the four Chopin preludes, so seldom played in public, and the B major Nocturne. The Leschetizky "Intermezzo" in octaves was a fine example of wrist technique brilliantly done, nor was Miss Yocum disappointing in any of her numbers. Miss Silverstein has a rich, full soprano of unusual range and great emotional expression. All her program numbers suited her voice and were well rendered, but she overdid her encore, Willeby's "Stolen Wings," giving it the intensity of grand opera. Those little airy trifles are not her genre, which is depth, color and passion. Her numbers were Schubert's "Du Bist die Ruh" and "Serenade," Tosti's "Goodbye" and Giosa's "La Zingarella." Miss Yocum played, in addition to the compositions I have mentioned, two Sinding pieces, Schytte's "Gespenster," a Schuett paraphrase on the waltz from "Die Fledermaus" and Liszt's "Cantique d'Amour" and Sixth Rhapsody, a most successful program, and well received by the audience. Both ladies were the recipients of quantities of flowers.

The annual recital of Madame Carrington's pupils on Tuesday evening occurred too late for review this week. Also too late for review was the recital by Miss Grace Freeman, violiniste, pupil of Giulio Minetti; Miss Rita Slater, pianiste, a pupil of W. J. McCoy, and Miss Lucy Hannibal.

MISS JOAN BALDWIN.

A Talented Young Pianist

An unusual instance of recognition of native talent is evinced by the engagement of Miss Joan Baldwin for a piano recital by the Saturday Club of Sacramento. Miss Baldwin, who is just nineteen, made her first appearance in public at the April concert of the Mansfeldt Club, and in the audience were several members of the Saturday Club, who spoke in such glowing terms of her performance to the president of their club that she immediately wrote to Mr. Mansfeldt to engage Miss Baldwin. No local pianist has ever given a recital for the Saturday Club, but most of the European artists are engaged by this exclusive musical organization, Josef Hofmann being the last one to play for them. Miss Baldwin's program for her recital in Sacramento on November nineteenth will be: Robert Schumann—Novellette B minor, Romanze, F. sharp, Presto passionato; Albert I. Elkus—"Rosamond" from suite "Dream of Fair Women," Bagatelle, "Lady of Shalott" (after Tennyson), "Cleopatra" from suite "Dream of Fair Women"; Frederic Chopin—Etude, C sharp minor, Prelude, B flat minor, Prelude, C sharp minor, Etude, A minor; Franz Liszt—Chant Polonais No. 5, "Au bord d'une source," Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 9, Carnaval de Pesth.

The first recital by pupils of Louis H. Eaton, assisted by Miss Jenkins, violiniste, was given on Thursday evening of last week, when the following program was rendered: My Mother Bids me Bind my Hair, Haydn, Marie, Franz, Nymphs and Shepherds, Purcell, Miss Goodsell; Most Wondrous it Must Be, Ries, Mrs. Lowery; Since First I Met Thee, Rubinstein, Tender Ties, Delbrück, After a Dream, Faure, Mrs. Helen Warshauer; From the Depths, Campana, Arthur Morgenstern; Prelude, Rogers, Arabian Nights, Reinecke, Master Louis von Hergert (pupil of Mrs. Ella von Hergert); Were My Song with Wings Provided, Hahn, Sing Me to Sleep, Greene (with violin obligato), Miss Lillie Young; All for You, Guy d'Hardelot, Lullaby, Greene, Miss Beatrice Boston, a pupil of Louis Eaton, has been engaged as soprano soloist at the Central Methodist church, this city. Miss Boston leaves a similar position in the choir of the Episcopal church in Santa Cruz to come to San Francisco.

At Mills College

The sacred cantata, "The Daughter of Jairus," by Stainer, was given at Mills College, in Lisser hall, Sunday afternoon, by the choir of the First Congregational church of Oakland. The work was presented by the choir the previous Sunday in Oakland before a congregation of eighteen hundred people. The full chorus choir of sixty voices under the direction of Alexander Stewart participated in the repetition of the cantata. The soloists were: Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano, Mrs. Carroll Nicholson, contralto, Arthur A. Macurda, tenor, Henri L. Perry, bass, Miss Helen Sutphen, violinist, and Miss Virginie de Fremery, organist.

Miss Agathe Normani, pupil of Paolo Le Villa, will give an evening of music under the auspices of the Golden Gate Christian Endeavor Association, at Y. M. C. A. hall, Thursday, November seventeenth. She will be assisted by Miss Schorch, violinist, Prof. Martinez, pianist, Mr. Anthony, tenor, Mr. Walsh, baritone and Professor La Villa, director and accompanist. The proceeds will go toward the erection of a hospital for the association.

Enid Brandt to Appear Here

The reappearance of little Enid Brandt at her concert on Thursday evening, November tenth, will be hailed with delight by the many admirers of the child who have been watching with the keenest interest her remarkable advancement from year to year. The child last appeared when scarcely ten years of age at the Banks' Glee Club concert in New York, where her audience numbered over thirty-five hundred critical music-lovers. Also at Mendelssohn hall at her own recital her marvelous performance aroused the greatest enthusiasm. Although fame and fortune lay at the child's feet, Mrs. Brandt preferred to continue her musical education, and how wisely will be seen at her concert when she performs the tremendously difficult Saint-Saens concerto and the Polonaise in E major of Liszt without one change. No one who has previously heard this wonderful child can really judge of her present performances, as the work of the past two years, under the continued careful supervision of Mrs. Noah Brandt, who has been her only teacher, entitle her to a place among the great artists of the world. At the rate she is progressing it is a matter of but a few years before she will be one of the chosen few.

The first musicale of the Schubert Quartet was given on Tuesday evening at 903 Sutter street. The quartet consists of Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, Mrs. N. E. B. Robinson, Frank Onslow and L. A. Larson; Mrs. W. J. Batchelder, accompanist.

The twenty-seventh monthly musical service will be given by the choir at Trinity church on Sunday evening at eight o'clock, when the second part of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be given. Miss Flynn and Mrs. Warshauer, sopranos, Miss Fairweather and Mrs. Lawrence, contraltos, Mr. Rosekrans, tenor, Mr. Oksen and Mr. Lane, baritones, will be the soloists; Louis H. Eaton, organist and director.

Melba is expected in this country almost any day and will immediately proceed upon her concert tour, appearing continuously until next April.

Clarence Eddy, the distinguished American organist, will be the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Louis H. Eaton while in San Francisco this season.

A piano recital that is exciting considerable interest is that to be given by Milton Jacobi, a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt, in Steinway hall on Tuesday evening, November fifteenth. The program will include compositions by Schubert, Rheinberger, Liebling, Dvorak, Rubinstein, Grieg, Chopin, Zaremski, Albert Elkus and Liszt. Three of the compositions, two Humoresques by Dvorak and a Spanish serenade by Zaremski, will be performed for the first time in San Francisco on this occasion.

Automobile Topics

L. L. Patrick, the well known mining man of Tonopah, Nevada, last week purchased a Winton Quad from the Pioneer Automobile Company, the tonneau of which machine is being converted so as to have a seating capacity for six people, making a total seating capacity for eight persons including the driver. The machine will leave here on Thursday of this week overland to Goldfield. The trip will consume some six or seven days. H. T. Kutzkau, the well known local chauffeur, is to be in charge of the machine and it is to be used in service between Tonopah and Goldfield, a distance of twenty-eight miles, and will make two round trips daily. It is expected that quite a party of Mr. Patrick's friends will make a trip through as far as Reno in the machine.

Mr. Patrick last week purchased the big red four-cylinder Columbia of the West Coast Motor Car Company and will use the machine, which is an identical model of the Columbia which now holds the New York-Chicago record, in carrying passengers between Tonopah and Goldfield. The regular seating capacity of the Columbia is seven, but nine can easily be accommodated. Mr. Patrick's Columbia left San Francisco Tuesday and will be driven overland to Goldfield by Walter Morris, one of the best operators of automobiles in San Francisco.

Miss Mabel Dodge and a party of friends were seen out in Miss Dodge's Autocar this week.

W. F. Hunt, of the Pioneer Company, is away on a short vacation. When last heard from he was in Eureka.

J. H. Durst, of the Pioneer Company, was seen driving through the park with a party of friends on Sunday last.

Mr. Tibbits, of the Sunset Press, last week purchased from the Pioneer Company a two-cylinder Locomobile.

The sensation of the coming automobile season is the announcement of the Winton Company. While nothing is known definitely outside of the walls of the Winton factory, it has been hinted that the Winton will have a complete line of machines next season, all of which will be four-cylinder with the engines forward. The design of tonneau will be side entrance with long wheel base, and the price will be right.

The Stockton Automobile Company last week purchased an Oldsmobile runabout from the Pioneer people.

W. Newberg, of Petaluma, is spending a few days in this city and was a visitor at the Pioneer Company's place last Friday. Mr. Newberg is the owner of an Oldsmobile light tonneau touring car which he was fortunate enough to get out of the first carload of these machines which came to California this season. He used his machine daily in and around Petaluma and has made a number of long trips over different parts of this State. In speaking of his machine Mr. Newberg said: "It has never been in the repair shop since it was delivered to me, over five months ago."

Dr. Huntington and party of friends made a trip from Oakland to Morgan Hill on Sunday last in the doctor's new Oldsmobile tonneau. The distance covered was one hundred and thirty-three miles; there were five people in the party, and the trip was made for the express purpose of testing out the Oldsmobile tonneau as a touring car and the results were very satisfactory.

C. A. Hawkins, general manager of the White Sewing Machine Company of San Francisco, has returned to town, after five weeks' absence in the East, during which time he visited all the important automobile centres the other side of the Rockies, and also took in the great Vanderbilt cup race, which he describes as most exciting and dangerous sport. As an example of this he cites the fact that out of the eighteen entries not one escaped without a breakdown and only two cars finished. Mr. Hawkins reports prospects for automobile business throughout the East for the coming season better than at any previous time in the history of the industry. During his stay in New York he drove one of the new 1905 model White touring cars several hundred miles, including two circuits of the Vanderbilt course. The popularity of the White car in the East is growing at a very rapid rate. In New York and Boston, where there are more Whites in use than any other one make, the White Company had already received advance orders for thirty-three cars in New York and twenty-four for Boston of the 1905 models before the customers ever saw even a sample machine. The White factory is now making shipments at the rate of one hundred and fifty per month of 1905 models, and has its entire output taken up to the first of January on advance orders. Locally purchasers have already placed twenty-nine definite orders for 1905 model E White touring cars. Mr. Hawkins placed orders while at the factory at Cleveland for two hundred of the 1905 models, and all of these will be shipped to this coast before the first of April, and even with this large supply he expects to be unable to fill all the orders.

Ed. McKinney of Ashland, who owns three White stanhopes, writes to the White Sewing Machine Company as follows: "I have just come in from Klamath Falls, Oregon, taking two cars. I thought I had been over rough and steep roads before but this trip caps it all. The most trouble we had was digging freight wagons out of the mud so we could pass. We also made two miles in four minutes with the large road sprockets on."

Recent sales of White touring cars are to C. Gordon, Hartley F. Phillips and Lieutenant Langdon of this city. Mr. Phillips invested in a touring car which he will put in the rental service, his headquarters being at the White garage, 1878 Market street. Mr. Gordon, after looking over cars of the runabout class, purchased a White stanhope. Chas. D. Blaney, of San Jose, is enjoying motoring in his White stanhope, making frequent trips to San Francisco. Mr. Blaney is awaiting the arrival of his 1905 White steam touring car. A. C. Kuhn of San Jose had a pleasant run to this city last week in his White.

The West Coast Motor Car Company of San Francisco and Los Angeles has been advised by the Autocar Company of Ardmore, Pennsylvania, that after November first the price of the four-passenger Autocar on the Pacific coast will be fifteen hundred and fifty dollars. This reliable and handsome automobile will be made identically the same as it is now, with its ample power, perfect balance, chainless drive, luxurious design, complete accessibility and other features, for the entire year of 1905.

Mrs. "Ned" Dimond is deriving much enjoyment from her handsome and speedy little Autocar runabout. Mrs. Miles T. Baird, one of the most expert chauffeurs on the coast, has returned to the city after a short absence and as usual is seen daily at the steering gear of her trustworthy Autocar. Harold Plummer of the University of California was seen Sunday touring about in his Autocar with a party of friends. "It is the greatest machine in the world for doctors," is the compliment Dr. Reinhardt of the University of California gives the Autocar runabout. Dr. Reinhardt has had his runabout for quite a while and uses it for both business and pleasure. Dr. H. L. Levinson of this city is another one of the medical profession who thinks very highly of the Autocar runabout and has been running about town every day since becoming the possessor of the motor car.

Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Middleton, accompanied by Dr. W. S. Thorne, Senator Felton and Miss H. B. Folks, left last week for a trip to the World's Fair and the East. Mrs. Middleton is one of our most enthusiastic chauffeuses and expects to do some touring in an Autocar while in the East.

W. W. Van Arsdale has taken up the sport of motoring and has learned to handle his Autocar with proficiency.

The Geo. P. Moore Co. has received notice from the Energine Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, to hold five cases of Energine for Barney Oldfield, stating that Oldfield is to race at the principal towns on the coast in the near future. This practically settles the point that Barney Oldfield is to pay us a visit, and the fact that the invincible driver uses Energine exclusively says much for that product. The Geo. P. Moore Co. states that it has a carload en route, and the company expects its arrival within the next fifteen days.

The Rambler Agency will receive its first carload of 1905 touring cars within the next few days. These cars have the new side door entrance and will sell at fifteen hundred dollars. Mr. Jacobs reports a large number of advance orders.

James L. Flood, who made a trip some weeks since to Los Angeles in his 24 h. p. Pope-Toledo touring car, carrying four heavy people, canopy top and considerable luggage, reports that his actual running time was thirty-five minutes and fifteen seconds and no attempt was made at record breaking.

The new model L Pope-Toledo touring car has just arrived in the city and is on exhibition at the garage of the Pope-Toledo Touring Car Company, 134-148 Golden Gate avenue. This machine is an exact duplicate of the one driven in the Vanderbilt three hundred mile cup race and finished third in this great event.

The Pope Motor Car Company is bidding somewhat for foreign trade and has just shipped to the Paris Exhibition of Automobiles a complete variety of Pope-Toledo cars, including 20, 24, 40, 50 and 60 h. p. cars. They are certain that no finer display of motor cars will be made by any foreign manufacturers than the regular stock model Pope-Toledos. —The Chauffeur.

The Last Hope

The mystery surrounding the fate of the son of Louis XVI has furnished an unending theme for romance. Did the child die in the Temple prison and find rest in an unmarked grave, or was he rescued by friends? Was the imperfection of the identification of the little body the careless indifference of the Revolutionists or part of a deep laid plan of friends? If the rescue were accomplished, did the child die a natural death or was he spirited away to some foreign country to grow up in ignorance of his origin? Was he eventually a Canadian peasant, a German shoemaker, a Swiss clockmaker or an American citizen? As far as evidence can be produced, he might have become any one or none of these. He simply dropped out of positive knowledge. Henry Seton Merriman selected for the hero of his last novel, "The Last Hope," a young man who is serving as mate of an English vessel. He is the son of a waif rescued from the apparent wreck of a French fishing smack with a woman who called herself his mother but whom the child refused to address as such. He was called Loo Barebone, which may or may not have been Louis Bourbon; he lived, married and died in an English village, leaving a son who inherited his name, and the unmistakable characteristics of a French aristocrat, in spite of his mother's having been English. In the middle of the last century, when events in France were evidently shaping themselves for another political upheaval, this second Loo Barebone was sought out by the heads of the Royalist faction with a view to placing him on the throne, and the interest of the romance is centred in the uncertainty of his identity. The waif who was picked up in the channel never spoke, as child or man, of his past life, and before his death he destroyed all the papers in his possession. A locket containing a miniature of a woman was practically the only relic preserved. Did it contain a portrait of his mother, or was some other substituted in order to mislead suspicion should he fall into the hands of an enemy? Was he a royal child of legitimate birth or the offspring of some passing fancy? Could he have told these things himself? And the Royalist party—did they really care whether this English mate was the grandson of their royal house, or would they have been satisfied with any plausible figurehead which would have restored them to power? Had this Pretender been presented to the Duchess d'Angoulême, the sister of the vanished Dauphin, would she have recognized him, or would she have denied him as she did other claimants? Was she honest in her denials, or was she governed by her own interests? Who can tell? And as to the young Loo Rarebone himself, if the girl he loved would have accepted him, all the thrones in the world would have held no attractions, and she again, if she could have been certain that he was not destined for the high place, would have kept him at her side. It is just this elusive uncertainty which makes the charm of the narrative, for of course politically the sequel is a matter of history. When the upheaval came it was not the Napoleon III., not Loo Barebone, who ascended the throne of France. Was it for better or worse? Again the question. It intrudes itself into every situation. How much is sincere, how much only a manner of speech with a loophole of escape? The English banker, John Turner, with an eye to stability and the interests of his clients, does not make so favorable an impression as Larvis Lorry of "A Tale of Two Cities," nor is it meant that he should. Sentiment has no part with him unless as an aid to business. The decayed splendor of the de Gemosacs, the Chantonays, and the other Royalist families, with their dilapidated mansions and the relics of grandeur beside their necessary economy of candles and such small necessities, figure largely. This is one of the books which should command a longer lease of life than the majority. It was a master hand that held the pen, and the interest and mystery are sustained to the last word. Charles Scribner's Sons.

A Tale of Mystery

William Le Queux's latest novel, "The Closed Book," is decidedly the best story which has yet come from his pen. The hero of the tale is an English novelist long resident in Italy, an antiquary especially interested in ancient manuscripts. Having purchased a very valuable old Arnouldus, the transaction is barely completed before the disposer repents of the sale and desires to get it once more into his own possession, giving as an excuse that there will be only misfortune as a result of ownership. Allan Kennedy has no intention of surrendering his treasure for so flimsy a pretext, and in spite of warnings and entreaties he keeps, or rather, tries to keep his purchase. In examining it he discovers, what is not at all uncommon, that the blank vellum leaves at the back are covered with writing, which proves to be a record inscribed not in Latin but in early English, written not in Italy but in England, by one Godfrey Lovel, who had passed an adventurous life as courtier, soldier and monk, in the course of which he had become possessed of valuable secrets which he was equally unwilling to reveal or to die without leaving some clue, however complicated, for the recovery of the valuables of which he was the sole custodian. This Lovel had been in the service of the famous or infamous Lucretia Borgia, who, according to his story, was not the vile murderess of history, but the innocent victim of her father and brother, kept under their control by circumstances. To Lovel she had intrusted her most valuable jewels as well as a portion of the secret poison and its antidote, and he was also the last survivor of the three who secreted the greater part of the treasure of the Abbey of Croyland before it was seized and destroyed. Here were two valuable secrets, in addition to the rare volume itself, to pass into the hands of a stranger. The warnings concerning the dangers and misfortunes which would follow possession of the volume found speedy fulfillment, for first Allan Kennedy became suddenly and mysteriously ill while poring over the ancient record, and next, it was stolen from him, hurried out of the country, to be discovered as a portion of the hand luggage of an old woman journeying from France to England, traced to a mysterious dwelling in one of the poorer streets of London, recovered as mysteriously as it was lost, and soon found to be the centre around which some plot was woven. Involved in it were an English Duke and his daughter, an unfrocked Italian monk, a dealer in antiques, and men and women of every grade of social position between these two extremes. There are two separate expeditions after buried treasure, a few daring burglaries and some sudden and mysterious deaths, and through it all, a love-story meanders. There is more good meat in this volume than generally falls to the share of two or three modern tales, and people who like tales of mystery in which they cannot guess the denouement as soon as all the characters are on the board will find "The Closed Book" worth their attention. As to the presentment of Lucretia Borgia as the unfortunate victim of her evil relatives, it is only a short while ago since such a theory was put forth in all seriousness by an Italian professor of some distinction. Published by the Smart Set Company.

Susan Clegg

Susan Clegg's monologues were delivered chiefly over the back fence, on the opposite side of which her friend and neighbor, Mrs. Lathrop, chewed red clover blossoms and listened. It was rarely that she had the opportunity of making a remark on her own account, for Susan had a way of bringing the conversation to an abrupt end as soon as she had had her say and betaking herself to the house where she found plenty to occupy herself with. For Susan Clegg is not the type of village gossip out at elbow and down at heel and whose tongue is the only part of the household machinery which goes on steadily. On the contrary, she was a notable housekeeper, but had been kept house-bound for twenty-five years, ever since her early girlhood, by the care of a bedridden and paralytic old father who was an exacting taskmaster. The back fence visiting had begun naturally enough, in the need for advice which a young girl would feel under the circumstances, but Susan must have speedily outgrown any assistance that she could have derived from that quarter. She is unconventional and outspoken to a degree, and when she decides to do anything, whether it be to marry, to adopt a child, to search out her long lost relatives, she loses no time about getting to work. There is no patient waiting for something to turn up in her composition, and she has no hesitation about hurrying Providence a bit when she thinks it time for something to happen. She is blessed with plenty of common sense and is well aware of it, but occasionally it is a little too practical. And after all, she says only what others have thought but lacked the courage to put into words. Take, for example, the death of her father, after all those years of helplessness and waiting on: "I'm free to confess 't I haven't cried anywhere near 's much 's I looked to. My feelings has been pretty agreeable, take it all in all, 'n I'd be a born fool 'f I didn't take solid comfort sleepin' nights, 'n I never was a fool — never was 'n' never will be."

"Count your marcies" has been the keynote of many a character sketch. Susan also counts hers, though not after the regulation method. "There never was a truer sayin' 'n' the one 't things goes by contraries. Here I've been figgerin' on bein' so happy married, 'n' instid o' that I find myself missin' father every few minutes. There was lots o' good about father, particular when he was asleep. I'd got so used to his stayin' where I put him 't I don't know's I ever e'd get used to a man 's could get about. 'F I wanted to talk, father was always there to listen, 'n' 'f he wanted to talk I e'd always go down stairs. He didn't never have but one button to keep sewed on 'n' no stock-ings to darn a tall."

Again when the minister and his wife were packed off for a vacation and their thirteen olive branches, typical clerical offspring, were divided round among the villagers as far as they would go, both Susan Clegg and Mrs. Lathrop were amongst the fortunate few who drew blanks in the lottery by which the assignment was made. "We'd better be gettin' to bed," says this philosopher, "'n' thankin' our merciful Father 't we haven't got none o' the minister's children, 'n' that's a prayer 's not many e'n put up this night."

Susan Clegg is a delightfully original character. Anna Warner assures us that neither the lady nor the episodes are transcripts from life, but it is just because she is so genuine and human that she has taken such a hold on readers. Each and every one of us knows some one who might be developed into a Susan, and whisper it low, when we are alone by ourselves, don't we listen to private monologues from our other selves which we wouldn't repeat out loud for worlds? There are five stories embodied in the volume, four of which have appeared in the Century, and the fifth, "The Minister's Vacation," here for the first time. Susan Clegg ought to become as well known as David Harum, Eben Holden and Mrs. Wiggs. What a revolution she would raise in the Cabbage Patch. The lackadaisical Miss Stacy would be all the better for a touch of her brisk tongue. The name of the author of these tales, Anna Warner, is familiar, but the character of her work is sufficient to prevent confusion with the older writer of "Queechy" and "Wide, Wide World" fame. Published by Little, Brown & Company, Boston.

Ideas in Common

When Death lays his iron hand upon a mortal's power to bore, his virtues rise and sit upon his corpse. That is the secret of the superstition that makes us think kindly of the dead.—Gertrude Atherton, "Rulers of Kings."

But we have all a chance of meeting with some pity, some tenderness, some charity when we are dead; it is the living only who cannot be forgiven—the living only from whom men's indulgence and reverence are held off, like the rain by the hard east wind. While the heart beats, bruise it—it is your only opportunity; while the eye can still turn toward you with moist, timid entreaty freeze it with an icy, unanswering gaze; while the ear, that delicate messenger to the inmost sanctuary of the soul, can still take in the tones of kindness, put it off with hard civility, or sneering compliment, or envious affectation of indifference; while the creative brain can still throb with the sense of injustice, with the yearning for brotherly recognition—make haste—oppress it with your ill-considered judgments, your trivial comparisons, your careless misrepresentations. The heart will by-and-by—ubi saeva indignatio ulterius cor lacerat nequit; the eye will cease to entreat; the ear will be deaf; the brain will have

Then your charitable speeches may find vent; then you may remember and pity the toil and the struggle and the failure; then you may give due honor to the work achieved; then you may find extenuation for error and may consent to bury them.—George Eliot—"The Lifted Veil."

There is reason to suspect that Shakespeare never went hungry, else he wouldn't have said, "Sweet are the uses of adversity." They're not sweet; they're damnably bitter. A man come forth of the winepress with bones unbroken and insight sharpened to the puncturing point; but his capacity for evil will be increased by just so much.—Francis Lynde—"The Givers."

There is no villainy, no scoundrelism, no baseness conceivable that isn't excused by want of money. The man who has never felt the perspiration come out on his forehead in asking himself how he is going to keep his body and soul together has no right to an opinion on the greatest question of the day.—George Gissing—"In the Year of Jubilee."

It is all very fine to talk about tramps and morality. Six hours of police surveillance (such as I have had) or one brutal rejection from an inn door changes your views upon the subject like a course of lectures. As long as you are in the upper regions with all the world bowing to you as you go, social arrangements have a very handsome appearance; but once get under the wheels, and you wish society were at the devil. I will give most respectable men a fortnight of such a life, and then I will offer them twopenny for what remains of their morality.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Carry your candle as straight as you can, but never go prowling back into dark closets to look after mischief you haven't done. Clear fidget is the worst thing you can give in to. It'll come back at times when you can't satisfy yourself. It's a way you'll get into and it'll follow you up. It is an awful habit.—A. D. T. Whitney—"Patience Strong's Outing."

No man is so merciless as he who, under a strong self-delusion, confounds his antipathies with his duties.—Macaulay—"The Searchlight."

NOT X BUT Y

When Professor Moses Stuart Phelps was a student at New Haven, he one morning took a walk with Professor Newton, the mathematician. Newton, according to his usual habit, began the discussion of an abstruse problem. As he went deeper and deeper, Phelps's mind wandered farther and farther from what was being said. At last, his attention was recalled by his companion's remark, "Which, you see, gives us 'x,'" "Does it?" asked Phelps, thinking that, in common politeness, he ought to say something.

"Why, doesn't it?" excitedly exclaimed the professor, alarmed at the possibility that a flaw had been detected in his calculations. Quickly his mind ran back over his work. There had, indeed, been a mistake.

"You are right, Mr. Phelps; you are right!" he shouted. "It doesn't give us 'x'; it gives us 'y.'"

From that hour, he looked upon Professor Phelps as a mathematical prodigy. He was the first man who had ever caught the professor tripping.

A Cold Storage Campaign

The campaign of 1904 is over but the reaction is slight. Very few of us became excited over it. It was as insipid as circus lemonade or one of Mr. Fitch's polite satires on a smart set foible. Colorless and spiritless was the campaign from beginning to end, because everybody felt that as this is not an age of miracles only one thing could happen. Mr. Roosevelt was a great disappointment. His personality being the only issue, he was expected to be characteristic, but it has been demonstrated that he hasn't the courage of his strenuosity. For campaign purposes he was emphatically un-Rooseveltian. Immediately after his nomination he put the soft pedal on his personality and kept it there. The quietude of the man during the campaign was positively theatric in its artificiality. He was himself only once and that was when he took a swat at Judge Parker for indulging in personalities. At all other times he was in a shell; and how he must have suffered while holding his tongue with both hands and keeping an eye on the finger of warning behind which loomed the imposing figure of that eminent task-master, Elihu Root. With the brakes on Roosevelt's impetuosity, and Mr. Parker solemnly and stolidly engaged in sustaining the dignity of the bench, there was never enough excitement in the funereal campaign to start a glow. It was deadly dull, a depressing, undiverting, beastly bore. Let us earnestly hope for never such another.

The Pulpit Awakened

The Church was somewhat slow in directing its pulpit thunder against the Schmitz Administration, but now it is making up for lost time. The complaisance of the pulpit in the last few years was astonishing. Some of our most belligerent ministers viewed the progress of graft without blinking an eye or uttering the faintest protest. Time and again it was suggested in Town Talk that our clergymen should drop orthodoxy for awhile, and take note of our unregenerate officials who were so actively engaged in corrupting the youth of the city and spreading demoralization throughout the community. But not one of the pious polemist lifted a voice even to sorrowfully lament the shame of the city. The press alone and single-handed conducted the crusade against corruption. And the press of San Francisco being somewhat in disfavor, for reasons upon which it is not necessary to dilate, the grafters, with the boldness characteristic of the species, scoffed at the critics journalistic, and appealed to all the enemies of their assailants to witness that they were the victims of cruel misrepresentation. And with such show of sincerity did they pose as martyrs of a malevolent press, that editorial castigations seemed to have little effect until a Grand Jury instituted an investigation that uncovered facts and figures. It was then that public sentiment was aroused, and a little later came the belated awakening of the pulpit. Well, better late than never. With the preachers echoing the protests of the press and the Grand Jury prosecuting its investigations, Mr. Schmitz and his satellites may no longer pretend to believe that they are being brutally hounded without reason by the bad editors.

The Japanese to Instruct Us

Some weeks ago Town Talk called attention to the fact that the Japanese had revolutionized field hospital methods, completely solving the problem of safeguarding soldiers from the diseases that are usually more destructive than the weapons of the enemy. Now we learn that the Army General Staff at Washington has taken note of the surprising results achieved by the Mikado's medical men, and has decided to despatch surgeons of the regular army to observe the operations of the field hospital service in Manchuria. It is of great importance that the methods of the enterprising heathen should be studied with great zeal, for, as was demonstrated during our brief experience in the war with Spain, the dangers most to be dreaded in such struggles are those of the camp rather than of the battlefield. In that war, from April until October, 1898, we lost three hundred and forty-five men from wounds received in action, and twenty-five hundred and sixty-five from causes other than bullets or cannon balls.

Rapid Transit

After suffering many years from congested traffic, New York is now in a jubilant mood over the successful operation of its Rapid Transit Subway which handles six hundred thousand people a day. It has not yet awakened to the realization that it has simply come into possession of the ordinary abominations of a subterranean transit system with which the people of London and Paris have been familiar for many years. However the subway is a magnificent engineering achievement, and it relieves many discomforts of travel that were the cause of much vexation in New York, where the combined elevated and surface lines were woefully incapable of handling the crowds in the rush hours. The demand for rapid transit is growing more insistent every day in several of the large cities of this country, and San Francisco is one in which congested traffic is rapidly assuming proportions that before long will make the problem which New York has just solved one of serious moment. Surface lines in Market street are becoming as inadequate as those of Broadway, and at the rate at which the business and population of this city are growing we cannot afford to delay much longer the question that is promising to become one of vital importance.

Zangwill's Romantic Mission

The fiction habit is so strong in Israel Zangwill that he is given to romancing with the prosaic affairs of everyday life. He recently came to this country with a message to American Hebrews, and through it he is getting a great deal of advertising. The message is from the British Government which would like very much to have a tract of land in East Africa, four hundred miles square, civilized by the Jews, and Zangwill is authorized to give it away. "For nineteen hundred years," he says, "my people have not had a government of their own, and consequently they have lost the faculty of self-government." Mr. Zangwill does not know what he is talking about. His people take a very active interest in the politics of this country, and they know a great deal about self-government. He probably has never heard of Abe Ruef, the power behind the throne in the Far West, but now that he is in America he will probably learn something of the statesmanship of that distinguished leader of men before long. Meanwhile he might reflect with profit on the history of Europe, for he would then recall the fact that there was once a statesman named Disraeli, who ruled Great Britain for years. It might also occur to him that the destinies of Europe are today largely in the hands of the Rothschilds. Mr. Zangwill may get a lot of free advertising in this country but there is not much likelihood of his persuading many of his co-religionists to emigrate to Africa just for the pleasure of trading among themselves. They can do a much better business in this country with less exertion than they would be called upon to employ in a Hebrew colony under British rule.

The Other Side

The case of a young man held in custody for several months in New York on a charge of criminal assault, advised to plead guilty in order to obtain a lighter sentence, and then discharged because of the confession of perjury on the part of the complainant, has called the attention of the metropolitan newspapers to the frequency with which complaints are sworn to against men hitherto regarded as respectable, the ease with which convictions are secured, and lives blasted, and the complete ignoring of the possibility that the girls are lying, either out of pure wantonness, to shield some other person, or for spite. The same thing is of frequent occurrence on this coast and seems to be a favorite method of "getting even" on a stepfather whose presence is unwelcome. Any evil-minded girl (and some are depraved enough at twelve years of age) can lodge a complaint, and it is immediately taken for granted that she has been abused and a mob is ready to seize a rope and do execution without investigation. No inquiry as to motive or previous character of the girl is ever made. It is sufficient that she shall tell a plausible story. The idea of protection to female virtue is so firmly rooted that the virtue is taken for granted whether there is any to protect or not. In some States laws to regulate the "age of consent" have been proposed, so rigid that had they been passed they would have practically prohibited marriage. There is something to be said for the other side. No one will be apt to plead for mercy for the wretches who debauch young girls, but when girls are found loitering about questionable places and attracting attention to themselves they are not apt to require a great amount of persuasion. It will be safe to assume that they know what they are about. Instead of giving publicity to their complaints, condemning men unheard on their simple say-so, depriving them of fair name and respectable employment, and bringing grief and misery on their families, it would be well to keep these matters strictly quiet until some investigation has been made as to the previous character and probabilities on both sides. A man's reputation in the community where he lives is worth something to him. Once taken it cannot be restored; while the class of so-called innocent young girls who figure as complainants rarely have much to lose.

The announcement of the speedy publication of "The Suppressed Poems of Alfred Tennyson" leads the literary editor of Munsey's to raise an outcry against the indecency of the greedy ghoulishness which causes relatives, friends and publishers to resurrect every scrap of writing as soon as a person of any prominence is dead, and turn it into ready cash. The natural conclusion would be that when a writer has reached maturity and elects to suppress his first crude and unsatisfactory work he should be permitted to do so and that the least his surviving friends are bound to do for him is to abide by his judgment. It is bad enough in all conscience when the literary remains of dead authors are resurrected and dragged forth into the market place, but there is even a more reprehensible trick, and that is the republication, during the author's lifetime, of such productions as are unprotected by copyright, advertising them as new works, and complacently pocketing receipts, since the rightful owner is in no position to do more than protest. The late Henry Seton Merriman (Hugh Stowell Scott) had occasion to make public announcement, with reference to two of his books, that they were not, as the publishers gave forth, new books, but some of his earliest work which he had no desire to see perpetuated and had refused to republish. When Frances Hodgson Burnett came into prominence she was obliged, in self-defense, to collect a number of the short stories which appeared in Peterson's and other old periodicals, in order to prevent them from being issued under false pretenses by catch-penny publishers. Critics who issue diatribes against authors who bring out in book form their fugitive offerings lose sight of the fact that if they do not some one else will. Their reputations will suffer as much, if not more, and their pockets be none the heavier. It used to be imagined that artists of any description were poor business men, but experience would seem to teach us that whatever authors themselves may be, their relatives are a canny lot. The Stevensons and the Carlyles, for example, appear to have discovered an inexhaustible mine in the dead past and the Tennysons are giving evidence of the same sort of thrift. Emerson and Thoreau will continue to bring grist to the mill as long as any one who ever saw either of them is able to wield pen or pencil, and though Edgar Allen Poe suffered from lack of necessities, the aggregate of the sums earned by those thrifty ones who have made money out of their scribbling concerning him would mount to a respectable fortune. No doubt it would shock the sensibilities of surviving friends and relatives if one were to suggest that they charge an admission for the privilege of "viewing the remains."

That Arizona Outrage

At intervals for the past few weeks the newspapers have given over a goodly proportion of their space to the discussion of an "outrage" in the matter of the adoption of a number of children who were taken by the Sisters in charge of a New York institution and placed in the care of Mexican families residing in Arizona, who had expressed a willingness to rear them, and had given reasonable evidence of their moral fitness. As far as can be learned from the accounts of the riot which was all but precipitated, the objection to the foster parents was purely a matter of race and religion. It suddenly occurred to a number of "white" people that the Mexicans and Spaniards were not suitable guardians for "white" children and that some national calamity would follow if they were brought up in the Catholic faith. The children were not shipped haphazard nor sent, tagged, by express, to trust to luck in the matter of being met by those who had agreed to assume the duty of caring for them, but made the trip as the result of an official circular, attended by several of the Sisters as well as a medical man, and not only was there further investigation of fitness, but it was the intention of those in charge to remain for some weeks in the vicinity in order to observe for themselves the treatment accorded to the waifs. But the self-appointed "good people" took a hand, gathered up the children, returned them to the Sisters, or reapportioned them to their own liking, and made wholesale threats of personal violence if there were any demurrer to their dictates. Though Mexican Catholic families in poor financial circumstances may not be ideal guardians for children when there is a whole world to make choice from, there is another side to the shield, and that demands at least a passing glance. These children are either destitute orphans with no friends or relatives to take any interest whatever in what becomes of them, or they are abandoned waifs whose parents are desirous of getting rid of them and all trace of their existence. The institution from which they were taken is a charitable one and the demands on its accommodation and funds are so great that, apart from the evils of institutional raising, there is neither room to accommodate inmates for an indefinite period nor money for their support. The children are sent out for adoption, and in all likelihood the reason why they were sent into the Southwest in this instance is because the capacity of the environment of New York city for absorbing homeless waifs has been exhausted. The Spanish-Americans have their faults, but they are not cruel or unkind to children. They may not prize book-learning to the extent of the pious New Englander, and baths may be impressionistic and occasional. The fiesta will come more frequently than the prayer-meeting, and chile con carne and frijoles take the place of the orthodox codfish and pork and beans. But no child given over to the guardianship of a Mexican family will know the horrors of child labor as exemplified by the "bound boys" and the "bound girls" of the pious, God-fearing East. They will not be reminded at every step that they are dependent, nor invited, in every breath, to pray for their kind protectors. And if they learn less of penurious penny-piling, at least they will enjoy a care-free childhood.

Spiritualistic Frauds

Rev. Dr. Funk has been contributing to one of the New York papers articles in which he has attempted to expose the fraudulent character of spiritualistic manifestations. If those who are the victims of this fakery were open to conviction by argument or proof, Dr. Funk, as well as the innumerable caravan of his predecessors, would have some hope of success, but as the very first demand which is made of the "inquirer" is to cast aside all doubt, to assume a passive state of mind, and to agree not to apply common sense or reason to the solution of any mystery presented, no matter what it may be, there is absolutely no loophole left for the insertion of a ray of light to the understanding. Time and again mediums have been arrested and their trials for fraud have taken place in broad daylight, in open court, and the proceedings published at length in the newspapers. The cabinet tricks, spirit photographs and materializations have all been exposed and accomplices have made confessions, but it is all to no purpose. Believers who are driven to admit the fakery in the case in question and a dozen others before it will still cling to their faith in the medium whom they patronize, and even though it were possible to convict the vast army of clairvoyants, trance mediums, and seeresses generally, still they would assert that "there is something in it." Show conclusively that the freemasonry of craft, the long arm of coincidence, quick wittedness, and a vagueness and comprehensive generality of diction are all there is to some revelation of the past or present, and you will get an admission that it may be so, but still —. People who are willing to surrender their reasoning faculties — such as they are blessed with — to accept any explanation offered them, and pay fat sums to some irresponsible stranger to do their thinking for them will always be the victims of Dowies and Teeds and Diss-de-Barrs. "We can encourage the timid, restrain the bold, punish the wicked, but for the weak there is no help." Once a belief in any of this charlatanry takes hold, the task of undermining it must be performed over and over again. Let all the paraphernalia of humbuggery be exposed and something new will be invented. Even though the trade catalogues be secured, with cuts illustrating the various articles and diagrams showing their manipulation, still it is the same. There are few who escape the net. Once in a long while the mistake is made of taking an interested spectator with an open mind for a convert, and some indiscretion on the part of the materialized spook will "give away the game," but as a rule, the dupes are as hopeless as though they were insane. On this one topic their minds resemble that of the good old lady who gave her conclusion on some matter of discussion as "Sometimes I think — and then again, I don't know." It is as much a waste of energy to expose Spiritualistic frauds as it is to talk color to the blind or sound to the deaf.

Personal Journalism

BY THEODORE BONNET.

The protest against personal journalism is perennial. It is almost as old as the printing press. It was uttered in the days of Addison and Swift, and it was insisted upon most unreasonably about the time that Horace Greeley complained that libel suits were among the annoyances of editorial life, and that he was never exempt from those infestations.

To suffer from publicity has long been the tax which people of prominence pay to the public; yet there are many people who crave distinction even though it be merely social. And few there are who reflect that personal journalism as it is practiced today is the logical concomitant of the modern craze for notoriety. It has come to pass that love of privacy has perished in the land. The shrinking violet personality has gone out of fashion. Everybody is eager to be seen and known and talked of by everybody. Society revels in the banal pleasures of the limelight. Not to have your name in the paper every other day, and your picture flashed at least once a month, is to be out of the world, a mere nonentity, concerning whom there is not the slightest interest. To enter properly into the competition for publicity one must employ a press-agent, and have every intimate fact touching one's personality naked and shameless under the public eye. The press-agent has become a well recognized functionary of the notorious elect. Writers of social gush are invited to the teas of the so-called exclusives, those Rookeries of Rumors presided over by the three nymphs, Curiosity, Talkativeness and Censoriousness, for no other purpose than to enable them to procure material for publication. Mode and fashion have ever extenuated the most absurd practices. As Mr. Whitelaw Reid said, some time ago, in his incisive indictment of present-day evils and follies, "Gregariousness and glare are the irredeemably vulgar notes of it all."

Undoubtedly personal journalism has been carried to reprehensible extremes. Newspapers intrude into the sacred realm of purely domestic concerns for sensational effect, and without the slightest suggestion of salutary purpose. In the fretful race of competition there has been a tendency to regard all things as legitimate objects of the remorseless newsgatherer's inquiry. But to reform newspaper ethics there must be reform of human nature itself, or at least the restoration of saner views of life and of our relations to it.

People who are in the public eye by their own effort are legitimate subjects of comment and discussion. The society matron who seeks to keep alive her prestige by aiding and abetting the publication of the trivial happenings of her daily routine, becomes in time the object of public interest, and as she invited it she cannot expect the newspapers to favor her by giving publicity only to such news of her as she considers pleasant. She is a public character of her own creation, and there is a fiction in newspaper offices that the press is under a sacred obligation to the public to disseminate news of general interest; and the importance of an item of news is in proportion to the prominence of the person it concerns. It is to General Interest, by the way, that many of the indiscretions of the press may be attributed. General Interest is the mentor of every managing editor. He is consulted about every item of news. It is unfortunate that he is a vulgarian of the lowest type, for the press is governed by him, caters to him and propitiates him at every turn. His decrees are sometimes surreptitiously evaded for beneficent reasons, but he is usually alert, and ever insistent that public curiosity be satisfied.

It may be absurd to palliate the sins of personal journalism on the score of society's craze for publicity, for the press is under no obligation to indulge the follies of the fashionable herd. It is to the discredit of the press that the most dignified and influential journals, instead of satirizing those follies and seeking to discourage the vulgar quest of glare, cater to the immodesty of their readers and appeal to their vanity with gush and drivel. Perhaps the fashionable herd would soon become less active in the promotion of personal publicity, and personal journalism would be conducted on a more dignified basis, if it were generally understood that the society belle who makes of her wedding ceremony a spectacular show, and exhibits her presents and her lingerie to the Sunday Supper reporter for exploitation, is not far removed from the category of the footlight favorite or the lady novelist who employs a press-agent for advertising purposes.

Those distinguished society people who are continually rushing into print on the slightest provocation are quick to complain of the insolence of the press, and we hear a great deal of cant from them about the preposterous presumption of the exponents of personal journalism, whenever one of their own set achieves unpleasant notoriety. Personal journalism is deplored only when it wounds the sensibilities of the high and mighty. The smug plutocrat who writhes under stinging criticisms of his financial methods is its mortal foe, and the politicians aggrieved of the press for the exposure of their schemes of spoliation howl against personal abuse, and demand the enactment of legislation in restraint thereof. What dull and tame newspapers there would be were personal journalism taboo! When Thomas Jefferson remarked that he would rather live in a country with newspapers and without a government than in a country with a government and without newspapers, his conception of a newspaper was not one that eschewed personalities. He knew that a government in a country without newspapers would be without restraint, and that newspapers insure watchfulness and moderation.

The Life of the Feelings

BY HARRY COWELL.

Life, that strange indefinable thing possessed of you and me and the rest of us above ground, is, as I have said before, and others before me, a little light between two darknesses—a little light that men love; even those whose deeds are evil. A step or two in any direction brings the wisest of us to a halt before mysteries unfathomable. Midmost of things, the inevitable "I"; and round about me a few so-called facts of more or less familiar aspect—known faces of friends or enemies; and beyond that the Great Unknown, an indistinguishable multitude in black dominoes and masks, piquing curiosity, inspiring awe. Turn where we will in quest of knowledge and sooner or later the road leads to the modest "I know not" of the learned apostle of modern science. All knowledge ends in agnosticism.

No power—apparent or real—of self-motion, but a capacity for feeling, is the mark of life. To feel is to live; to feel intensely is to live much; to feel finely, to live well. The wise man's lust of life causes him to covet no mere length of days, but rather quantity and quality of emotions, the "quickened, multiplied consciousness" of Walter Pater. We know well, you and I, that the "color of life is red," as saith the son of the wine merchant, and pity him of pale passions and anaemic morals. Ours is the true life, the life of the feelings.

All life that is not one with nothingness is not only a "permanent possibility of sensation," but sensation itself; and were one to ask, "Is there any life but that of the feelings?" the answer would needs be, No; yet the lover and the artist and their kind seem to lead a life more characterized by feeling than that of other men. The intellectual life is by no means without its emotion; it, too, has been known to yield a wild joy, though not the wildest. That accompanies activities of the heart rather than those of the head. Not, again, that the highest heart activities are to be carried on without the help of the topmost member.

Now, because in every household the wide world over, sorrow is as common as table salt; and because only in Nowhere is ugliness a white blackbird, and noise unknown; many a fine man, smarting all over, has been for a sad mad moment envious of the doom of those who sit at the great Human Comedy indifferent spectators, or, when their turn comes to go on the stage, play their parts mechanically, without emotion. More than once "salt tears and strange to shed" have been sweetened by the reflection: "I am nor stick nor stone which suffer not. Thank God I am capable of a great grief, not as those who get over things." Not infrequently, indeed, consequent upon such thoughts as these, is a state of mind that is almost one with happiness. "What is the use," asks one in pain, "of thus refining the flesh, in a rough world? Wherefore culture—this quickening of eye and ear and heart that so increases one's capacity for enjoyment, when it of necessity increases pari passu one's capacity for sorrow? Better a thick-skinned boor than a sensitive born and made, such as I!" Now, the desire of the speaker, if I have heard the silences aright, is not to be a boor callous of hand and heart, but rather to inform you, who may perchance have overlooked the flattering fact, that he is far other.

But here comes Miss Protest, and, by the Sea-Born, right pretty she looks in her Sunday best. "Great grief, sir, like great happiness, is self-forgetful," she is saying, frowning my frankness down, patting humanity on the back. Nay, she is but speaking for herself, as she is at pains to assure me. A neat sentence, by Flaubert. I could hardly have said it better myself, had I been in the humor for sophistication, for telling the tenth part of a truth. Great grief soon becomes a memory, and he who remembers his grief and forgets himself lives somewhere west of the moon. Here egotism is as common as grief itself.

But, as Ben Jonson says, "Beauty, like Sorrow, dwelleth everywhere"; and if only tear-washed eyes see her with perfect charity, and know the utmost sweet of her face, who would grudge the price of tears? A glimpse of her is worth all the trouble to which man is born. Likewise, to him who leads the life of the feelings, one day of love long waited for offsets, and more than offsets, the wistful years.

Beauty and love aside, however—the beauty of art as well as that of nature; and the world is still full of all manner of moving sights and sounds and situations; strange things to excite one's wonder; mysteries to make one curious; incongruities whereat to smile through and through; things pathetic whereat to weep. That old curmudgeon there, hobbling across the street, the delight and terror of the gamins—no pleasant sight surely is he. Well, once his step was light with love, and a fair woman went white and red at his coming and red and white at his going—or, mayhap, green; for he—would you believe it?—was handsomest of a whole city, and where he went were other women. But see, there comes a boy with a future in his face; and what a world it is for boys with futures in their faces! If you go down town and come back without being moved, my word for it, 'tis not the fault of the street.

Guy de Maupassant has a tale—put into the mouth of an old marquis—of a mighty hunter who, having at length brought it to bay, "quietly" strangles with his own hands a great ghostly wolf responsible for the death of his beloved brother. And the master makes a lady who had been listening declare, "in a little soft voice: 'All the same, it is fine to have passions like that.'" Well, that lady, as it seems to me, is not confined to France. I have met her, if I mistake not, in America and elsewhere. You, too, have heard her—have you not?—making like comments at the close of stirring stories, in that "little soft voice" of hers.

That the blind should not be moved through the eyes; nor the deaf through the ears; nor the brainless through the understanding, is not to be wondered at; but that many who seem to see much and hear much and know much should feel little or not at all, is an anomaly, and all the more anomalous the more one contemplates it. After all, do they really see and hear and know, who do not feel? No amount of evidence in favor of an affirmative answer—and there is much—will ever dispel my doubts. Who feel intensely alone see and hear and know.

Quatrains

BY MABEL PORTER PITTS.

Live not within the past; compute the cost
Then burn, without regret, the bridges crossed.
Sweet yesterday! A diamond past all price
That slipped from out its setting and is lost.

What one had plucked the rose if he had seen
The thorns concealed beneath its tender green?
What tears were saved if forecast could be made —
Tears would be saved, but lost the joys between.

Hold no regret; what has been done, is done,
Nor all the waters that to oceans run
Shall blot the folly from a single act
O'erfraught with consequences we would shun.

Quench not the flame because you feel the fire;
Fear not to voice in prayer today's desire
Because the answered prayer of yesterday
Exposed the dross to which you would aspire.

Be not too proud in virtue yet untried,
Chance may discover flaws that good deeds hide,
And many a prude a wanton's heart has housed
Yet lived in virtue and in virtue died.

At the Throne of Grace

BY ROBERT MACE.

And there came to the House of Judgment a Woman, and she stood naked before God.

And God opened the Book of Life of the Woman.

And God said to the Woman, "Thy life hath not been free from stain, and thou has not kept thy body pure. Thou did'st build an altar to one of the sins I suffered, and thou did'st eat of the thing that may not be eaten. Thine idol was not of the precious substance that endures, but of flesh that dieth. Thou did'st not crave My love so much as that of the idol to whom thou resigneth."

And the Woman bowed her head in shame and made reply: "Even so did I."

And God once more opened the Book of the Life of the Woman.

And God said to the Woman: "But whilst thou followed the broad and perfumed path thou did'st eschew many of the vices of thy sex. Thou did'st adorn thy mind with beauties of an exalted and lasting character. Thou did'st call upon thy guardian angel to defend thee against the insolence and wrongs of an undiscerning world. Evil thou did'st requite with good, and with wrongdoing kindness. Toward thy sex thou did'st exhibit a gracious spirit, and to him who brought thee love thou did'st not give Lust in thy turn but employed thine ingenuity in softening passions and refining pleasures."

And the Woman made answer and said, "Even so did I."

And God closed the Book of Life of the Woman and said, "Blessed are the merciful and the pure of heart. Even into heaven will I admit thee."

* * * * *

And for a brief space was there silence in the House of Judgment, and presently there came before God, a woman naked.

And God opened the Book of the Life of the Woman.

And God said to the Woman, "Thy Life hath been evil."

And the Woman made answer and said: "Thy commandment enjoining purity have I kept. No badge of shame defaced my breast."

And God said to the Woman, "And yet I say unto thee thy life hath been evil. Thou wert safeguarded against Lust, for to thee was denied some of the charms of thy sex, but thou did'st not attain to innocency. Thou did'st burn incense upon the hills, under oaks and poplars and elms. Thou did'st scorn the weak and by the giving of secret stabs thou did'st betray a base, ungenerous spirit. Thou hast a tongue that deviseth mischiefs. Thou did'st distribute poison like unto the poison of the serpent. Thou hast a froward mouth and perverse lips. The ungracious woman never retaineth honor. Thou did'st exult in malicious jibes."

And God again opened the Book of the Life of the Woman.

And God said to the Woman, "Thou did'st pride thyself on the virtue of thy body, but never sought to purify thy mind. Thou did'st scorn those who found favor in the sight of the Lord. Mine anger is kindled against thee."

And God closed the Book of the Life of the Woman and said, "Surely I will send thee into Hell. Even into Hell will I send thee."

And the Woman cried out for mercy, but her cries were unheeded.

When Teddy is Foot-Loose

The expected happened on Tuesday. It was demonstrated that the hoodoo on the Vice-Presidential office was of no importance; that a man may succeed to the Presidency through the death of the President and then be elected to the office. Mr. Roosevelt is no longer under obligations to carry out the policy of his predecessor. He is now foot-loose to formulate a policy of his own. The restraining hand of the dead has released its clutch. Let us hope that he will act throughout his Administration with wisdom and discretion, and for the best interests of all the people, with an eye on the Constitution, and deaf to the gallery. Nothing augurs better for the success of his Administration than his determination to be content with one term. It promises an indifference to the clamors of the mob and the expedients so dear to the heart of the partisan politician. The President whose highest ambition is to make creditable history and who has no fences to mend is likely to render exalted service to his country.

The Schmitz Appeal

Mayor Schmitz probably regrets now that he addressed that appeal to his friends in behalf of Mr. Ruef's candidacies for the Superior Court. The manifest indifference of his friends is suggestive of an emphatic reaction. It now appears that even a fraction of the people cannot be fooled all the time. Mayor Schmitz is getting near to the end of his rope. His influence, even among the working men, is on the wane. He is being repudiated on all sides.

Why The Saloons Were Closed

To the credit of the Schmitz Administration, be it said, saloon-keepers cautiously observed the prohibition against opening for business on election day. Usually the law is winked at, but this year nobody took a chance, the reason being, I am informed, that the saloon men feared that if they transgressed, their license would be revoked it for no other purpose than to enable Mr. Ruef to earn some big fees. The popular supposition is that Ruef and Schmitz enjoy the high esteem of the saloon-keepers, and that the mixologists are grateful to the Administration for sanctioning a wide open town. Though the supposition is not a violent one, the saloon men know that a wide-open town is quite profitable to a thrifty attorney with a pull at headquarters. They are not insensible of the fact that Mr. Ruef profits off the saloon business, and though the presumption was that the surreptitious sale of liquor on election day would provoke no moral spasms or conniption fits in the Mayor's office, the saloon men, having a keen appreciation of the cupidity of their kind friend, Mr. Ruef, preferred to obey the law; they felt that it would be cheaper than infraction thereof.

While The Committee Slumbered

Now that the campaign is over it occurs to me that there was such a thing as a Democratic State Central Committee sequestered somewhere in this broad metropolis during the past few months. Its slumbers were undisturbed throughout the campaign. Secretary Tommy Walsh woke up sporadically, gave three cheers for William Jennings Bryan, being under the impression that the latter was the party standard-bearer, and then wrapped the draperies of his couch about him again. Mr. Tim Spellacy, the chairman of the committee, had the foresight to employ a valet to tickle the soles of his feet every week, and on such occasions he would rouse himself, and go along the highways and byways assuring people that he was not McNab's man. Though he was McNab's choice for chairman he grew disgusted with the McNab Democracy shortly after he came to town. For the first week he gave Tommy Walsh a half hour every day to prove that Phelan and McNab were the intellectual giants of the Pacific Coast, and then Tommy's gush began to bore him. By the end of the second week Spellacy wanted to write a book on what he thought of McNab, Phelan and Walsh.

Mr. Redding as a Spellbinder

Mr. Redding's political speech was not all that his admirers expected. The fact is that Mr. Redding is too clever for that sort of thing. He sees the flaws in his own armor and his keen wit almost betrays him into revealing the Achilles heel to others. When he says that "President Roosevelt's reputation among statesmen abroad is extraordinary" even Democrats will agree with him. A clubman's laugh just there would have spoiled the entire evening. It is dangerous to play with such Promethean fire. Mr. Redding, however, had business in the West and the Republican national committee was glad to provide a limited train for a few clever talks. Mr. Redding did not appear in evening clothes—that would not be safe. I'm afraid that the rank and file prefer broadswords to rapiers.

"I'm surprised to hear that young Bloodleigh is going to marry Miss Newrich."

"Well, you know every man has his price."

Sensitive Mr. Phelan

At the recent Welcome Home Jinks at the Bohemian Club, the customary low jinks was omitted, I am informed, at the request of Mr. Phelan. The supposition is that he was afraid of having his dignity ruffled. Some of the Bohemians are very caustic in their humor, and in their lampooning they do not spare sensitive feelings. The club president has never quite forgiven Dick Hotaling for riding into the Bohemian grove on an ass whom he addressed familiarly as Jimmy Phelan.

Jollying the Social Push

For a newspaper that is distinctly the organ of the plain people and that delights in puncturing the full-blown pride of the plutocrat, the Examiner's Sunday appeals to the vanity of our provincial aristocracy are peculiarly inept. When a certain distinguished social leader was drooling servile flattery on the pages of an evening contemporary some time ago I thought that her peculiar emanations were the limit, but I find that I was mistaken. However I am not quite sure that the person who becomes rampantly hysterical in the Sunday Examiner is serious. It is possible that a joke is being played on San Francisco's quality. Perhaps somebody of a philosophic turn is intent upon ascertaining to what ludicrous extremes a newspaper may go with fulsome, nauseating flattery without exciting the resentment of those upon whom it is bestowed. If there is anything that makes human nature appear ridiculous it is meek submission to the glorification of imaginary perfections, and of those little supernumerary advantages, whether in birth or fortune, which one person enjoys above another.

Spreading the Salve

But hearken to the Examiner's glad-hand artist. The excerpts from last Sunday's paper herewith presented are verbatim. The ecstasy of the writer was superinduced by close contact with the fashionable herd at the Dillon-Winship wedding. But here he is, in the midst of his unctuous performance:

Who is that stunning woman in the white gown—the statuesque creature just now looking this way? Leontine Blake-man? She's a beauty. Just look at that faultless complexion of the tall woman near her. Do you know her? Mrs. Henry Dutton? Her eyes are pretty, aren't they? Here comes a woman who has the most interesting face I've seen in a long time. Is that Mrs. Willard Drown? Her pink brocaded gown is most becoming to her. Who's that coming in at the door in that blue gown? Mrs. Drown's sister, Mrs. Worthington Ames? Isn't she an attractive woman! That girl in that dainty frock is a desperate flirt and keeps every man guessing. That's Edwin McAfee to whom she's talking. Don't you know him? Why he's one of the cleverest men in town. Who is the bright-faced woman in that white gown; the one with the big duchesse collar? Mrs. Thomas Bishop? It has always been my luck to become interested in a lady and then find she's married. One of the Voorhies girls did you say? She has two attractive sisters, Mrs. Henry and Miss Marie. There, tell me who is the lady in a blue gown and duchesse lace ornaments? Mrs. John Rodgers-Clark? Isn't she interesting! I've been listening to her conversation for some time. She was Maude Mullins, wasn't she? Did you ever see Gertrude Dutton look so well? Her black gown is very becoming to her. She is such a fine girl. I like Mrs. James Bishop. I think her truly charming. I never saw her appear better than in the turquoise gown that she is wearing tonight. Maye Colburn looks well tonight in that gown of net embroidered in spangles. There comes a fine little woman, one of the genuine sensible sort—Mrs. Alfred Baker Spalding. That beautiful girl is Gertrude Eells. She will be married in three weeks to Lieutenant Babcock. That charming girl there is Ednah Robinson, the founder of the Sequoia Club. She is one of our brightest young women. I think Mrs. Gus Taylor is very handsome, don't you? Her white gown and the green leaves in her hair are an effective combination. She is a stanch friend when once a friend.

Fie! Fie! Thou Rash Coquette!

As if resolved not to be outdone by the Examiner's gusher, Madame La Coquette of the Bulletin piled on the agony Monday night. She gravely asserted that at two or three functions lately she "acknowledged with a thrill of pride that never in London, Paris, Monte Carlo or even Newport" had she seen "more beautiful or better dressed women." It must have been the New England London and the Kentucky Paris that Madame La Coquette referred to. As for the beauties of Newport, it is not excessive flattery to rank those of San Francisco above them. San Francisco has many beautiful women but they are not among those that the dailies exploit as society queens. If Madame La Coquette is truthful in asserting that she never saw better dressed women than those she met at one or two functions in this city, then she imposes a severe tax on credulity in representing that she has been beyond the borders of California.

The Snob's Haunting Fear

From beauty and dress Madame La Coquette diverged to the subject of smart society manners, and lamented the fear of knowing some one you shouldn't know, sagely observing, "It shows a remarkable lack of assurance and stability in your own position, this excessive care of it." And she suggested the importance of a social leader, some one to arbitrate "it being so much more comfortable to know just where you are." Madame La Coquette might have gone further, and suggested ways and means of separating the sheep and the goats, for at present no social leader, however qualified, could apply any ordinary standard in determining who's who in local society. A very effective method, perhaps, would be to subject all applicants to a test for the discovery of those who haven't sufficient confidence in themselves to know any one they felt like knowing. All people of that class could be safely admitted to the smart set, for they could be depended upon to frown upon everybody that had not been properly branded. The fact is that nearly all our society people are obsessed with the haunting fear referred to by Madame La Coquette, for very few of them have any assurance of the stability of their position. The great majority of them were without any position until within the past decade, and not a few of them were barred from what was considered polite society of a former generation. So there is foundation not only for the fear but also for the cherishing of the privilege of assuming the fine airs of the elect. But what puzzles me is, why mere newspaper persons should concern themselves about the improvement of conditions among the fashionable herd. Our society people are getting along very well, thank you, and they are not worrying over leaders or inviting suggestions. They are having a fine time according to their lights, and they feel eminently qualified to solve all problems that arise in their little circle. They are not half so exclusive as some people imagine. Their seeming aloofness is often nothing more than diffidence, the tribute which conscious mediocrity pays to merit.

Prodigal Peter

After all, it does look as though it takes a New York girl to metamorphose a Californian plutocrat into a good fellow. Ever since his marriage with Lily Oelrichs Peter Martin has been behaving like a true aristocrat, while all the rest of the Martin clan have looked on aghast. Peter and his wife are now on the briny, bound for the south of France, where they are to spend the winter months and a little more of the proceeds of that Oregon ranch that engrosses so much of the attention of our dear old dowager queen. Mrs. Peter Martin is bound to have her fling and Peter under her tutelage has become a case of "Aisy comes, aisy goes." Meanwhile the Walter Martins are living considerably within their income in little old San Francisco. It looks as though the metamorphosed Peter is doing all the spending for the family. More power to him!

The Joliffe Interview

On reading Miss Frances Joliffe's interview with Isadore Rush in the Bulletin last Sunday, I was reminded of what that sagacious and experienced matron, Lillian Russell, said to Mr. Ashton Stevens during his professional talk with her some months ago. It was substantially to the effect that she abominated the female interviewer, and would not talk to newspaper women because their eyes always burrowed into her skin in search of wrinkles. She also remarked that she never met one that did not want to know her age. Though Isadore Rush has enjoyed as many years of discretion as Lillian Russell, she has not profited to the same extent, for otherwise she would not have submitted to the Joliffe interview. But probably she counted on a sympathetic chat, knowing as she did that the dilettante journalist is a bachelor maid with a stage experience of her own that extends back into the palmy days of the long extinct Baldwin theatre. But it appears that Miss Joliffe could not ignore the call of the species. According to her own story she was extremely courteous throughout the interview, but when it was over she naively started an argument with a newspaper artist on the subject of Miss Rush's age, and though she had been told that the actress was a nice, reminiscent old lady, past her prime, she agreed that she did not look over thirty, but—she wanted statistics. The argument with the artist was a good and sufficient pretext for inquiry, but she did not go back to ask the question that had no doubt been on the tip of her tongue throughout the interview. Miss Joliffe is too resourceful for that. She knew a better way of putting disagreeable questions to victims of the newspaper interview, a way that never suggested itself to the professional reporter.

"Introductions" by Mrs. Meynell

"With an introduction by Mrs. Meynell" is getting to be as much of a stereotyped announcement as "revised and improved" was on the title pages of our school books in the long ago, before text book rings managed to have a chance every year or so, and there was time for a new edition to supplant the old. One has to wonder just what purpose is served by all these "introductions," which remind one of the bumptiousness of the mayor of some obscure village "making known" to an audience some speaker of world-wide fame. Why, for example, should Mrs. Meynell introduce Wordsworth? Most of us know a good deal more about Wordsworth than we do about Mrs. Meynell, and if we do not care enough about him to read his poems, we very certainly will not be led into a fictitious admiration because Mrs. Meynell tells us we ought to feel it. Another book which is to be graced "with an introduction by Mrs. Meynell" is the apocryphal "Gospel of the Infancy of Christ According to St. Peter," which was found in the ancient Abbey of St. Wolfgang, in the Salzkammergut, translated from the Latin into French by Catulle Mendez, and soon to appear in an English edition. Very likely all this pays the publishers—and Mrs. Meynell.

Spectacular Features of the Greenway Ball

The Greenway ball had several spectacular features. Not the least of them was the gown worn by Miss Ethyl Hager, who, despite her resolution to limit her social engagements, was there in all her glory and a flame-colored dress that was almost a replica of the one worn last year by the divinely tall Mrs. Peter Martin. She was ablaze all over with dark red spangles. She did not remain long at the ball for she had to be up betimes in the morning to start on her journey to St. Louis, and strange as it may seem, Miss Ethyl values sleep for its pulchritudinous effects. Notwithstanding the shimmering gown, Miss Hager did not monopolize attention, for Mrs. "Jimmy" Flood was there with her diamonds; and Mrs. Flood has diamonds in abundance. The radiance of her was blinding. Her necklace is a wonderful specimen of the jeweler's art. It is unquestionably the most elegant necklace in town and would focus a flock of glasses even if it were worn in a box at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. Mr. Greenway contributed to the gayety of the ball by dancing with each of the debutantes. He is so short and they are so tall that the contrast was quite diverting.

Other Features

Among the handsome gowns worn at the ball, several, it was reported, had been imported for the occasion. The one worn by Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels was a work of art. I was told that it was an emotional gown, but what emotion it was intended to disclose I was unable to determine. Another handsome gown was that worn by Mrs. Will Irwin. It was of white beaded net over white silk. Her principal ornament was her well known collar of pearls and diamonds. Pearl Landers, the perennially popular, was radiant in a blue iridescent spangled gauze gown. Where it was made I am unable to disclose. Her jewels were pearls. Others who wore striking frocks quite worthy of mention were Mrs. George Newhall, Mrs. Gus Taylor, Mrs. H. M. A. Miller, Mrs. J. D. Spreckels Jr. and Mrs. Fred McNear. Seemingly the most popular of the buds were Miss Payne, daughter of Mrs. Eugene Freeman, Miss Dorothy Eells and Miss Elsa Draper of Bohemian Club dinner fame.

Gossip of The Dancing Clubs

Once more there is talk among our society people of reviving the Fortnightlies. The Greenway dances are looked upon as a little too formal, and the Assemblies as too heterogeneous to be satisfactory. The main attraction at the Greenway dances is really the banquet. Many of the guests arrive just before supper is served and leave immediately after the black coffee. There is an arctic temperature at these affairs, introductions being uncommon. Girls who are popular at other dances have to sit against the wall most of the evening while the few men they know are browsing around the smoking room waiting for the call to supper. The Fortnightly was essentially a dancing club and the refreshments were merely incidental. Mrs. Salisbury always took the precaution to have a sufficient number of dancing men on hand and consequently the girls had a glorious time. The Saturday Night Club, though composed chiefly of the girls who are out, yet promises to develop into an institution similar to the Fortnightly. When Mrs. Salisbury organized her club, the girls admitted were not over fifteen years of age. It was in the nature of a dancing class but gradually members of the older set worked themselves in, and the club became an important factor in the social life of San Francisco. It was at the Fortnightlies that Mrs. Salisbury made introductions that developed into matches.

Judge Belknap's Son

Though David P. Belknap, who died this week at an advanced age, was one of the founders of the Bohemian Club, his name receives only casual mention in the published annals of the club. The only note of any length refers to a jinks sired by Mr. Belknap, the subject being the strange one—for a men's club—of "Water." His son, "Ed" Belknap, went to New York many years ago, and is very well-known in the metropolis as a lawyer, actor and playwright. He was on the stage for some years, but as his voice was not a flexible one he took to acting in pantomime, in which he made a great success. Several years ago he came to San Francisco with Pilar-Morin and, with the support of the original New York company, they produced pantomimes at the Baldwin, in connection with chamber music concerts directed by Aimee Lachaume, Pilar-Morin's husband. The venture was an artistic but not a financial success.

Merry Addie's Return

That distinguished jester of the local smart set, the funny man of the Four Hundred, Mr. Addison Mizner, has returned to town, and is once more open to dinner engagements. Society is rejoicing over his return, for without him social functions were drab and vapid. Even Mr. Greenway's champagne fails to impart sparkle to a feast when Glittering Addie isn't there to give zest to the conversation with merry quip and rollicking banter. His mots have been missed, and society's digestion has suffered during his absence. But while society rejoices over Mr. Mizner's return it is pained to hear that he was in trade while away. It is said that he made a few dollars by dealing in second-hand furniture, a plebeian occupation, to which he was tempted by a New York millionaire who wanted some old mahogany pieces for his palace on the Hudson. Knowing that Addie possessed the taste of an artist he commissioned him to pick up some antiques in the second-hand shops of Guatemala.

She Stood the Test

The Josselyn tea last Saturday, at which Miss Marjorie was introduced to society for the winter campaign, was the occasion of a great crush. The Josselyn girls, with hair of striking hue done up into marvelous pompadours, were there in force. Miss Marjorie was of course subjected to deep scrutiny, and she stood the test. It was agreed that she was as vivacious as any of her better known sisters, and that she had been properly finished for the fashionable whirl.

The Irwins to Entertain

Mrs. "Billy" Irwin has decided to contribute to the gayety of the winter season, and as she has an unlimited bank account and a house adapted to splurging on a large scale, there is a fine prospect of her doing the grand in a most creditable manner. Her one ewe lamb, Helene, will probably make her debut next year though she is not far advanced in her teens. The Irwins, I am told, built their big stone mansion with a view to providing a suitable setting for their daughter. They spent a fortune on the interior decorations, but not, I regret to say, with the happiest results. However they have one of the most beautiful homes in San Francisco. Some of our rich people have achieved wonderful effects in the interior of their costly dwellings by the injudicious expenditure of wealth. I have in mind a notable brown stone castle the interior of which was done by a professional decorator, but which, as a result of indiscriminate purchases abroad, has taken on the appearance of a large furniture and bric-a-brac shop. The original scheme has been entirely spoiled.

"Clergymen are responsible for the most of the trouble in this world."

The Oelrichs White Elephant

The Magees are having the time of their life trying to secure a lessee for Mrs. Oelrichs's white elephant on the hill. When Mrs. Oelrichs first contemplated leasing the hotel, she insisted that she should receive five per cent net on the investment, making it quite evident that she has not been influenced by sentiment. Now she is willing to accept four per cent, but as she still insists that the lessee must put in the furniture, and as it is estimated that the necessary furniture will cost not less than half a million, nobody seems anxious to take the risk.

The Sport of Kings

The ponies are ready for the opening handicap at the Oakland track, and the indications are that when the barrier goes up Saturday afternoon there will be a great crush in the grand-stand. President Williams is elated over the prospect, for the coming season promises to be one of the most successful in the history of the Western turf. Some of the best known turfites in the country are coming out with good strings of horseflesh, and there is every reason for believing that the expectations of the directors of the new California Jockey Club in respect of the quality of the racing will be fully realized.

In His Old Bachelor Quarters

The new home of the George Newhalls will not be ready for occupancy until the spring. It is to be beautiful in its appointments. All the carved woodwork was imported and the tapestries, also, were obtained abroad. I have heard that during their honeymoon trip the Newhalls spent almost all their time in buying furniture. At present they are living in Mr. Newhall's old bachelor quarters, where they will stay until their house is ready.

The Commercial Instinct

The King sisters returned home just in time for the opening of the social season, and they are being very much sought after. I heard it suggested the other day that their popularity is in a measure due to the "availability" of their brother Frank from a matrimonial standpoint. Somebody recently started the report in society that he had a good head for financiering, and gave promise of becoming a millionaire some day. Matchmaking mammas immediately threw out their grappling irons, and the King sisters have been strenuously cultivated ever since. The commercial instinct is strong in society.

They're Cracks at Bridge

A hyphenated name is not the only thing the Hyde-Smiths are distinguished for. The family, which includes Dr. and Mrs. Garceau, is distinguished for skill at bridge. Mrs. Hyde-Smith and Mrs. Garceau are two of our crack bridge players. They learned the game in Paris and London long before it crossed the pond. It was in those cities that the Misses Gertrude and Margaret Hyde-Smith mastered the intricacies of the game, and I am told that the "dainty debutante," as Margaret is designated in the gushful dailies, makes old veterans sit up and take notice whenever she takes a hand. She is scheduled to come out at a ball to be given some time before Christmas, I believe. She is more of the spirituelle type than her sister Gertrude, who has taken on several pennyweight since last season.

Mrs. Clark's Triumph

Mammon has once more won the recognition of the Snobocracy. An occasional correspondent writes me from Washington that fashionable people are flocking to the dinners and receptions of Mrs. William A. Clark, wife of the Montana Senator and mother-in-law of our own Miss Tobin, that was. The haughty matrons of the national capital, who pride themselves on their exclusiveness and boast of their contempt for the new-rich, asserted vehemently some time ago that they never, never, never would extend the glad-hand to Anna La Chapelle though she became the wife of twenty multi-millionaire lawmakers. Now they are jostling one another to reach the side of the Senator's wife. Mrs. Clark was very patient. She gave one regal entertainment after another and waited composedly for society to drift to them. The drift has set in. Mrs. Clark, by the way, is a harpist, whose touch recalls Maud Morgan's, and her voice is like molten silver in the golden palace of the Copper King.

Too Decisive a Victory

The sweeping Republican victory in this State has upset the calculations of the wise men of the party and greatly disturbed the feelings of the toga chasers. There were elected to the Legislature nearly twenty Republicans who were not included in the calculations of the managers of the Senatorial aspirants, and consequently those gentlemen are very much worried. A new element confronts them and it behooves them to be up and doing. The complications that have arisen are of a serious nature. The legislators who were not included in the calculations of the wise men are quite independent, and as a consequence of their election the toga is going to be a little more expensive than was supposed. But that is not the only disagreeable feature of conditions as they are now presented. The expediency of a caucus is no longer apparent, owing to the increased majority of the Republican party, and whoever is elected Senator will find himself under obligations to so many men that his life will be burdensome throughout his term. With one hundred and six Republicans in the Assembly that branch of the Legislature will control the Senatorial contest, and the Senate will be deprived of its importance, but as every Assemblyman cannot now hope to secure a committee chairmanship, there is sure to be much grumbling and dissatisfaction. The party leaders are in distress. They have been overwhelmed by their own success.

Pardee's Windfall

It is now up to Governor Pardee to distribute some of the juiciest patronage that ever fell to the lot of an Executive of this State. And His Excellency is not shedding any tears over the responsibility that was thrust upon him by the electors of this State when they carried the amendment to the Constitution providing for the institution of a Court of Appeals. Under the amendment he is authorized to appoint nine judges, three for each of the three judicial districts, and to each district he must appoint at least one Democrat. He will also handle all the machinery of the court and dictate, no doubt, the appointment of all clerical assistance. All of which Governor Pardee will do with the greatest of pleasure. So to him has come a rare opportunity to mend his fences, for of course everybody appointed by him will be duly grateful.

Nineteen in All

As the Governor is a shrewd politician he will make the best of his opportunity; that is, he will begin proceedings by creating vacancies so as to increase the number of jobs to be filled. Nearly every judge of the Superior Court in the State is desirous of promotion. All of them hope to be appointed to the Court of Appeals. Governor Pardee is expected to select his judicial timber for the court from the Superior Court, and subsequently to fill the vacancies thus created. So there are in reality nineteen judges for him to appoint. The most prominently mentioned of the Democrats on the Superior bench likely to be promoted are Judge Dooling of San Benito and Judge Lawlor of this city.

A Significant Bulletin

There was general rejoicing in the Examiner office over the defeat of Congressman Livernash. Though he was formerly a reporter on the paper, and was boomed by his associates through his first campaign, he had not a friend in the office this year. Nevertheless the paper supported him for Mr. Hearst issued orders to that effect and they were obeyed to the letter, but perfunctorily. Mr. Livernash was given all the space that he desired, and he attended to the filling of it. I was much amused Tuesday night when the good-night bulletin was flashed on the Examiner's outer-wall. It read, "Kahn beats Livernash by seven thousand votes: this is unofficial." Kahn did not have such a large majority but of course the Examiner bulletin was unofficial, and nobody was in a hurry to remove it. Mr. Livernash had a rather hard time of it. He was knifed by both factions of the Democracy and one wing of the Labor Party.

Chaperoned by Her Aunt

When the dailies reported that Mrs. Hugh Tevis had started on an ocean voyage with Arthur McKee as a companion, I suggested that the story was inaccurate. I have since learned that she was done an injustice. She is chaperoned by her aunt, Mrs. Shields. She is now in Paris, stopping at an obscure hotel close to the Tuileries Gardens. Mr. McKee is stopping at the same hotel. It is reported that both have been under the surveillance of a Pinkerton detective—the same Hawkshaw who closely observed the doings of Mr. McKee and Mrs. Phipps when they were in Paris last spring. According to an Eastern paper the report that Mrs. Tevis and McKee are engaged has been revived, and the social authorities of Paris have been very much shocked by their unconventional conduct in putting up at the same hotel.

"Miss Snobliegh lost one thousand dollars worth of diamonds."

"She must be awful sore."

"No she isn't; the newspapers reported that she lost five thousand dollars worth of old family jewels."

She Likes Parties

I am told that Frank Unger's young daughter, whose play "Sheridan" was recently produced by Arthur Bourchier in London, is a rare combination of intellectuality and social qualities. She is very pretty, animated, keen for dinners and dances, and at the age of twenty has written a clever play and had two pictures exhibited in the Paris Salon. Miss Unger is a refutation of the theory that clever parents produce dull offspring. If Frank Unger had possessed more ambition, he might have accomplished much in literature or won a name on the stage. But he preferred to become the major-domo of Mrs. Harry Gillig and later of Mrs. Charles Yerkes, and betweenwhiles to lounge about the world in his friends' yachts. He is one of the most congenial companions, and his witty sayings are quoted in clubs from New York to San Francisco. His ex-wife, Minnie Buchanan that was, Mrs. Arthur Jule Goodman that is, is a writer and artist.

Such is Fame

A San Franciscan just back from the continent tells me the amusing way in which the name Ashe sticks to Mrs. "Jack" Gouraud, although Amy Crocker has had two husbands since her divorce from Porter Ashe. Wherever the Gourauds go in Europe they are known as "the Ashes."

The Foxhall Keenes

The dailies having ventilated the domestic complications that have arisen in the Foxhall Keene family, it may be of general interest to know that fashionable New Yorkers are predicting that the marriage of Mr. Keene and an aristocratic widow will soon follow a divorce. Mrs. Keene is many years her husband's senior, and she has a son by her first husband, and when she was married to Foxhall Keene by Dr. Rainsford there was some tittering in the church just at the most solemn period of the ceremony. As the clergyman held the hands of Mrs. White and Mr. Keene he said: "Those whom God hath put asunder let no man join—" The titters brought Dr. Rainsford to his senses, and realizing his error he retraced his steps and recited the words as they are found in the ritual.

Sausalito will lose two of its prettiest buds early next month, when Etelka Williar and Mabel Watkins leave for the Philippines, where they will visit army friends for some months.

More Merimee Letters

A literary find is reported from Paris—the discovery of one hundred hitherto unpublished letters of Prosper Merimee. Needless to add, immediate steps toward making them public have been taken. Before long it will come to be regarded as an act of cruelty and improvidence on the part of people of any prominence in the world if they do not provide for posterity by concealing letters and discarded manuscripts and other rubbish where they can be unearthed betimes and turned into coin when royalties begin to fall off. We have clubs and societies for nearly every conceivable object, but there is room for one more—an association whose members will pledge themselves neither to publish the letters and manuscripts found after the death of their owner, nor to read any such documents made public, and to destroy all their correspondence, thereby doing all that lies in their power to discourage this species of ghoulish vandalism. People who publish letters found after the writer is unable to protest or protect himself would rifle the mails and listen at key-holes.

Another Crocker Heir

Stork rumors have been emanating from the home of the Will Crockers ever since the return of materfamilias from Europe, and consequently their friends were not surprised when the announcement was made of the birth of a son and heir. I have been told that Mrs. Crocker's stay abroad would have been much more protracted had it not been that she anticipated the olive branch episode.

The Eells-Babcock wedding will be the next large Hymen affair. It will be celebrated at Trinity on the twenty-third.

Press Club Dinners

Within the past few weeks the jinks room of the Press Club has been the scene of several jolly and thoroughly bohemian affairs, of a nature new to that club of good fellows—informal dinners of about thirty covers each, given to members or others who have entered fully into the unconventional spirit which prevails and which is suggestive of that which characterizes the bonhomie of the famous Gridiron Club of Washington. The first one was given to "Nat" Landsberger, and it lasted until well past the midnight hour. Others have been given to General Manager Chapman of the United Railroads and to the ward-room officers of the battleship Ohio, and several others are in view, to take place before the end of the month.

The Schussler family, who made their European plans some months ago, are now very uncertain when they are to depart, owing to Mr. Schussler's business interests here. Meanwhile they are studying Italian for they intend to spend much of their time when abroad in Italy.

His Idea of It

One of our society girls teaches a class of boys in Sunday school. Last Sunday the lesson was on the eleventh chapter of Second Kings, which tells how Joash, the son of Ahaziah, was hidden by Jehosheba, and so escaped his enemies. The verse reads: "They hid him . . . in the bed-chamber," etc. At the end of the lesson, it is the custom to question the scholars about the things they have read. This society girl feels that she is a failure as a teacher for when she propounded the query, "How did Jehosheba save Joash from being slain?" her star boy answered:

For Uncle Sam's Marines

Brigadier-General G. F. Elliott, commandant of the Marine Corps, has decided to establish a post exchange at every place garrisoned by the members of his command. There are marine garrisons now in spots all over the world which are even more desolate than some of the one-company posts of the army in the old frontier days, and post exchanges at such stations are factors of vital importance in preserving the equanimity and efficiency of the men. For example, there is Midway island, a desert sand-spit in mid-ocean, where a score of marines are kept on duty, with nothing but baseball and fishing to vary the monotony month after month. Guantanamo, Cuba, and Olongapo, Luzon, are little better, while the dreary posts in the Panama canal zone are enough to drive any one to hard drink.

The gentlemen composing the famous "Navy ring" experienced a severe jolt a few days ago, when the press throughout the country made public a serious defect in several of our new battleships, including those of the Ohio and the Alabama classes. For any one to have the temerity to criticize the designs of the great Board on Construction was the highest effrontery, and the members were furious over the publication of the facts. The truth of the matter is that the "ring" does not so much mind criticism of our ships as criticism of its members who were responsible for the designs. Immunity from criticism has long been enjoyed by the "ring," and they have maintained this immunity by visiting dire punishment upon every luckless and over-zealous officer who has "dared" to comment unfavorably on their acts. As for the alleged mistakes of making public defects, it is nonsense to suppose for an instant that every foreign nation is not perfectly well aware of practically every detail of the construction of our ships. Foreigners get detailed information of plans and specifications of all our ships, and are quick to discover any points of weakness. The "ring" knows this, but it does not want the American public to know about errors in design. It is not pleasant for the "ring" to explain errors of judgment in designing costly men-of-war. Of course, general buck-passing is to be expected under the circumstances, but it is safe to say that the Board on Construction will hesitate hereafter before increasing the comforts of officers at the expense of needed armor protection.

A Compliment from Newport

Mrs. Gus Taylor is once more of the trim, slender figure for which she was distinguished several seasons ago, and now approximates the proportions of Mrs. Peter Martin. By the way, the friends of Mrs. Taylor love to relate that Mrs. Martin paid her a high compliment when she was out here, saying, "My dear, your figure approaches nearer the New York ideal than that of any other woman I have met here." And yet at that time Mrs. Taylor was not nearly so slender as she is now. How unfortunate that Mrs. Peter Martin is not here now to admire. Mrs. McNear strikes the happy medium with her svelte figure, and remains the best looking as well as the most popular of the Hopkins trio.

A Prolific Contributor

Mrs. Frank Deering, though she in nowise neglects her social duties, and is a devoted wife and mother, manages to do a lot of writing. She has a story in the September St. Nicholas, articles in the October and November Good Housekeeping, the October Modern Women and November Munsey. The Munsey story was rather out of the common, being an incident in the routine of a charitable organization.

Among the flitters East is Mrs. Robert B. Cunningham, who will go first to St. Louis and then extend her travels farther on.

Of The Upper Grade

The dance given by Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Bourn last Monday was attended chiefly by members of our old families who have not yet felt compelled through commercial or political expediency to mingle with the latest recruits. The Parrotts and the de Guignes are the people most prominent in this set. The Bourn house is one of the handsomest in town and is well adapted for dancing.

"You say she is a great literary genius, but what did she ever do?"

"She performed the unprecedented feat of writing a book on Chaucer without knowing anything about him and without saying anything about him."

A Well-Dressed Bud

Irene Sabin, who will debut at her parents' home in California street, at a large tea and dinner dance, is very popular at the Presidio hops, and in army circles. She is said to be a clever girl and to have a genius for clothes.

Personal and Reminiscent

Marie Voorhies has set the date of her marriage with Captain Young for either the last of December or early in January. As Captain Young has recently been ordered to Schuylkill Arsenal, Philadelphia, that will be their home for awhile. The bride is sure to be received with open arms by the army people, for she has always been a favorite in military circles. The Voorhieses are so sure of their position that they are never in the least snobbish, and all the sisters enjoy the popularity that endures. Their parents are both Southerners. Dr. Voorhies was very prominent in Memphis during the yellow fever epidemic, and won great praise for his skill and courage at that time. Mrs. Voorhies was educated at one of the schools for girls in the South, and many of her old schoolmates, like herself, afterwards came to live in California. Mrs. Voorhies, by the way, has just returned from the East, and is busy preparing for the big ball to be given by the Daughters of the Confederacy at the end of the month.

Mrs. Fremont Older has returned from her Eastern trip.

Their Sensational Flight

Though Katherine Dillon's trousseau was for the most part made in Vienna, her wedding gown was made right here in San Francisco. It was a beautiful creation, and never did a bride look smarter than did Miss Dillon. I hear that some of the younger girls in the bridal party cast green eyes at Miss Cosgrave when the latter captured both the bouquet and the ring. After the bride went upstairs to change her gown, the guests assembled in the hall and on the porch waiting to see her off. There was to be no old shoe or rice throwing, as Mrs. Casey is opposed to the custom. But, after waiting for over half an hour, it was discovered that the bride and bridegroom had made their escape down the backstairs and out through the side gate. In their haste Mr. Winship fell into a small excavation and his bride was nearly precipitated into the same hole. Little Harold Casey, who was their only attendant in their flight through the back yard, followed suit and tore his new knickerbockers. It was really a thrilling adventure. The happy pair, by the way, are to reside at the St. Francis for awhile this winter and will then go to live with Mr. and Mrs. Casey.

Miss Lucy Bancroft recently left for an extended trip throughout the East. She will visit friends in New York and Philadelphia, and will probably not return until after the holidays.

Being from Kentucky

Mr. Alexander Latimer Semple of Louisville, Kentucky, is here on a business trip, and is being lavishly entertained at the clubs, and on the marshes where the ducks congregate. Like all Kentuckians, Mr. Semple knows how to handle a gun, and he has played havoc with the birds. He is of the firm of C. P. Moorman & Co., the famous distillers of Cutter whisky.

Honor to Robertson

Louis A. Robertson, the poet of Bohemia and author of "Montezuma," who is well known to the readers of Town Talk, has had distinguished honor conferred on him by the directors of the Bohemian Club. They have elected him an honorary member, a distinction enjoyed only by literary people who have won fame. Mr. Robertson has been confined to his room for over a year, being in very feeble health, but his muse is as vigorous as ever. I hear that a new volume of poems from his pen will soon appear.

The Debutantes of Oakland

A few of our society people have received cards for the Friday Night Club of Oakland. I am told that the Oakland debutantes compare very favorably with the San Francisco group in the matter of pulchritude. The first dance of the Oakland club is to be held December second. The patronesses are Mrs. W. H. Chickering, Mrs. E. M. Walsh, Mrs. W. S. Goodfellow, Mrs. M. W. Kales, Mrs. O. A. Chase, Mrs. D. H. Mathes, Mrs. T. C. Coogan and Mrs. F. M. Sim.

"I hear that Rattler is going to marry the impossible Miss Spander."

"Yes, he needs the money."

The Old Familiar Problem

A whole colony of Amish Menonites in Ohio have announced their determination to sell out their holdings and sacrifice their interests rather than continue to send their children to a school where they are obliged to learn that the earth is round. It is curious to note how, periodically, that same difficulty is met with. Early in the last century an almanac joke referred to the advertisement of a teacher who offered, among his other qualifications, a willingness to teach the earth round or flat, as patrons preferred, but long since that time the peripatetic pedagogue has found it advisable to say as little on the subject as possible, for there are few rural communities where some old gray-bearded patriarch does not hold to the opinion of a flat earth with danger of falling over if one gets too near the edge thereof. And if "gran'pa" happens to have been one of the pioneers who crossed the plains in his prairie schooner he will back his opinion with proof positive, for it is evident enough to him and his offspring that "the bulge" would not have escaped his attention during the journey. One standard argument is that were the earth a sphere no water could flow north in the northern hemisphere, a falsity easily demonstrated by observation of the numerous "branches"; and I recall one old chap who insisted that if the earth were round and movable the creek would run up hill half the year. But the Scriptural references to the ends and corners of the universe should settle the matter beyond all question of dispute. Some teachers have dodged the issue by telling the children that they might have a flat earth at home if they would accept a round one at school, but really the question goes deeper than the geography. Is it worth while to stir up dissension at home or in school over a matter that really makes not a particle of difference? As far as the earning and eating of our daily bread is concerned, we would be just as comfortable on a table as on a ball. Life existed and daring deeds were done for a good many centuries before any one suspected that the earth was not flat. There is one freak religious denomination which makes it an article of their creed that they are living on the inside, not the outside of their sphere, yet they seem to breathe with no greater difficulty than we who insist that we are above, and not under ground. The Mennonites and the mountain patriarchs have succeeded in holding fast to something else that is practically lost to a more enlightened generation. The parents, the elders and the patriarchs should receive, as a matter of course, a degree of respect and deference which might well be copied by the know-it-all youngsters of the rest of the country, and it scarcely seems worth while to disturb this reverence for age and the presumed wisdom which accompanies it, for the sake of insisting on a bit of information which can affect neither manners, morals, nor the capacity to earn a subsistence.

The Pony Races

Society will flock to San Mateo on November twenty-fourth and twenty-sixth, when the California Polo and Pony Racing Association holds its tournament. It was at first thought to hold the meet at Del Monte, but arrangements could not be made to that effect, so Charles Clark placed his private grounds at San Mateo at the association's disposal. There will be polo matches, a handicap tournament between eight picked teams, a match game between northern and southern players, and pony races. Cups and purses will fall to the winners. The officers of the association are: Rudolph Spreckels, president; Charles W. Clark and Frank J. Carolan, vice-presidents; honorary

Oakland Equestriennes

Riding is the thing these fall days over the bay. Automobiling, golfing, tennis, walking, everything in fact has given way to the popular exercise. And, it is English, don't you know? Some of the belles just back from dear old London and fresh from riding in the park and from hunting meets down in the county preserves, are responsible for the energy shown. Miss Sevilla Hayden, who left for New York on Monday with her mother, Mrs. Brace Hayden, is one of the best and most enthusiastic riders in Oakland. It was she who instigated and organized the riding club to which the smartest girls of the city-across-the-bay belong. It is quite common to meet a dashing little cavalcade in the morning pushing its way up beyond the Sharons' in Piedmont hills and there is not always a groom at their heels either, English custom notwithstanding. Among the belles who ride in this set are: Ruth and Rose Kales, Cornelia Stratton, Lucretia Burnham, Kitty Kutz, Marguerite Butters, Elsa Schilling and the founder of the club.

A Maybrick Appeal

As was to be expected Mrs. Florence Maybrick has decided to capitalize her prison experience through the medium of a book. I am in receipt of a letter from Emmet Densmore, M. D., of Brooklyn, New York, whom I do not know, informing me that he is sure that the cruel injustice done Mrs. Maybrick, and her present sad plight, penniless and bereft of her children, are reasons sufficient to justify in my mind his urgent request that I insert permanently in my paper "the accompanying appeal" and "call editorial attention to it." Emmet Densmore, M. D., is wrong. I deeply sympathize with Mrs. Maybrick, but her plight does not palliate the nerve of Emmet Densmore, M. D., in urging me to devote a whole page of this paper to the publication of his appeal ostensibly in the interest of Mrs. Maybrick but clearly in the interest of the Funk and Wagnalls company, by whom the forthcoming book is to be published. This paragraph is more free advertising than that firm is entitled to.

Easy Prey For Pickpockets

Newly-married Californians appear to be tempting prey to the Artful Dodgers of the East, judging by some of the tales I have heard. Senator Sims went to the St. Louis Fair on his wedding trip, and was relieved of all his valuables while there. Then "Bob" Greer met with a like misfortune. While being shaved in a Washington, D. C., barber shop, a Raffles rifled his pockets of several gold eagles.

Three Roofs For The Huntingtons

Howard Huntington has taken up quarters in an apartment house in Los Angeles. Huntington pere lives at a Los Angeles hotel, and his wife and daughters spend most of their time in the family residence in San Francisco. Mr. Huntington left this city in a fit of pique superinduced by unfavorable criticism of his business interests. I do not believe that he expected to excite any regrets in this city, but he has certainly been highly appreciated in Los Angeles on account of his activities which have contributed so much to the development of the Southern burg. But I am of the opinion that the appreciation of Los Angeles hardly compensates him for his separation from his family, who decline to exile themselves from the centre of social gayety on the Pacific coast. Mr. Huntington built a beautiful home for his family in Los Angeles, but it failed as a lure, and it has been leased to the Sisters of Charity for a rescue home.

Uncle George's Literary Effort

Uncle George Bromley's volume of reminiscences, "The Long Ago and the Later On," is going through the press at an encouraging rate, and will soon be ready for distribution. Indications are that the special numbered and autographed edition of one hundred and fifty copies, will be bespoke before publication, and inquiries from the East are numerous. Uncle George's recollections go back to the primitive times when the family supply of soap, candles and matches was manufactured at home, when nearly all machinery was "hand turned," and when the southwest coast of Africa was a whaling ground. He was at sea not only before the evolution of the ocean greyhound, but when oceanic steam navigation seemed a more chimeric innovation than aerial navigation does today. He came to California in pioneer times, and was United States Consul at Tien-tsin before the world at large knew there was such a place, and he has stories to tell—good ones, not the kind that are retailed exclusively for club consumption. It was a monumental piece of work for an octogenarian, the preparation of these memoirs, even leaving out of consideration the fact that the author was not habited to literary work. And it has been well done.

Will Be a Winter Bride

The wedding of Isabel Kittle and Mr. Dibblee has been delayed on account of the latter's being in mourning. It will be celebrated the latter part of December or early in January, in Ross Valley. The Kittle home is one of the most beautiful in the valley. It was there that Isabel's sister was married to Dr. Sherman. The bride-to-be is now preparing her trousseau.

A Preacher Wanted

Mrs. Jane Stanford is once more on a still hunt for a preacher to take charge of the handsome chapel in Palo Alto. When she secured Rev. Dr. Heber Newton for college minister she believed that he was an ideal man for the position, but he precipitated religious controversy immediately on his arrival. Mrs. Stanford felt greatly relieved when he sent in his resignation. She is now in New York where she expects to engage the services of a man of national reputation. She has announced that on her return she will give a ball to introduce her niece, Miss Lathrop, who was graduated from Sacred Heart convent last May.

Our Mutinous College Men

Cadets of the University of California are under the ban for throwing clods at Professor William A. Setchell, who was guilty of addressing them on the propriety of behaving like men instead of children. The trouble, which is of several weeks' standing, arose from the order of Captain John T. Nance, commandant of the college cadets, that all members of his lecture course in military science and tactics should form in line and march to the classrooms in regular file, and that they should wear the regulation uniform and not coat, trousers, and hats of several styles. When the monitors tried to form the squads in marching order in front of North hall Thursday last there was a riot. The students linked arms and in wavering lines and lock step marched to North hall steps, where, amid roars and shouts of intermingled abuse and laughter, they deposited a youngster, in grotesque military uniform, a placard on his breast bearing the legend: "I'm Captain Nance, created, by my own order, head of the army of the United States and of the University of California." Then the little chap rang a bell and shouted, "Come in to school, boys." "Oski, wow!" was the response, and screams of "Give 'em the ax!" followed. It was while trying to quell this riot that Professor Setchell was pelted with clods. The professor told the men that their acts would be reported to Washington and Sacramento, but they did not seem to be particularly impressed. Eugene R. Hallett and Harry Dehm, respectively adjutant of the cadets and president of the Associated Students, finally besought the men to quit their mutinous actions, and they quelled the racket and for the time peace was restored.

His Wife Converted Him

Political Equality has no more ardent advocate than Mrs. William Keith, the wife of the noted landscape painter. Those who are intimate at the Berkeley home of the talented couple know how neatly Mrs. Keith always turns the tables on her husband when there is a war of wits over the rights of women. Not long ago Mr. and Mrs. Keeler were spending the evening at the Atherton street house when the old discussion was renewed, and Mr. Keith scored. "Mr. Keith is quite as enthusiastic over political equality as I am," vouchsafed Mrs. Keith, "are you not, William?"

"Y-es, y-e-s, indeed," hesitated the artist, with a shake of his shaggy locks, "I favor almost anything."

"William," laughed his wife, with a reproving finger uplifted, "you know that you are even more interested in woman suffrage than am I."

"When did you first favor it, Keith?" innocently demanded Keeler, always seeking material for a stanza.

"As soon as I was married, Keeler. And let me tell you, I became a believer in women doing just whatever they wanted to, Keeler, just as soon as I had taken the vows—and so would you."

Stephens Is a Hit

The culture germ has invaded the peaceful haunts of the cities across the bay and the society matron or maid who does not go to hear the great professors of the University of California when they lecture is considered as—well, rather inferior. There was a time when it was doubtful if one hundred persons could be gathered together to hear Professor Henry Morse Stephens in his lectures on the French Revolution. That was before Oakland had awakened to the fact that it was "the thing" to know something more than the correct way to tilt a hat and just how decollete a gown might be worn without exciting unfavorable comment. Now there is not room in the great Common School hall at Chabot Observatory for the women and learned men who throng to the great Englishman's talks. To one who has heard him it is not at all surprising that this should be so. The history is given almost as a story and in diction rich and musical. On last Thursday the audience listened in rapt silence while Mirabeau, the eccentric but powerful leader of the "Third Estate," glowed and lived, a man, before their very eyes. On Thursday

Theodore Roberts's Past

In a curtain speech the other night Mr. Theodore Roberts, the County Chairman, referred to himself as a native son, and a buzz of surprise went through the audience. Evidently there were many people there who did not know that the actor was born in this city. Theodore Roberts is a son of that old pioneer, Captain Martin Roberts. He had stage fever when he was a school boy, and in the first, memorable Authors' Carnival he impersonated Cardinal Richelieu in the Bulwer booth, winning great praise for the manner in which he sustained the character. From that time dates his histrionic career. Against the wishes of all his family he forsook the church socials and the Western Addition entertainments, at which he had frequently recited "The Death of Benedict Arnold" with its "Throb! throb! throb! ticked the death watch in the shattered wall," for the real thing. He became a member of the Baldwin theatre company and played for a time under an assumed name. He first showed talent as a comedian in a burlesque in which the lamented C. B. Bishop was the central figure. But he longed for serious dramatic roles, and he was in the cast of Adelaide Nielson's company during the last engagement of her career. He was the young attendant in the gardens of Kenilworth who assisted in carrying out the famous actress when she fainted before the Virgin Queen. Later Roberts was with Frohman and also with Belasco. It is not generally known that he holds a master mariner's certificate or that once, when he was out of a theatrical engagement, he was captain of a coastwise vessel.

Thought Him an Anarchist

Angelo Conti, erstwhile society favorite in San Francisco, has gone into the business of importing explosives from Italy to this country. He recently had an amusing but uncomfortable experience in New York. Government officials became suspicious of him on account of his large importations, and he was taken into custody pending an investigation. It was suspected that he was an Italian anarchist. The Italian Consul at New York was called upon to vouch for him.

Not in Vain Did He Go to the Orient

Though, like the other war correspondents sent to Japan, Grant Wallace succeeded in getting little news of any value for his paper, he came home nevertheless covered with honor. His vivid descriptions of what should have been seen by the correspondents, had they been permitted to approach the seat of war, were read by a lecture bureau with such interest that they immediately sent the Bulletin man an offer to lecture through the Middle West on the Japanese-Russian war. He will receive fifty dollars a night and expenses, and will soon start East to begin his tour.

To the credit of the Oakland society woman, be it said, she never lacks repose.

Isabella Bird Bishop, who died the other day, spent several months in this city some years ago, and was lionized by club women. She was one of the most remarkable writers of travel during the past half century. The daughter of an English clergyman, she began her travels at twenty-two and kept them up until just before her death. She covered all the United States, including the Rocky Mountain region, in the days when there were no railroads, spent some time in Japan, then just emerging from barbarism, went far into the interior of China, penetrated Thibet, crossed Mongolia and spent some months in Korea. Her last venture was a thousand mile trip in Morocco including the Atlas mountains, all undertaken when she was approaching her seventieth birthday. The accuracy and value of the observations published from her travels won for her the distinction of being the first woman elected a member of the Royal Geographical Society. One of her latest books is "Korea and Her Neighbours," published before the small peninsula had assumed so great importance in the literary as well as the political world.

lady. They both came here from Paris and have set up a studio in Van Ness avenue. The Century Club has taken the two women, who are portrait painters, under its wing, and will probably make them the fashion.

Breuer, who does more work at his easel than any other of our artists except Keith, is hiding in the Allegheny mountains and painting as though his life depended on it. Once a year Breuer disappears from the world for a few months, and always comes back with a large collection of pictures. Since he was taken up by the great art dealer of New York, who brought Julian Rix's work into prominence, Breuer has had to be more industrious than ever.

Charlie Dickman, who paints portraits occasionally, is engaged upon one now. He is up from Monterey for the purpose.

Matteo Sandona has two portraits nearly finished for the Bohemian Club exhibition—two society women in characteristic poses. He made his debut as a cartoonist at the Phelan jinks given by the club, doing the cartoon for the occasion.

L. P. Latimer will have a redwoods in the Bohemian Club showing. Since he painted the design for the Majestic theatre curtain, his friends are advising him to make money the same way that Martinez and some of the other artists eke out their incomes. But Latimer would rather teach his classes, and do a redwoods scene now and then. He looks forward to a trip to Paris some day. In the meantime, he satisfies his desire for change of scene by an occasional flitting to the Russian river region and a weekly trip to Mill Valley.

Retrogression

Helen Hyde's admirers are wofully disappointed in her recent work now being exhibited at Vickery's. Miss Hyde shows really serious retrogression from her charming Japanese Madonna and other lissome prints. The faces in the present pictures are so badly drawn that even the bright, pretty colors cannot conceal grave defects, and the framing is most unfortunate.

Is a Floral Decorator Now

The decorations at the Josselyn tea were done by Mrs. Solly Walter who also designed the beautiful autumn leaf arrangement at the Atherton dinner at the Sequoia Club. Mrs. Walter, who is the widow of the artist, was an assistant of Dr. Genthe for some time, but she has abandoned photography for flowers. I hear she is doing very well, for all her old friends buy their flowers at her place. Mrs. Walter has a keen business sense. It was she who managed the finances of Solly Walter's school of illustration, for Solly was such a bohemian that if he had been at the helm he would never have bothered to collect a bill. It is surprising, by the way, how the decorating business has grown in favor as a career for women since Mrs. McClellan, then Mary Bates, pioneered the way. Ivy Wandesforde Kersey was the next one to embark in it, and she did admirably with her flower farm near San Leandro. Miss Manning, the Misses Worn, Miss Wollenberg and others took up this line of work.

BY ARTHUR DELROY.

I wonder, if my plans should turn out nicely,
And I should score a hit and make a name.
I wonder — just to put the thing concisely —
If I would always try to be the same.

There's my friend — my great friend Fitz William Easyby
See how we chummed before he struck the mine,
But now, he seems shortsighted when he sees me,
Although I fed him — once upon a time.

Dear God! a little prayer I have to offer,
If through Thy graciousness success I've had Grant me the sense to Thee my thanks to proffer
Or leave me as I am — I trust, no cad.

In Financial Circles

A summary of the week's transactions shows a falling off in sales of bonds and an increase in stock transactions. The amount of bonds changing hands aggregated $140,000; shares, 7,240, divided as follows: 1,035 lighting, 503 water, 1,682 miscellaneous, 35 banks and 3,935 sugars.

No changes in prices occurred except in sugars. The steady advance of raw sugar, with the confidently looked for further material advance, could not fail to draw special attention to sugar securities. Under an urgent demand the market, which had been wavering for quite awhile, decided on a smart upward turn with a strong undercurrent. For some time I have been calling attention to the sugar market.

The interest on the bonds of the North Shore Railroad, due November 1st, has remained unpaid.

"The Fatal Wedding," probably the most successful melodrama before the public, will begin a week's run at the Grand tomorrow (Sunday) matinee. The play takes its title from the last act, which shows the interior of Grace Church, New York, illuminated at night while a wedding is in progress. The adventuress is shot to death at the steps of the altar as she is about to utter the words that would have wrecked the life of the man she was about to marry. The scenic effects are very vivid and realistic. The cast includes Jefferson Osbourn, L. T. Fuller, Albert Roccardi, Ben Roth, John Hogan, Richard Crawford, Mary K. Taylor, Elma Gillette, Marie Pert, Gussie Shires and Frankie Wilson. Sunday matinee, November twentieth, "The Show Girl" will begin an engagement.

The Sunday Call Magazine tomorrow will be devoted almost exclusively to special labor features in commemoration of the convention of the American Federation of Labor, which meets in San Francisco next week. The most prominent National, State and City labor leaders will all have special articles. Samuel Gompers, president of the Federation, talks on "The Growth of the American Federation of Labor"; Frank G. Morrison, national secretary, has a paper upon "The Future of the American Federation," and James G. O'Connell, third vice-president, discusses "The Open Shop," which is also the subject of a short paper by Mayor Eugene E. Schmitz. Walter Macarthur has a strong paper on "Trades Unions in Politics"; Andrew J. Furuseth discusses "Trades Unionism Among Seamen"; P. H. McCarthy, president of the Building Trades Council, gives the history of the building trades in the State; Will J. French, president of the Allied Printing Trades, discusses "Trades Unions as a Civilizing Factor"; James G. Maguire submits an article on "The Boycott," and Miss Lucile Eaves, the well-known woman worker in labor fields, contributes "How Organized Labor Protects the Working Women and Children." In addition there are the usual fiction features and pages of interest to women and children.

The Little Dinner of His Russian Highness

ENGLISHED FOR TOWN TALK BY BEATRICE HASTINGS.

To Mlle. Inez Bouvier, Boulevard Messonier.
Dear Inez,

I hear that, like the Grande Duchesse de Gerolstein, you adore the military, so I write you to dine Thursday, May twenty-first, with some valiant warriors, whose names end in eff and off; they are all gallant gentlemen and quite worthy of your admiration. My charming little friend, Mlle. Blanche Devereux, has consented to act as hostess. I sincerely hope that we may have a jolly time; if you accept my invitation, I shall feel assured of it.

Respectfully yours,

Ladislaus Karakoff.

To Mlle. Blanche Devereux, Rue Rembrandt.
My Beautiful Blanchette:

I have faithfully followed your list of guests, and have already invited: Inez Bouvier, Lucie Dubois, Clarisse Lambert, Corinne de Beaulieu and Marie Parmentier. I am most anxious to have the dinner a complete success, so kindly advice me as to what I must do to make sure of these ladies attending. With a thousand kisses, I am,

Devotedly yours,

Ladislaus.

To Prince Karakoff, Russian Embassy, Paris.
My Dear Laddy:

If you wish to make sure of the ladies whom you name, send to each one of them a certified check for a gown at Doucet's or Worth's.

Affectionately yours,

Blanchette.

Karakoff smiled as he tossed the dainty little perfumed note on the table; rather an expensive bait, he thought as he dashed off the following order to Dupont the Printer:

To Monsieur Dupont, Printer, Place du Caire,

Sir: Kindly print for me six checks worded: "Good for a gown at Doucet's, to be delivered for the dinner of Thursday, May twenty-first.

Prince Karakoff,
Russian Embassy.

The invitations settled, the Prince strolled to the Cafe Russa to arrange the menu with Adolphe, the celebrated maitre d'hotel.

"Number sixteen is not engaged for Thursday?" asked the Ambassador, as the noted caterer came kow-towing into the room.

"No, your Highness."

"Then kindly reserve it for me, Adolphe."

"How many covers, your Highness?"

"Twelve," responded the Prince. "As I wish the dinner to be perfect, in its menu, appointments, etc., etc., I came to discuss the arrangements with you."

Adolphe bowed profoundly at the Ambassador's condescension.

"Your Highness does me great honor," he said, with touching humility, then hesitating he added: "May I ask Monsieur le Prince the social status of the invited guests?"

The Ambassador smiled: "To be sure, Adolphe," he said genially, "the flower of the Army and Diplomatic Corps, and six of the most beautiful demi-mondaines in Paris."

"Would his Highness be so gracious as to mention some of the ladies' names—it would be such a help in arranging the menu."

"Willingly," said the Ambassador. "Clarisse Lambert, Inez Bouvier."

"Bravo!" half shouted Adolphe, almost forgetting the ministerial presence, "then we must have Beychevelle, for Mlle. Inez always drinks Beychevelle; the decanters must be filled with it."

Karakoff signified his approval as he mentioned the names of Blanche Devereux, Clarisse Lambert, Corinne de Beaulieu, and Marie Parmentier.

"Ah, la la!" exclaimed Adolphe, "then there will be fun, for no dinner is complete without these ladies. As oysters are out of season, your Highness, I would suggest shrimps from Dieppe, a few filets of anchovie, simply as ornaments, a dark note as it were, to bring out the shining white brightness of the damask cloth. Two soups—chick consomme, and the celebrated Theodora, a marvelously savory composition, a sort of bisque, composed of game juice and the yolks of eggs, a wonderful tonic for the stomach, vivifying enough to bring the dead to life."

"You are enthusiastic, my good Adolphe," said the Ambassador, laughing.

"Then your Highness, we must have two relevés, one of fish, the other of meat. I would suggest cutlets of lobster a la Creole, and filet of beef served in jelly. As an entree I would propose supreme of ortolans, or quail a la Regence."

"Let it be ortolans," said Karakoff, settling the vexed question.

"Ah! monsieur has perfect taste; ortolans it shall be," responded the enthusiastic Adolphe, "and if your Highness has no objection, I will serve with the game crabs from the Meuse, on lettuce leaves; it will be so artistic. For the roast, I would suggest a plump poulet, with sauce a la Perigueux; true it is a little heavy, but then we must have a plat de resistance. The cold dishes will be aspic de fois gras aux Xeres, and quail a la Russe, with Venetian salad; the vegetables: asparagus and peas a la Francaise. For dessert shells of Neapolitan ice cream filled with strawberries, accompanied by biscuit Kamouski, coffee, etc."

"And the wines?" asked the Ambassador.

"A most important question, your Highness, for the menu must be sprinkled and punctuated by harmonious wines. As I have already mentioned, Mlle. Inez Bouvier has a weakness for Beychevelle, so I shall fill the decanter with it. After the soups a thimbleful of Xeres retour de l'Inde. With the cutlets of lobster, a la Creole, Chateau Yquem; with the supreme of ortolans, Mouton-Rothschild 1857—this will carpet the stomach with velvet."

"With velvet!" laughed Karakoff. "Well, proceed Adolphe."

"With the entree of crabs, your Highness, champagne—Monopole, extra dry, to be continued with the roast."

"Perfect," said the Prince. "I can assure you, my good Adolphe, that my head is beginning to ache. This concentration of mind on one subject is as bad as a conference with Delcasse at the Foreign Office. Well—everything is now settled I suppose?" added the Ambassador, rising to leave.

"Not quite yet, Monsieur le Prince—the flowers. We must have a handsome centrepiece, with six bouquets for the ladies and six boutonnieres for the men."

"True, I had quite forgotten," said Karakoff, raising his hand wearily to his head; "I will send an order to my florist."

"And the menu cards; has monsieur yet ordered them? They should be artistic and appropriate to the character of the guests."

Another complication, thought the Prince. "Well, I will think the matter over, Adolphe," he responded rather impatiently.

"I regret very much indeed to weary monsieur," said the caterer, "but these are the little details, which give the Parisian flavor. If your Highness will graciously send me the menu cards the day before the dinner I will have the guests' names inscribed. This is an English fashion, and much in vogue. One then remembers with whom one has dined, and the menu card becomes a veritable souvenir."

"An excellent idea Adolphe, but really I cannot stand anything more today. I need air; a few minutes' longer consultation and I shall have a wretched headache."

"Ah! monsieur, believe me that nothing is improvised, not even pleasure."

"Good-day Adolphe," said the Minister, "remember the hour fixed for dinner is half-past seven."

"Pardon me, Monsieur le Prince, but knowing those ladies as I do, I really believe you can hardly count upon them before eight or even half-past eight."

Karakoff walked with a light step along the Champs Elysees under the grateful green shade of the chestnut trees, to the musical twittering of birds. When he reached the Embassy he found a telegram and two pretty little lavender notes, conspicuously placed on his writing table. The telegram ran: "Play Thursday evening. Impossible to get off. A thousand regrets, and thankful for check."—Lucie Dubois.

"The devil!" was the amiable expression which escaped from the ambassadorial lips; then taking up the first letter he read:

To Prince Karakoff, Russian Ambassador at Paris.
My Dear Prince:

I had accepted with anticipations of great pleasure your kind invitation for May twenty-first, when I learned by mere chance from Madame Corinne de Beaulieu that Marie Parmentier was to be among the invited guests. Desiring for very special reasons to avoid meeting this woman, I must beg you to permit me to withdraw my acceptance. I greatly appreciate your amiable attention in sending me the Doucet check, and assure you that whenever the gown is worn to think only of the handsome Russian Ambassador. With many regrets, I am,

Gratefully yours,

Clarisse Lambert.

Karakoff's hand trembled visibly as he picked up the second note:

To Prince Karakoff, Russian Ambassador at Paris.
My Dear Prince:

My luck, as usual; the Count, who has been staying in Venice, wires me that he will be home on Wednesday evening, so it will be impossible for me to dine with you on Thursday.

Cordially yours,

Corinne de Beaulieu.

P. S.—Thanks for the Doucet gown. I should love to have inaugurated it with you.

Corinne.

"Confound these women," said Karakoff, as he threw the little perfumed note to the floor, "but then one can never count on them. What an admirable dispensation of a benign Providence that they are barred from the diplomatic corps; otherwise what complications would arise."

"No, Frederick," he said, turning to the valet, who had entered the room, "I shall see the first secretary later."

The valet withdrew and Karakoff dashed off the following note to Blanche Devereux:

To Mlle. Blanche Devereux, Rue Rembrandt.
My Dear Blanchette:

I shall be ill with fever unless you come to my rescue. Already we have three defections from Thursday. Madame Clarisse Lambert refuses positively to dine with Mlle. Marie Parmentier, and as the latter has already accepted the invitation, it cannot be recalled. We will therefore postpone the dinner until Tuesday the twenty-sixth, replacing Mlle. Parmentier by Louise Bassetiére; I shall notify the men and shall request you to notify the women. How embarrassing! I am now occupied with the menu cards, and soon hope to have them finished. I would never have believed, except with this experience, that a dinner was so difficult to organize. With a thousand kisses,

Ladislaus.

To Adolphe, Maitre d'Hotel, Cafe Russe, Paris:

Dinner postponed until Tuesday, twenty-sixth. Same menu, same guests, except Marie Parmentier, who will be replaced by Louise Bassetiére. Notify florist.

Prince Karakoff.

There was a small tempest at Mlle. Blanche Devereux' apartment, in the rue Rembrandt, when the Ambassador's note arrived. "Just like a man," said the tall, willowy Blanche as she tossed Karakoff's note on her glittering dressing-table; "they are forever putting the disagreeable things on women. Why

The following day Prince Karakoff was greatly relieved when he received Mlle. Devereux' response, which ran:

To Prince Karakoff, Russian Embassy, Paris.

My Dear Laddy:

I jumped into my coupe yesterday and made the tour of our invited guests. You should have seen their faces when I announced the postponement of the dinner; Inez Bouvier's would easily have served for the model of a Fury. The cats! I really believe that they thought that I was at the bottom of it. Well—in the end I succeeded in arranging all to your satisfaction. Queer idea of yours, to substitute Louise Bassettiere for Marie Parmentier; at half-past eight she will telephone you that she is unable to come. However, this is your affair, not mine. Ah! Laddy, how delighted you will be when you see the extremely pretty gown which I have ordered from Doucet for this special occasion. It is of palest green, the color you like me best in. I told Doucet that I was not at all particular as to the price, for as hostess I wished to do you honor. Was I not right, Laddy dear? With a million kisses,

Affectionately,
Blanchette.

"A rather expensive toy," thought his Imperial Majesty's representative as he folded the letter and placed it with others of its kind.

How the rain poured on the morning of May twenty-first and how sincerely Karakoff congratulated himself that the famous dinner had been postponed. The inclement weather continued on the following day, and the messenger who brought Colonel Frankratieff's note was drenched to his very bones. The Ambassador nervously seized it from his valet's hand and sighed with relief as he recognized his old friend's handwriting. Breaking the seal, the letter ran:

My Dear Prince:

I have already had a most disagreeable experience and hope that it may not be repeated. Your telegram saying, "Dinner today," was duly received. Through the pouring rain I drove last night to the Cafe Russe and was informed by Adolphe that the dinner had been postponed until Tuesday the twenty-sixth. Confound these operators and their stupid mistakes. However, I shall be none the less happy to drink with you on the twenty-sixth, to the Czar, to the success of the Russian arms, and to the beautiful women of sympathetic France.

Your old companion in arms,

Colonel Fankratieff.

Monday, the twenty-fifth, found the Embassy in a wild state of excitement and almost as dismal within, as the peeping clouds without; the gutters were miniature rivers, and the carriage which took the Ambassador to the station had difficulty in making its way through the streets.

In the rainy twilight poor Karakoff sat silent on the brown cushions of the brougham, his eyes fixed mournfully on the twinkling lights of gay Paris, for a telegram received from Saint Petersburg ordered him to take immediate command of his regiment at Kronstadt, there to hold himself in readiness for the Orient. The dispatch gave him no time even for a short visit to Mlle. Devereux. However, before leaving Paris he managed to send her the following note:

To Mlle. Blanche Devereux, Rue Rembrandt.

My Dear Blanchette:

I leave Paris immediately for Kronstadt. I feel desolate and am woefully disappointed at my sudden departure. Kindly express my regrets to our guests. I hope the dinner may be a success; in the words of Marais, in "Michael Strogoff," I leave France "for God, for the Czar, and for my country." Adieu Blanchette. A thousand kisses.

Ladislaus.

Ade's Lampoon

After witnessing a performance of "The County Chairman" I am impelled to hope that Mr. George Ade will ignore the pleadings of his friends to write a serious play. Why spoil a satirist by persuading him to change his view-point? Leave social problems to other writers, Mr. Ade, and stick to satirical frivolity. You can never crowd too many laughs into life. The serious mood for you would be a pose, and it would not be becoming. We need more such plays as "The County Chairman" to divert us from the tragedies of life, and to interest us in refreshing trifles. This work of the Hoosier humorist is one of the most exhilarating satires on the ways of the American politician that was ever written. There is no attempt at subtlety in the satire. It is broad and obvious, essentially a good-natured, dramatic lampoon, in which sentiment and humor are suavely blended. It owes its interest to its fine familiarity with every-day life in the rural regions, and it avoids the grotesques and arabesques into which the playwright's comic temperament might easily have beguiled him. Though somewhat crude in construction, as this early performance of the Hoosier comedy writer undoubtedly is, it encourages the expectation of development. We have long known Mr. Ade as a merry-maker observant of the absurdities of people, but we had no idea that, in the creation of character, he could use suggestion from actuality with such skill as he displays in depicting in "The County Chairman" some of the humorous features of political excitement, as it rages in every small community in the country. There is not a character in the play that is not familiar to us, but not as stage creations. They are people we have met. Other playwrights have attempted to employ them for stage purposes, but none ever succeeded as Mr. Ade has. Even the shop-worn American drummer has received new treatment at the hands of the Hoosier playwright. His confidence in the persuasive charms of his personality was never more effectively exploited, and I can recall no truer transcript from rural life than the airy milliner who is partial to drummers because they are so refined, and who has met so many that she mixes their names. The Honorable Jim Hackler is a fine type of the cow-county politician, somewhat idealized for stage purposes, but not beyond recognition. He knows all the tricks of the trade, from circulating boomerang roasts on his own candidate to springing embarrassing surprises at the campaign meetings of the opposition. He is the veteran campaigner who does not take politics too seriously. The part is admirably played by Theodore Roberts. He is the breezy, bucolic politician to the life. Another splendid characterization is that of Sassafras Livingstone, the colored "macer" skilled in the art of administering the gentle "touch." As played by George Thatcher it is as notable in its realism as was Will H. Bray's creation in "The Texas Steer." On the whole the company gives a fine performance, and so keenly did I enjoy it that I am now eager for the coming of Ade's latest, "The College Widow," which is said to be a highly-colored picture of the athletic mania in our colleges. Theodore Bonnet.

The Majestic Stock

Last week the members of the Majestic stock company were in the atmosphere of the gloomy court of the King of Denmark, and they were not more at their ease than they are now in the up-to-date atmosphere of the modern drawing-room. The play, "An American Citizen," is probably one of the best that Madeline Ryley ever wrote, and it has certainly stood the test of star and stock portrayal. The Majestic people are particularly happy in their presentation of the comedy. Howard Gould as the American Citizen was distinctly good. His comedy was deftly handled and his performance on the whole was telling. The sentimental parts he handled with good taste and discretion and in several bits of business (I think they were his own) he was most effective. Amelia Gardner as Beatrice was interesting and sympathetic. Miss Gardner is a graceful actress and has, to no small degree, that gift of the gods—magnetism. Mr. Gilmour, who took the part of Hamlet last week, does well in the small role assigned to him. Frank MacVickers never did better than in the part of Peter Barbury; in fact he is the best Barbury I have ever seen. His humor is genuine and is never overdone for an instant.

Melodrama Has Its Place

Those who sneer at melodramas are the same as those who refuse to see any good in a dime novel. The melodrama is the dime novel of the stage. Both are equally harmless to the morals of auditor or reader. I am reminded of this every time I attend the Central when a real melodrama is the attraction, a play in which hero and heroine, thrust into the most frightful temptations and situations, pursued by villains and villainesses, always emerge triumphantly at the end, with virtue downing vice by its own great might. He who is not able to see good in a melodrama lacks mental balance. The melodrama is the play of the people. It deals with their own class, and does not worry the mind with abstruse problems. It delights the eye with realistic scenery, and stirs the heart with pathetic situations. "Her Marriage Vow," at the Central this week, is a melodrama of the thrilling class, with scenic effects that include two real locomotives hissing and steaming across the stage, the prelude to a rescue something like the one in "Under the Gaslight." Miss Clifton and Mayall as the hero and heroine, and Shumer as the arch-villain, who in the end is thrown over a precipice to meet his deserts, scored big hits on Monday night. The most of the applause and flowers, however, went to Myrtle Vane, the sprightly soubrette who reappeared in the company after a considerable absence.

The sixth annual benefit of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco, in aid of their charity fund for the sick and needy in the profession, will take place at the Orpheum, Tuesday afternoon, December sixth. The program will be made up from the best people and acts then playing at the principal theatres.

PERCY W. TREAT, Secretary

MARY K. TAYLOR

Who will play Mabel Wilson in "The Fatal Wedding" at the Grand Opera House, week beginning tomorrow matinee.

"The County Chairman" will run another week at the Columbia, when will come Maxine Elliott in "Her Own Way," by Clyde Fitch.

"Hearts Aflame," at the Majestic, was first introduced to New York by Arnold Daly, and at once aroused discussion by reason of the problem its plot reveals. Its production will furthermore serve to reintroduce Adele Block to the San Francisco public, as she comes to the Majestic in the capacity of leading woman. She is one of the most talented of stock actresses and is a pronounced favorite with San Franciscans. In "Hearts Aflame" some of the elegancies of her modern wardrobe will be displayed.

Edwin Clark, at the Tivoli, now introduces into the second act of "The Messenger Boy" a new song, "Cordelia Malone," considered to be the most successful number interpolated into a New York success in many years. It is a rollicking Irish love song. There will be but two more weeks of "The Messenger Boy." "King Dodo" will follow.

"The Climbers" was the most popular of the plays Amelia Bingham produced at the Columbia. In it Clyde Fitch has done some of the best work of his life. Its heart interest is compelling. At the Alcazar "The Climbers" will be staged with the care, completeness and artistic beauty which make the productions here challenge comparison with high priced New York offerings. Thanksgiving week brings a distinct novelty, "The Village Postmaster," which has never been seen in San Francisco.

"Winchester," at the Central, is a military drama containing many thrilling situations. Ethel Clifton will have an opportunity to do some especially strong work. One of the sentimental scenes of the play is a wild ride for life.

Mr. and Mrs. Mark Murphy will reappear at the Orpheum, after a long absence, in "Why Doogan Swore Off," by R. Melville Baker, author of "Foxy Grandpa" and "Sunny Jim." The three Ramoniers, extraordinary athletes, from London, appear for the first time in America. While one member of the company balances on his shoulders a sixteen foot ladder to the top of which is attached a horizontal bar, the others do bar work and finally, with a second ladder crosswise upon the rung of the first, the man balances by standing on one end while the woman does difficult feats on a trapeze suspended from the other end. Augusta Glose will give her original musical monologue. She sings a few bright little songs accompanying herself on the piano and then, in sprightly fashion, mimics the walks of various types of girls. Carlisle's dogs and ponies will astonish San Francisco for the first time.

At the Chutes the Petching brothers, with their "musical flower garden," will remain, and among the newcomers will be Duke Johnson and Mae Wells, announced as "colored criterion singers and dancers," Mr. and Mrs. John T. Chick, comedy sketch artists, presenting "Matrimonial Mishaps," and Edna Grant, character dancer.

AUGUSTA GLOSE

Who will offer her original musical monologue at the Orpheum next week.

LILLIAN LAWRENCE

Is the best of all the excellent leading women whom the Alcazar has introduced to San Francisco. Her personality, method and magnetism are alike admirable. Our playgoers are beginning to understand why five thousand Bostonians signed a petition for her return to the Castle Square stock this season. Miss Lawrence does not regret her decision to come here and build up a new clientele. Her local popularity is increasing every week.

Ben Greet's Players in "The Star of Bethlehem"

After the most successful tour of any company visiting Southern California this season the Ben Greet company of English players will appear at the Macdonough in Oakland on Monday night in "Everyman" and Tuesday night in "Twelfth Night." On Saturday, the nineteenth, "Hamlet" will be given at the Stanford University. On Monday night, November twenty-eighth, the company will return to this city for one week to produce the miracle play of the Nativity entitled "The Star of Bethlehem," reproduced from the old English cycles of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries by Charles Mills Gayley, Professor of English literature in the University of California. When Mr. Greet wanted a play of this nature he did not go to Oxford or Harvard, but consulted with the able professor of our own State University, and the result is a work that California may well be proud of. While "The Star of Bethlehem" is a companion-picture to "Everyman," it is not so sombre but is full of the joyousness of Christmastide. The music is beautiful and is rendered by a choir of singers and string instruments. It has been selected from the works of Palestrina, Lord Mornington, Gounod, Novello, Adam and several fragments dated back to the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The costuming is elegant and special scenery has been devised for this production. The scenes are laid near Bethlehem, in the desert; in Herod's palace, and a manger at Bethlehem. Mr. Greet will spare no effort to make this production most impressive and excellent in every detail. Manager Greenbaum will give special attention to the musical portion. The performances will be given at Lyric hall and matinees will be on Wednesday, Friday and Saturday. The sale of seats opens at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Wednesday, November twenty-third. Prices will be one dollar and a half, one dollar, and seventy-five cents.

What will you give her? We will suggest something in leather goods. A nice satchel or hand bag or suitcase. Nothing finer in the city. Tourist Outfitting Co., 227 Montgomery St.

The Alameda Lustpiel Ensemble, that clever group of players which appeared with so much success in "Im Weissen Roessel" and "Als ich Wiederkam," at the Columbia last season, will give two performances in the near future at the same theatre. Preparations are on foot to present the comedy "Grosstadtluft" at the Columbia on Sunday night the twenty-seventh. On the following Sunday night the company will present, by special request, "Im Weissen Roessel."

When Mansfield Produced "Karl"

It was under E. D. Price's management that Mansfield first produced "Prince Karl" in 1886. Beatrice Cameron (now Mrs. Mansfield) was the original Florence. Gen. George A. Sheridan's daughter, Emma, now retired, was the Alicia. Cyril Scott, then a youngster and now a musical comedy matinee idol, was the Spotts. Joseph Frankan, the J. Cool Dragon, and three others of the cast, have passed over the Divide. Manager Price has been making comparisons this week, and he says that as an all-around production the Alcazar's production is superior to that of Mansfield. Naturally Mr. Price is partial in his views, but he is enthusiastic over the work of the stock company. "The stock players get more laughs and act with more unflagging vivacity," he says. "I consider Mr. Craig's masquerading Prince just as good as Mansfield's and the Widow was never so charmingly played as by Miss Lawrence. As for Osbourne's innkeeper, it is a gem of character acting. There was nothing in the original cast to compare with it. 'Prince Karl' is a very notable example of what thoroughly skilled stock actors can accomplish with six days' preparation. Mansfield rehearsed his people four weeks and several of them made a sorry mess of it on the opening night. Score another bull's eye for stock."

The War Still On

'Tis a merry game of chess that Belasco, Mayer and Price are playing against "Ollie" Morosco, and check and counter check continue to the great interest of the lookers-on at the game. First Belasco lured Amelia Gardner from Morosco. The latter retaliated by securing Adele Block for the Majestic and Oza Waldrop as ingenue for his Los Angeles theatre. The next move is now awaited. Faye Wallace, by the way, took Oza Waldrop's place in "Lover's Lane" at short notice and scored a hit as Simplicity. Miss Wallace is the pretty little girl who appeared at the Grand with the Neills during their recent engagement.

The Los Angeles Battle-Ground

The rivalry between the Belasco and Morosco forces is keener in Los Angeles than in San Francisco. Meanwhile the "profess" is looking on in great glee, for salaries are on the rise. When Oza Waldrop was lured away from the Belasco company it was hinted in the Los Angeles papers that she was dismissed on account of the prospect of being involved in a sensational divorce suit. This story has been vigorously denied. Morosco is getting ready for the production of "Ghosts" and he has secured L. R. Stockwell for the presentation of "A Temperance Town" in Los Angeles. Meanwhile Manager Price is preparing for the production of Francis Powers's "First Born" at the Belasco.

Fairclough Did the Same

According to Mr. Gilmour, of the Majestic, his Hamlet exhibited certain original features. For instance, in embracing his mother at the close of the closet scene he introduced an entirely original bit of business. A veteran, retired thespian assures me that Mr. Gilmour is mistaken in believing that he was the first melancholy Dane to embrace his mother in that scene. According to my informant one Boothroyd Fairclough, an eminent American tragedian better known in London than in his native country, was similarly demonstrative.

Kelly at the Orpheum

In the galaxy of Weberfieldian stars John T. Kelly was not of great candle power, the reason being that he was not given much opportunity to exploit the full strength of his illuminant qualities. But we who remembered Kelly in his "You and I" days knew that he was a star of the first magnitude, a fact that he is now demonstrating to the satisfaction of Orpheum patrons. His performance is one of the funniest that has been given at the Orpheum in a long time. The Navajo girls, a pretty dozen, which includes the Two Roses of a few seasons back, have a novel musical act with charming settings and stunning costumes. The Scottish Nightingale, who sings the old Scotch songs, is another new number.

Craig in a Mansfield Role

It was only on rare occasions that Richard Mansfield played "Prince Karl." Probably his idea in retaining it in his repertory was in case he needed relaxation between his more exacting roles. "Prince Karl" is comedy, just comedy, and the hero, though whimsical, is lovable enough. Craig of the Alcazar looks the German thoroughly, but occasionally his accent loses the Teutonic note. All there is of importance in the play falls to Craig. As Archie Gunter wrote the comedy for a star, and that star Richard Mansfield, it can easily be seen why the others have so little to do. Miss Lawrence is thoroughly attuned to the role of the widow, and Miss Belgarde is a handsome picture as Mrs. Lowell. Miss Woodson as the Vassar girl has a congenial part, and Osbourne as the hotel keeper does artistic work as usual.

Coming of Blanche Bates

The friends of Blanche Bates are looking forward eagerly to her appearance at the Grand in Belasco's famous "Darling of the Gods," the play in which her artistry scored its greatest triumph. She will open her engagement here on December nineteenth. The Grand has several fine attractions coming, by the way. Hilda Thomas will open in "The Show Girl" on the twentieth of this month, and two weeks later Williams and Walker, the colored gentlemen who were all the rage in London about a year ago will appear in the piece that captivated the Britishers, "In Dahomey."

—The Playgoer.

The title of the recently announced book by Dr. Albert Shaw has been changed from "Commercialism and Morality" to "The Business Career in Its Public Relations." The publishers Paul Elder and Company, announce that through unavoidable delays, the publication date has been postponed to November twenty-fifth.

Anna Morrison Reed's little magazine, The Northern Crown, has issued its third number. Mrs. Reed is doing a good work in describing the resources and beauties of Northern California.

CROWN JEWELS PAWNED BY MONARCHS.

It is a well known fact that rulers have been compelled to pawn the royal jewels in times of need to carry on affairs of state importance. The private citizen of today need not feel skeptical about doing likewise if necessary. A special department for this purpose exists at the Baldwin Jewelry Store, 906 Market street, where liberal advances can be obtained at banking rates.

Miss Slater's Recital

A large audience attended the recital given last week by Miss Rita Slater, pianiste, and Miss Grace Freeman, violiniste, accompanied by Miss Lucy Hannibal. Miss Freeman, a pupil of Giulio Minetti, is one of the best known of our younger artists. Her numbers were a Grieg Sonata for piano and violin (op. 45), Rondo Capriccioso (Saint-Saens), Romanza Andaluza (Sarasate), Canzonetta (D'Ambrosio) and as a triumphant finale Ries's Perpetuum Mobile. Miss Freeman's style of playing has a distinction and refinement peculiar to herself. These qualities were especially apparent in the Saint-Saens Rondo. Miss Hannibal, a pupil of Mr. W. J. McCoy, accompanied in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. Miss Slater, also a pupil of Mr. McCoy, is a fluent and facile pianiste. Her surprise was her own composition, modestly termed on the program a piano piece. It was in etude form, and was really a clever achievement. If a little reminiscent of Chopin, that is no more than can be said of more pretentious composers. It made a very effective number and was played con amore. Her remaining numbers were the Bach Prelude and Fugue in C sharp (very neatly played), the Beethoven Sonata in E flat (op. 31, No. 3), Prelude (Rachmaninoff), a Chopin Valse (op. 34, No. 2), and the Liszt Polonaise in E major.

A Pupil Recital

The recital by pupils of Madame Abbie Carrington, assisted by Mr. Emlyn Lewys, on Tuesday evening of last week was attended by a large audience. Carl Crichton opened the program with the prologue from "I Pagliacci"; some of his notes were pure and well sustained, but he lacks warmth. Doubtless fervor will come with the practice that gives a singer the necessary self-confidence. Ralph Worsley gave Coleridge Taylor's "Eleanore" in dramatic style and with ability. He may be described as a "tender tenor with an accent." His voice is very sweet and he uses it with skill. Upon the one word "Eleanore" was lavished a wealth of expression and a cry of passionate longing that was irresistible. Miss Clara Lewys sang Ponchielli's "Blind Girl's Song" from "La Gioconda," and Willeby's "Fairy Love Song" most acceptably. Her voice is pleasing in quality and shows much flexibility. As an encore she sang a Scotch love song. Mr. Lewys should have been flattered by the applause that greeted him, and which followed him, compelling him to respond to several encores. He gave as his first number Rachmaninoff's Prelude, C sharp minor, and for the second Liszt's Valse Impromptu. His playing is marked by smoothness and a mastery of technique. Otis Carrington rendered the Romanza from Donizetti's "L'Elisir d'Amore" with ability, showing himself an adept in runs and cadenzas. His encore was the old favorite "Marguerite." The prima donna of the recital was far and away Mrs. Cora Hall. Her voice is sweet, melodious and well trained. Her manner was perfect in ease and repose. She sang Donizetti's aria "Regnava nel silenzio" (from "Lucia"), and for an encore "The Maid of Dundee." She was also heard in the quartet from "Rigoletto," in which she was supported by Miss Lewys, Mr. Worsley and Mr. Crichton. Cecil Smith sang Gounod's aria "She alone charmeth my sadness" from "The Queen of Sheba" in a clear, pleasing bass.

A concert for the benefit of the California Endeavorers' Christian Hospital will be given by Miss Normani, pupil of Signor Paola La Villa, in the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium next Thursday evening. The artists will be: Miss Normani, Herbert Williams, S. P. Walsh, Miss Schorcht, Professor Martinez and Professor La Villa.

Vladimir de Pachman, the pianist, conceded to be the greatest living exponent of Chopin, is creating a veritable sensation with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which organization he is on tour. De Pachmann possesses a peculiar fascinating quality which appeals not only to the cultured musician but to the layman as well. He will play in this city during the latter part of January at Lyric hall.

The series of concerts at the St. Francis hotel by the St. Francis Musical Art Society promise to be the fashionable events of the season. The membership is limited to four hundred and the list is rapidly filling. Applications for membership should be made without delay to Will L. Greenbaum, care of the St. Francis hotel. The first concert will be on Wednesday night, December twenty-eighth, and Gadski will furnish the program. The other attractions offered during the season are the Dolmet-sches, De Pachmann, Kreisler, David Bispham and the famous Kneisel Quartet; membership entitling to the entire six recep-tions is ten dollars.

Burton Holmes will give a series of his Travelogues at Lyric hall in January. He writes Manager Greenbaum that his pictures of Ireland are particularly beautiful.

Mrs. Louise Marriner Campbell gave an at home on Wednes-day night in honor of Madame Alexia Bassian Danly of London, who is on her way to Australia to fill an engagement in opera. When Mrs. Campbell was in Paris some time ago she met Mad-ame Danly, who was then about to appear, fresh from Madame Marchesi's studio, at the Opera Comique in "Carmen." However she changed her plans, making her debut in London instead, where for two years she met with much success.

Next Thursday evening, in Century hall, Mary Broeck Pas-more will give a violin recital, assisted by Lillian Spink, violin; Dorothy Pasmore, 'cello; Charles Trowbridge, tenor; John Ray Lewis, viola; Ada Clement and H. B. Pasmore, accompanists. The program will be: Nocturne op. 27, No. 2, Chopin; Cor-rente and Sarabande from sonata in D minor, Bach; recitative and aria from "The Messiah," Handel; concerto in the form of a vocal scena, Spohr; songs from the "Dichterliebe," Schumann; Hungarian Dances, Nos. 2 and 8, Brahms-Joachim; quartet op. 18 No. 4, Beethoven.

At Lyric hall on Thursday evening was given the second invi-tational recital by H. B. Pasmore's pupils, too late to be re-viewed in this week's issue.

The Jacobi Recital

The recital to be given by young Milton Jacobi, Hugo Mans-feldt's piano pupil, in Steinway hall next Tuesday evening, is awakening much interest among musical people. The program arranged for the recital is. Impromptu, G major, op. 90, No. 3, Schubert, Capriccio, F minor, op. 113, No. 1, Rheinberger (for the left hand only) Valse de Concert, A flat, op. 15, S. Five of the compositions to be rendered have never before been given in San Francisco.

Manager Greenbaum has received the three programs for the concerts by Madame Gadski. They are of exceptional inter-est, one being entirely Wagnerian. Selmar Meyrowitz will be the pianist.

Women's Club Music

Mrs. Walter Longbotham sang a group of three Irish songs at last Saturday's meeting of the Saturday Club of Sacramento, and the reception accorded her was very cordial. Miss Rosen-thal, a niece of Toby Rosenthal the artist, made a fine impres-sion at the Adelphian Club meeting, the same day, in Alameda. She has temperament, fire and vigor, and a charming tone.

He's a Benedict Now

On Wednesday of last week Andrew Bogart, the baritone of this city, was married, the bride being Miss Lorena Hiller of Boston. Miss Hiller came west to meet her bridegroom, and the ceremony was performed at the Bogart home. The happy pair are spending the honeymoon in the north, having visited Port-land, Seattle and Vancouver; later they will go to the interior cities of Canada. Their future home will be in San Francisco, where Mr. Bogart will resume his vocal classes about November twentieth. He is also to appear again at the Tivoli, later in the season.

The concert to be given by Miss Laura Kinze von Kisielnicka at Steinway hall on Tuesday evening, November twenty-second, is attracting great attention in musical circles. Miss von Kisielnicka, although from Dresden, Germany, is a living exemplification of the famous old Italian method of voice culture. She is said to possess a contralto voice of unusual power, range and tone and her production, interpretation, phrasing and enunciation have been pronounced by the best foreign and Eastern critics to be as near perfection as possible. Miss Hulda Anderson, pianist, will assist, as will also Mr. Hother Wismer, violinist. Mrs. Frank Washington will accompany Miss von Kisielnicka in her songs. The sale of seats will open at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s Monday morning, November twenty-first.

The second Kopta Quartet chamber music concert will be given in Lyric hall tomorrow, Sunday, afternoon, at three o'clock. Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, pianist, will assist the quartet.

The Mansfeldt Club will give its second piano recital on November twenty-fifth in Steinway hall. The pianists will be Ethel Duke, Helen Stocking, Joan Baldwin and Fernanda Pratt.

Theatre-goers will remember the splendid production of Pinero's "The Gay Lord Quex" during one of Henry Miller's seasons here. The feature of the first act was an up-to-date manicure establishment, such as they have in London. However, lest they forget, a gentle reminder will be found in "The Gay Lord Quex" manicure shop at 289 Post street, the fashionable manicure shop of San Francisco.

JUST READ THIS — YOU'LL BE GLAD

This is written to remind you that every man or woman needs at intervals a change of scene and climate in order to feel well and to do one's best. It's to remind you, too, that just after the early rains the California country, and particularly the region about Hotel del Monte, "field and tree, and sky and sea," is most alluring:

This is to tell you, also, that by reason of remarkable natural conditions, this present fall and winter season of 1904-05 is far advanced, so that the months of October, November, December and January are sure to be like Spring, with Summer peeping around the corner. The golf links sweeping over the hillside that slope from blue Monterey bay were never greener, meadow larks carol among the live-oaks, palms and pines send forth young buds and branches, flaming dahlias wave in the breeze. This isn't the season for midsummer gaiety, but it's just the time and the best time for you to take a week or so of idling rest, cheerfully mingled with sport on the golf links, on horseback, climbing the mountains that rise to the eastward, or angling for the game fish of the bay.

Remember this, that Hotel del Monte offers more natural attractions and more comforts and luxuries than any other resort in the world. Remember, too, that the climate here is delightful every day in the year, and should the warm rains keep you indoors, there's bowling for exercise, and miles of corridors and glass-enclosed porches. Remember, too, that this hotel is fashionable only because it offers the best; that it is popular because every one can here have a good time, any time, every time. Remember, too, that it's a home place, where the children can be happy, and families can enjoy themselves for months without disturbing household cares.

Why not plan to spend a week or two here? Get out your golf sticks and woo Mother Nature and good health on the luring links. Write for terms, or run down any Saturday or Sunday and see for yourself. Special Saturday-Monday rate from San Francisco, including railway fare and two days' board at the hotel, only ten dollars. Leave Third and Townsend-street depot at three o'clock (parlor car), reaching the hotel at six forty-eight.

R. A. Crothers made a trip to Niles, San Jose Mission and San Jose on Sunday last in his Winton touring car.

H. C. Tibbitts last week purchased a Locomobile gasoline machine from the Pioneer Automobile Company, and on Sunday last made a very successful trip to San Jose and return.

Charles C. Moore and party of friends were seen driving through the park and Presidio on Sunday last in Mr. Moore's Winton.

E. P. Brinegar of the Pioneer Company has received a letter from the Olds Motor Works, inviting him to be present in Detroit on November fifteenth and sixteenth, at which time the Oldsmobile people will entertain all their outside agents. They will furnish private cars from certain Eastern points for the occasion and all expenses of their representatives are to be paid by the company. Their idea is to get together all their representatives from different parts of the country and interchange ideas relative to Oldsmobile business. In the same letter, they state that they now have two styles of delivery wagons ready for shipment and, by December first, they will have two thousand machines ready to ship to different parts of the country, consequently prospective Oldsmobile purchasers for next season will be able to get machines early.

J. H. Durst and party of friends spent Sunday last touring through San Francisco and suburban towns, in Mr. Durst's new Winton. John Breuner made a trip to San Jose on Sunday last in his Winton.

The Stockton boat that left San Francisco at six o'clock last Monday evening had on board the big four-cylinder Columbia machine of L. L. Patrick of Goldfield. Walter Morris is in charge of the car that is now en route overland to the mining region in Utah. Arthur Mohrig is accompanying him. Last Tuesday morning the big automobile, that will soon ply between Tonopah and Goldfield, carrying passengers, left Sacramento on its hard journey of nearly five hundred miles to Goldfield. The machine is expected to reach its destination tomorrow or Monday. It was scheduled when the car left this city for it to run from Sacramento to Colfax, then into Nevada to Reno, to Carson City, Tonopah and Goldfield. The route takes the Columbia over the Sierra Nevada mountains and before Tonopah is reached snow will probably be encountered. The motorists however are prepared to meet the difficulties of steep mountain grades, sand stretches and rough roads. The run the Columbia is making this week is the first and hardest part of the transcontinental trip.

Now that the Winton Motor Carriage Company has made the announcement for next season, inquiries are coming in to the Pioneer Company thick and fast from all parts of the coast and a number of orders have already been booked. The company announces four types of machines: Model A, 40 h. p., $3,650; Model A (special), 40 h. p. with limousine top, etc., $4,650; Model B, 24 h. p., $2,650; Model C, 16 h. p., $1,950. The motors in all four models will be of the vertical water cooled type and located under the bonnet; transmission individual clutches. The machines will have side entrance tonneau, with entrance on either side; seat five passengers, two in front and three in tonneau; upholstery and trimmings to be deep and luxurious. The spring construction on the new model Wintons represents the greatest improvement made within half a century, and consists of a double spring of six leaves, so shackled that only three leaves are engaged when one or two passengers are carried, whereas six leaves are engaged as the load increases. The Winton Company controls the patents covering this great spring and no other automobile will ride as easy as the 1905 cars. Catalogues and advertising matter are expected to reach the coast some time this week.

Harold Plummer of the University of California has become an ardent lover of the motor car and whenever time permits he crosses the bay to enjoy a tour in his speedy Autocar. Last Sunday again he was seen with a number of college chums taking a spin in his chug-wagon.

A. W. Duck, one of the auto enthusiasts across the bay, has been enjoying touring about Oakland in his Autocar for some time and has now thoroughly mastered the operation of his car. On last Sunday he took his first trip of any great length in his machine, making the run to San Jose and back successfully.

The J. J. Moores have had such success with their four-passenger Autocar that last week they purchased another car of this make. "Jeff" Moore will now have the old car to run as much as his heart desires and the pilot of the new Autocar, which is of the latest model, will be Mrs. Moore. She has become proficient at handling her motor car and on Sunday ran the auto without the slightest hitch to Menlo and back.

Mrs. "Ned" Dimond, before leaving for the East last week, took the examination for park licenses and passed successfully. Mrs. Dimond claims it is child's play to operate her Autocar runabout. Examiner Saville was well satisfied with the way Mrs. Dimond put her little car through all the required tests.

Robert Hamilton, accompanied by a party of friends, was enjoying a trip in his Autocar on Sunday.

The Commercial Advertiser, of Honolulu, in a recent issue gave a most interesting account of a nerve wrecking trip of C. W. C. Deering of Chicago in his White touring car. The story runs: "Although the motor car tour of the island of Hawaii planned by C. W. C. Deering of Chicago and Prince David Kawanakoa in the former's White did not entirely materialize, yet Mr. Deering drove his car over one road from Hilo to Waimea in a manner which entitles him to credit as exhibiting plenty of nerve and skill. The Deerings' car is the first touring motor which has ever visited the big island and that visit demonstrated the need of good roads for the whole circuit of the island before automobiling there can be unmixed pleasure. Automobiling to the Volcano is an apt phrase, which should be popular in the future if not at present, but which, however, may be made possible the coming year by the reconstruction of the Volcano road from Hilo. Mr. and Mrs. Deering and Prince and Princess Kawanakoa returned from Hawaii last Saturday. The White car was also brought back and yesterday was in the Von Hamm garage in the rear of the Alexander Young hotel, and despite the car's hard experience it shows little wear and tear. The tires are in almost as fine condition as when the vehicle left here. Captain Jargstorff, who is looking after the White autos here, said yesterday: 'Mr. Deering drove the car from Hilo to Waimea, and it is a wonder that he ever managed to get so far. It is a trip that I myself hesitated about taking. Mr. Deering and the Prince started from Hilo in the forenoon and had made seventy-two miles up to late in the afternoon. But this was over a road which was a mud wallow almost the entire course. It was a bad, rainy day. Boulders were hidden in the mud of the road, often scraping the under side of the car. These hidden dangers were trying on a man's nerves. A huge log was struck and hurled over the car. The grades at times were so steep that the wheels had to be roped to prevent the machine from slipping back in the mud. The party would have gone up to the Volcano in the car had there not been so many conflicting stories about the condition of the road. In the end it was decided not to try the run.'"

The first Model E 1905 White steam touring car to make its appearance on the Pacific slope arrived in San Francisco last week and it has attracted unusual attention among the motor car enthusiasts of this city. The new machine is painted white, and makes a most striking appearance. It is one of the most luxurious designs of automobiles ever made in America. The new White is a large automobile but nevertheless has not the appearance of being bulky. So many are the improvements on the 1905 model over last year's car that the two can hardly be compared. The mileage of the 1905 machine is nearly doubled on one filling of water and without a doubt the elimination of hand pumping on the steepest grades is the greatest improvement. The direct drive will do all the work that is required under ordinary circumstances while a-motoring, whereas the emergency gear is for very extraordinary work and enables the autoist to accomplish and surmount difficulties that no other automobiles can overcome. C. A. Hawkins, general manager of the White Sewing Machine Company of San Francisco, is thoroughly enthused over the new machine and said in regard to it: "I would not have believed before riding in the 1905 model the enormous difference between riding in the old White car and the new one. It is a good deal like a man accustomed to riding in box cars being transferred into a Pullman."

The National four-cylinder touring car, handled by the Rambler Automobile Agency, is creating a sensation on the coast. The demand proves greater than the supply. The latest man made happy is Dr. C. C. Marckres of San Jose, who purchased his car last week and drove it home Saturday last. The doctor says he could not have had a trip more enjoyable, and he is much elated over his new car.

Dr. Head of Chico purchased last week from the Rambler Automobile agency one of its Model K touring cars. A. H. Whitaker, U. S. N., stationed at Vallejo, purchased last week from the Rambler Automobile agency a Rambler runabout. J. H. Blake of Healdsburg is one of the latest purchasers of a Rambler runabout.

"In The Closed Room"

This is the story of a fanciful little child who felt that her dreams were realities and her waking hours the dreams. Judith Foster was an odd little atom, very much misplaced with her excellent and affectionate, though ordinary parents. She bore no resemblance to them or their people physically or mentally, unless perchance, it were an Aunt Hester, her mother's sister, dead in early girlhood before that mother herself was born. The little girl had heard of Aunt Hester and of her sudden death, drawn seated in her chair by the window and gazing upward as if about to speak, but Jane Foster, with better judgment than is ordinarily met with in her class, had refrained from discussing gruesome subjects with her seven-year-old daughter, and little Judith had filled out the picture from her own imagination. Unlike the other children in the flat building where she lived, she hated the elevated railroad which passed within a few feet of the windows, and found no pleasure in the noise and glare of the street, but with her doll clasped in her arms and her little chair drawn facing the wall, she would sit for hours and talk to Aunt Hester, and at night her dreams were of walks through grass and flowers and under the trees in some other land. Another friend she had, a little daughter of wealth with red-gold hair and a deep dimple in her cheek. The two little girls met only in spirit, yet they knew each other, and little golden-hair also entered the mystical land of dreams. Jane Foster, busy all day at her khirring machine and her endless pile of men's coats, had no time, even if she had had the understanding, to enter into her baby's thoughts, and congratulated herself that Judith, though unlike other children, was so little trouble. A change was suddenly brought about in the environment of the little girl. In the middle of the heated term Jim Foster returned one evening from the machine shop to find his wife in a state of collapse from the weather, but he brought with him a great relief in the shape of a proposition that they should become the care-takers of a fine mansion temporarily abandoned by its owners in consequence of a great sorrow. The offer was immediately taken advantage of, and the little Judith found herself free to wander at will over the place, for, being a conscientious and trustworthy child there was no danger of her meddling. One room alone, on the fourth floor, was locked and not to be entered. In accompanying her mother on their first inspection, Judith discovered in the library a portrait of her little girl friend and dream companion whom she immediately associated with the closed room, and thereafter, every day, she "went to play with her." According to her own story, "the closed room" opened to her, and therein were dolls and dishes and all the delights of a child's heart, and the little stranger came and went in some mysterious way, made herself understood without speech, and though she directed all the games, she touched none of the toys. The sorrow which had fallen on the owners of the mansion was the sudden death of their only child, the little golden-haired girl, and when the distracted young mother came back to her home and she and Mrs. Foster together went up to the closed room, they found the other little girl lying in silence, having wandered away with her invisible playmate to the land of her dreams. The illustrations in color, by Jessie Wilcox Smith, are in keeping with the text. It seems a pity that such an exquisite fancy should be subjected to even the possibility of becoming vulgarized by promiscuous handling. It ought to be reserved in some way for those who can appreciate it, though when it comes to that, there are none who love children that can fail of that. It is as far as possible from any of the late work of the author, Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, and though it once more shows her sympathy and understanding of little people, it bears no other resemblance to "Little Lord Fauntleroy." Published by McClure, Phillips & Company. "The Closed Room" made its appearance in two parts in McClure's Monthly for August and September of the present year.

The Blazed Trail Stories

Stewart Edward White has collected his short stories which have appeared in McClure's Magazine and elsewhere under the title, "Blazed Trail Stories." The first six are veritable Blazed Trail stories, dealing with life in the lumbering region, and the other seven Stories of the Wild Life, are tales of adventure in the West. The first of the Blazed Trail stories gives a graphic description of the lumberman's Fourth of July sport as well as of the breaking of an immense log jam. "The Foreman," "The Scaler" and "The River Boss," are character sketches of the

Take a Rest

A great many San Francisco people are planning to spend days and weeks during the Fall and Winter at Hotel Del Monte. No other resort in California offers such a combination of attractions—sea bathing, golf, automobilism, bowling, tennis, fishing, and all out-of-door sports. Instead of going from place to place seeking comforts, the wise ones of society spend their time at Del Monte by the sea. Address GEO. P. SNELL, Manager, Del Monte, California.

resourceful and capable men at work. Incidentally we meet with Harry Thorne, hero of "The Blazed Trail," Morrison & Daly, the big lumbering firm, Jimmy Powers and other old friends. "The Fifth Way" is a tragic story of the retribution which overtakes a dishonest guide. "The Life of the Winds of Heaven" introduces a girl, and the best one can say of her is that she had better have remained at home. There is Alfred, that contradictory guide of "The Westerners," so shy and modest in speech, and so resourceful and quick in action; Billy Knapp, as thick-skinned and indifferent as his partner was diffident, and Bismark Anne. The cowboys, the prospectors, the outlaws and the lumbermen are vividly alert and alive. They are all men of elemental natures, and evidently studies made at first hand. The lumberman belongs to Mr. White by right of discovery, but his Western types challenge comparison with Bret Harte, and Owen Wister. While this volume cannot, in the nature of things, be compared with the longer stories by the same author, there is every reason to congratulate ourselves on its acquisition. Mr. White has the faculty of awakening such an interest in his characters that they become veritable acquaintances of whom we are always glad to hear more. Like Jack London and James B. Connolly, Mr. White is at his weakest when dealing with sentimental matters. Published by McClure, Phillips & Company.

The House of Fulfillment

After dear, delightful little Emmy Lou, nothing that George Madden Martin writes will go a-begging for readers. "The House of Fulfillment" would stand alone on its own merits, but Emmy Lou has opened its door. The heroine of the new story is introduced to us at the age of nine, a very sweet and lovable little creature, so unfortunate in some respects that one longs to gather her up and give her all the coddling and petting that a child needs. The book is a succession of pictures, contrasts between the Northern and Southern temperament, between the old South and the new, between those "cumbered with many things" and those who know not responsibility. It is a love story in the best sense of that much abused term, for though there is no prying into the privacy of lovers and exposure of their intimate moments, it is quietly but insistently intimated that love is the essential thing in life and happiness in marriage is not attained through unions of expediency or convenience. Willy and Alexina come to the "House of Fulfillment" in the end, as do Harriet and Major Rathbone; there are no "horrible examples," but those who enter into alliances from other motives fall short of full happiness. Although extending over the period of the Civil war, the subject is mentioned only incidentally, and with none of the bitterness which used to appear in every tale of that time. Published by McClure, Phillips & Company.

The Book of Toasts

"Prosit" is a book of toasts compiled by Clotho, who has done her work well. She has ransacked the field of literature, ancient and modern, local and foreign, and has succeeded in gathering together a complete anthology. The result is both useful and interesting. The editor in an advance notice says that he does not dare to quote the contribution from Ambrose Bierce. Here it is: "Here's to woman!—ah, that we could fall into her arms without falling into her hands!" The cynic! Ednah Robinson has two pretty stanzas entitled, "My Treasure," and L. D. Ventura in most graceful Italian utters a sentiment worthy of Ben Jonson. The book is a veritable Christmas pie, filled up with good things. It is gotten up in appropriate style by Paul Elder & Company, and if I am no false prophet every copy will be snapped up for the holidays. No better Christmas gift could be thought of.

Life's Melody

Mary A. Rose, a local author, as the publisher's note informs me, has sent forth a brochure of sixty-five pages entitled, "Life's Melody." An effort called "The Celestial Hymn" occupies the last forty-five pages of the booklet. In it the story of man's fall and redemption is retold. It may be safely said that there are better versions, that of John Milton, for example. "The Celestial Hymn" tries to be verse; it succeeds in being prose cut into lengths. I defy any prosodist to scan it, or to tell to what variety of metre it belongs. The outside of the booklet is very pretty, a flexible binding of green and gold. A. M. Robertson deserves credit for his share of the work. —The Bookworm.

MURINE EYE REMEDY

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

Department No. 3. No. 92728.

MAY HARVEY ELY,

Plaintiff.

vs.

FRANCIS H. B. ELY,

Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said County in the office of the Clerk of the said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:
FRANCIS H. B. ELY, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, upon the ground of Defendant's willful desertion of Plaintiff for the period of more than one year continuously, next immediately preceding the date of the commencement of this action, and also upon the ground of Defendant's failure to provide for Plaintiff the common necessities of life he having the ability so to do, for the period of more than one year continuously next preceding the date of the commencement of this action; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 7th day of October in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four.

JOHN J. GREIF, Clerk.

By JAS. R. McELROY, Deputy Clerk.

Politics

Henry Seton Merriman, in "The Lost Hope":

In a sense politics must always represent the game that is most attractive to the careful gambler. For one may play at it without having anything to lose. It is one of the few games within the reach of the adventurous where no stake need be cast upon the table. The gambler who takes up a political career plays to win or not to win. He may jump up from the gutter and shout that he is the man of the moment, without offering any proof of his assertion beyond the loudness of a strident voice. And if no one listens to him he loses nothing but his breath.

A jack-in-office who has shouted himself into office is nearly always careful to be deaf to other voices than his own.

The best patriot is he who is ready to save his country at the cost of his own ease, whether of body or mind. It does not matter who or what you are; it is what or who the world thinks you to be, that is of importance. (Colville.)

From "Tattlings of a Retired Politician," by Forrest Cressley:

There's a good deal more human nature than patriotism in the average citizen, and when you bill him on any other valuation you're going to have a big shrinkage in the ballot-box.

I've kept my hands clean, but like the boy in the story, I've had to bandage them and tie them to the bedpost a good many times to do it.

After you've shot your rocket don't play with the stick. Start something new. Even the importunate widow of the parable had the good grace to let up after she'd landed what she was after. And it's mighty risky for politicians to rush in where widows fear to tread.

Any ordinary bunch of voters can forget to remember more things than a village money lender can remember to forget in making up a schedule of his personal property for the Tax Assessor.

Before I went into politics I used to think that Canada thistles were the hardest things in the world to kill down and the swiftest to spread; but I've since discovered that the political sore-head has a cinch on immortality that makes the thistle a thing of passing moment.

WHAT A SPELLBINDER IS.

A New York attorney who left these perplexing scenes recently for scenes which, if less perplexing, need not be more interesting, was the author of the word "spellbinder," says a writer in the Woman's Home Companion. This gentleman's name was McCaskie. The word "spellbinder" came into use when he was chairman of the county committee of New York. The dinerent speakers under the employ of his committee were in the habit of reporting the meetings which they had attended. These speakers were anxious to boom their stock with their manager, hence they would frequently say, among other things, "Oh, I bound them with a spell," or "I kept them spellbound." The reports of the majority of the speakers agreed in this particular. The manager, knowing the ground and motive of their self-laudatory reports, grew tired of them. One evening one of the Ciceros, more modest than the rest, came in. His name was, and still is, "Jake" Kemple. Upon seeing him, McCaskie inquired of him, "Well, how did you do out there tonight?"

"Oh, just fairly well," replied Mr. Kemple.

Mr. McCaskie looked surprised. Then he said, "Mr. Kemple, I shall raise your salary. I am sick of these 'spellbinders.'"

The reporters immediately got hold of the word. Ever since then (1888) the word "spellbinder" has been in vogue.

The word "roorback" originated in 1844, when a fictitious story was published for purposes of political intrigue, and which purported to be an extract from the travels of Baron Roorback. The Baron's name has thus become a synonym for a campaign lie, although he himself was innocent of any such guile. He was sinned against rather than a sinner.

Dean Swift wrote an account of the death of Partridge, the almanac-maker, as a satire on the living man. The almanac-maker remonstrated, but the account was widely read. This is considered to be the origin of the "political deaths" that have become a prominent feature in modern journalism.

Juggling Figures

As soon as the election returns were all in the wise men of the press proceeded to point the conclusions that should be drawn from the figures in the Registrar's office. That is usually the task assigned to the editorial writer immediately after an election; and he is skilled in the art of juggling figures in a way to make them appear corroborative of his views. But so many are the elements that enter into an election, so many are the influences that sway voters, so hidden are the mainsprings of human action, so potent at times are circumstances of a seemingly unimportant nature connected with the machinery of an election, that it is vain to attempt an analysis of the vote with a view to estimating public sentiment. The most significant feature of the recent election was the failure of the forces of corruption to elect to the bench men who were known to be absolutely unfit for judicial positions. It was clearly demonstrated that the allied villainies are impotent when public sentiment is aroused. But it is rash to conclude that Mayor Schmitz has no longer the support of the powerful element by whom he was elected to office. In a three-cornered fight with the issue between labor and capital clearly defined, it would not be wise to take Schmitz as a joke.

The Shame of Unionism

It is unfortunate that labor unionism should boast such a champion as Mayor Schmitz whose allegiance to the workingmen is no stronger than his fealty to the exponents of all that is vicious in the community. It is a reflection on the character of the unions that they show no disposition to rid themselves of such a representative and put forward a champion worthy of the respect and confidence of the community. If unionism would hold permanently a place in the respect and esteem of the public it would array itself on the side of good government, and repudiate those who offend the sense of decency. The opposition to unionism in this city today derives much of its strength from popular indignation over the demoralization into which the government has been precipitated by the acts of Labor's representatives in public office. Unionism will do well to remember that it includes only a small minority of this community, and that it has much to gain. Lacking public sympathy and public support the heaviest loss will ultimately fall on them. The principles of unionism ooze godliness and love of humanity. Unionism professedly seeks to elevate mankind, to raise the standard of human life to higher levels. But with such a champion as Mayor Schmitz mentored by Abraham Ruef it is hard to convince the general public that its objects and aspirations lie in that direction. Unions for legitimate ends and aims, conducted in a legitimate manner, will find little opposition and much encouragement, but its success or failure rests on the verdict of society. It can find no shorter or surer road to failure than by giving aid and comfort to men boldly engaged in seeking to corrupt the courts by elevating unfit men to the bench.

The Decollete Gown

British magazine writers are once more regaling their readers with anecdotes meant to indicate the vulgarity of Americans. One writer says he could not get accustomed to the extremely low-necked gowns of American women. What surprises him most is that "the old and fat matrons are the ones who show most," and he asserts that "New York women have an amiable contest raging to see who can wear the least clothing on the back." There is a good deal of truth in the British criticism of the cut of the modern bodice. Feminine shoulder-blades have become quite a commonplace spectacle, but if the British critics will glance through their Addison they will learn that more than two centuries ago stately British matrons set the fashion against which London writers are railing today. It was in Addison's time, by the way, that the tucker, which he described as "a ruffle on the uppermost edge of the stays covering the shoulders and bosom," was dispensed with, or as he expressed it, "This fig-leaf has been thrown aside." Addison pleaded early and often for the return of the tucker, and from his writings it appears that the highly respectable women of his day were as generous in their displays as are those who are said to be engaged in an amiable contest in New York. He reminded them that in Elizabeth's time women were clothed down to the wrists and up to their chin, and he complained that since the removal of the tucker, "the neck of a fine woman takes in almost half the body." At the same time the sly old rogue assured his readers that he could "look upon 'the yielding marble of a snowy breast' with absolute coldness"; that such sights were mere alabaster in his eyes, but he regretted that all beholders were not Nestors, and he warned the ladies that all men were not qualified with age and philosophy to be indifferent spectators to such allurements. Like the British critics of today who see vulgarity in the modishness of New York women, Mr. Addison noticed that "old and fat matrons are the ones that show most," and he expressed surprise, remarking that "nobody exposes wares that are appropriated." He related that Lyeurgus, knowing that the success of a republic depends on multitudes, prescribed a certain loose dress for Spartan maids in which there were rents which revealed their limbs when in motion. Such were the baits to incline young men to marriage, but after marriage the garments were closed up. But the subject of low-cut bodices was discussed from many viewpoints in Addison's day, and by numerous writers whose views were more profound and whose criticisms were more stinging than those of this generation, and yet the tucker was not restored. We have grown accustomed to the fashion, and we see nothing vulgar in it. In Addison's day it was as startling an innovation as was the adoption of the fig-leaf in Eve's time, but now the bust at the opera or wherever the decollete gown is appropriately worn, is alabaster to all of us.

The Scribbling Habit

A London firm of publishers has started a contest with a prize of one hundred pounds as an inducement, open to all writers who have not yet published a novel. The season for this species of game will close March thirty-first, 1905. There is no great danger that any masterpiece will be produced, for though a hundred pounds, approximately five hundred dollars, is far more than the average book nets to its author, not one time in a hundred thousand is anything worth while, whether in art or literature or music, brought forth in response to the stimulus of a prize. When contests are open to all, it is usually found that the successful ones are writers of experience and when the prize falls to an unknown it is reasonably certain to be some one who has been engaged in some form of composition, and who has kept an endless stream of manuscript pouring through the post office and back, for years, and has finally caught on to a few of the tricks which facilitate the reading of copy. Offering prizes for poems, novels, essays or criticism is much more likely to stimulate the production of bad manuscript than to unearth a genius. In the present stage of the world's history, writing is taking the position once occupied by "painting" or "sketching" as taught in the old-time young ladies' seminaries. It is like the wax flowers, shell baskets, bead work, and a dozen other of the now forgotten "accomplishments," busy-idlenesses which served our grandmothers with excuses to gently advertise the fact that they had been indulged with the extras when away at boarding schools. The pen products are no more valuable as literature than the other stuff was art. If some publisher would offer a substantial prize for those who have refrained from attempting to write, it would be a decided novelty, as well as an encouragement to the deserving. There is not the remotest danger that literary genius is pining for lack of opportunity. In any other field, the requisites, in the way of preparation and working tools, are expensive enough to offer some obstacle, but with lead pencils at a nickel a dozen and blank paper to be had for the taking, there is absolutely no protection against the onslaughts of the scribblers.

Chronic Invalidism

Dr. S. Weir Mitchell said in a recent lecture: "In all my experience as a physician, I have not seen more than a dozen men or women who have been improved morally by long-continued suffering. Acute illness and illness which brings the patient close to death often has a beneficial effect upon the disposition, but I cannot agree with the assertion which we frequently hear made in the pulpit, that suffering is usually the means of refining. I have seen a few isolated cases in which this was so, but it is not the rule by any means. The chronic invalid is almost always selfish and peevish, and it is a hard task to find a nurse who can stand the strain of such service." Doctors and nurses and members of the family meet the chronic invalid under different conditions from those which are present when the beloved pastor makes his call. Then, unless the patient is bereft of reason, and so irresponsible, there is more or less posing. It is a sort of "Sunday attitude," and moreover, the clerical caller is expected, as a matter of course, to be sympathetic and soothing. The doctor, on the other hand, has frequently to remonstrate, and the nurse to insist, while the members of the household must learn to deftly dodge hard words if not harder missiles. It stands to reason that any one who is continually experiencing severe pain will not have nerves under control. A twinge of toothache will banish all the platitudes of the moral philosopher, and let who will say to the contrary, there is a mighty relief in a mighty smash. But the chronic invalid is just as often a victim of egotism as of actual suffering. There is a degree of importance to be arrived at in no other way in lying propped in bed, or ensconced in a comfortable chair and becoming the centre of a small universe; and there is satisfaction in claiming pre-eminence in the matter of poor health. Not infrequently the chronic invalid is in reality the soundest member of the household — and the most selfish. It is so much easier to be waited on than to wait on others, so much pleasanter to be supported in comparative luxury than to contribute towards the support of the rest. It has been frequently noted that the "delicate" member of a family outlives the supposedly stronger ones, and it has happened more than once that the sister or brother or the mother or father who had been coddled at the expense of the others, saved from every exertion and shielded from every hardship, has lived to a good old age and spent the later years at profitable employment. "Delicacy," so called, is often a matter of appearance alone. A habit of complaining being, as the Southern poet whines put it, "allers a-gruntin'" is frequently all there is as a basis of chronic invalidism. If the chronic invalid would assume some regular occupation, if only the darning of the family stockings or the picking over of beans, shelling peas or some small labor that would divert attention from pains and aches, it would help to sweeten temper a bit. People are patient enough with the invalids who really suffer, not to be imposed upon by those who are simply lazy. Chronic invalidism, even when it is the genuine thing, is so often the direct result of vicious self-indulgence that the least the (im)patient may be expected to do is to make the best of his condition.

Correspondence Courses

While the post office authorities are about the business of squelching the get-rich frauds and other doubtful enterprises, they might do well to devote a little attention to the "by mail" offers which are so widely advertised. At the present moment there is hardly an occupation of any kind or description which cannot be "learned by mail," though on the face of it it is preposterous to assert that anything more than the most casual and superficial information can be conveyed in this manner. Offers are made to provide a whole college course, or teach "a profession" which will insure an income of over twenty-five dollars a week, to cure stammering or produce a crop of hair on a billiard ball, and one of the monthly magazines for October contains advertisements offering to impart a knowledge of twenty-seven separate subjects. There is one class of periodical which seems to attract doubtful advertisements, and a dozen offers of gold watches, diamond rings, and the like, for practically no equivalent, may be found in any issue, but the appearance of the sheets is in itself a sufficient warning of their irresponsibility. These other "by mail" offers are to be found in all the standard publications, and the natural supposition would be that the owners and managers had taken some means of investigating before accepting the advertisements. Probably they are honest enough in one respect—that they are good enough as far as they go. The difficulty lies in the impossibility of their going far enough. There are many subjects which can be learned from books. Any one with ordinary intelligence can read law without assistance, by mail or otherwise. A good treatise on rhetoric and a standard English grammar and dictionary of synonyms will enable any one with the ability to comprehend the language to write correctly, but not all the endowed colleges, nor special teachers, nor schools of journalism that are ever likely to be established can put "news-sense" into brains where it does not exist by nature, nor enable a prosaic mind to write poetry, nor a non-creative intellect to create plots. As far as there is anything to show to the contrary, these correspondence schools would undertake to teach piano-tuning to the deaf and painting to the blind, but the fallacy of writing to some one in Chicago in order to penetrate the mystery of selling real estate in San Francisco or Honolulu ought to be self-evident. The doctor book has proved its efficacy on shipboard and to the farmwives whose nearest doctor was miles away when the emergency arose, but it would take more than that to enable one to enter into practice. There is no subject on which information cannot be had from books. No one is so wise but that there is yet more to learn, and doctors, lawyers, bankers, insurance men, artists, musicians, photographers and architects, all apply themselves more or less diligently to the literature of their professions. Those who read are better informed than those who do not. As a supplement to practical instruction, or as a preparation to a career, where ordinary educational facilities are unavailable, a correspondence course ought to be an assistance. As a substitute for active participation in the handling of the materials with which final work must be done, it is a delusion and a snare.

As to Culturine

An entertaining writer of the Bulletin's staff warmly approves the coining of the word "culturine" to express the imitation culture that a good many persons affect. He abominates people of "culturine" who form themselves into log-rolling societies and organize associations of "intellectuals." In all probability he had in mind the Sequoia Club, which was organized at the instigation of a society girl, and which includes among its members the flower of Californian belles-lettres. No doubt there is a great deal of "culturine" in the Sequoia Club, but in a provincial city such as this it is no easy matter to round up a sufficient number of intellectuals to make a respectable showing. The Sequoia Club is fairly representative of the culture of this community, and it is an excellent institution for the exploitation of that peculiar pride that fills people with an eager desire of being seen in a sphere far above their capacities. In consequence of the proximity of two large universities we are quite scholarly, and it is hard for us to avoid "the danger of talking by book" against which Chesterfield warned his son. There is in our midst a great deal of that foppery of learning which boasts of an intimacy with the works of great geniuses, and which consists of empty shreds and patches. There is little real culture here, but there are among us many men and women of learning who have never digested what they have read, and who have not the power to make the knowledge of others their own. We have pedants galore, men and women who have acquired a great deal of knowledge from books, but knowledge is worthless that does not improve the person who has acquired it. Learning unaccompanied by common sense is more insufferable than ignorance. The world has long been pestered with pedants—men and women in quest of the admiration of the undiscerning. Pedants are of a gregarious nature and nobody should complain when they herd together to worship at the shrine of mediocrity that has won fame in book circles by counterfeiting literature.

Party Reorganization

The work of reorganizing the Democratic party has already begun. The radicals have taken the job in hand, and are pointing the way out of chaos. They assume that the sweeping victory of President Roosevelt was due solely to the absence of a distinct issue, and to the fact that many Democrats were disgusted because the leaders of both parties were inspired by the same motives and actuated by the same principles. The assumption is fairly well founded, but the radicals should not lose sight of the widespread impression that President Roosevelt is not in warm sympathy with the plutocrats of his party. There are many thousands of people imbued with the notion that Roosevelt's Republicanism is not of the Hanna-McKinley brand. They believe that his sympathies are with the plain people, and there having been no distinct issue they preferred the man they thought they knew to one with whom they had very slight acquaintance. It is a mistake to attempt the reorganization of the party along the lines suggested by the radical trust-busters. The party of Jefferson should not appeal to the firebrands of the country in the hope of achieving solidarity. The Democrats who have not deserted their party, and who will stay with it even when it is proposed to check the aggressions of the plutocracy by measures more stringent than Parker and his intimates would have cared to adopt, are not likely to continue their allegiance if compelled to herd under the banner of socialistic demagogues. A sane Democracy is what honest, sincere Democrats want; not a Democracy that vindicates its sanity by enlisting under the leadership of pompous predatory plutocrats, but one that affirms its devotion to fundamental principles, its scorn of corruption in public office and its hatred of illegal combinations engaged in buying special privileges and spreading demoralization. It is not necessary for the Democracy to identify itself with all the dissatisfied of America, or to win favor by promising to exploit every theory of government suggested by the disgruntled.

A Thanksgiving Homily

BY EDUGORE ROSSIE

Let us enter into the spirit of the season and be thankful. For what? That position inherent in the human race may not be as greater cause than those of which we complain, if for nothing else. There is not a more beautiful emblem, even than that of this country in setting apart one day in the year for Thanksgiving to feel for all blessings that have been vouchsafed the nation. Perhaps we do not enter into the spirit of the occasion with a proper regard for its significance. Religion enthusiasm is on the wane, and we are inclined to take things as they come. As things we were entitled to the good, and justified in complaining at the bad. The tendency to pessimism seems to have become more pronounced, and it occurs to me that it would be well if the national holiday were regularly made the occasion for directing popular thought into more cheerful channels.

It is pleasant to preach optimism even though your theories are easily upset, and it is not hard to cultivate an optimistic spirit if you feel not yourself to the fact. To accustom yourself to see things in a pleasing light is to find something in every occurrence to credit your good fortune. There is much good nature and kindness in the world to rely on, but there should be more, and we should be more amiable to one another, none of us being essentially better than his fellows or worse. We must not be led into the presumption that all men who are not virtuous are wicked. Good and evil have been pretty fairly distributed, and general recognition of that fact is desirably to be wished, for it would result in a more amiable relationship, and an abatement of hypocrisy.

We should be thankful that civilization holds in check many of the passions. Selfishness, which is the source of much of the unhappiness in the world, is curbed in a measure by the refinements of civilization. We are better, against the selfishness of the rich, but it is a passion by which we are all actuated to some extent. It influences and dominates the actions of all mankind. If there were no selfishness in the world legislation would be unnecessary. It is the mainspring of our most praiseworthy actions. Affection for family and children is dictated by it. To the selfishness of others we attribute our own misfortunes, and to our own selfishness is due much of the unhappiness of others. And if there were more of the spirit of religion in this land and time, of the religion that made charity the basis of friendship, that exhibits to our view the two-fold picture of terrestrial grief, and for only peace, creating in the heart a sense of present evil, and distant hope, of the religion that has been applied to the softening and moderation of all the evil of our nature, there would be less cause for complaint on the score of selfishness, the most detestable of all the passions. To be thoroughly imbued with the spirit of religion is to be optimistic, and the optimistic is thankful for many little things, the influence of which some people do not realize, and yet which are potent in human affairs. Happiness lies in the little things of which life is made up rather than in grand achievements.

One need not carry his optimism to excess in order to refrain from weeping at the Thanksgiving Proclamation. Despite the seeming preponderance of evil of all sorts, there is much to be thankful for. We should be thankful that there is revolt against corruption wherever it exists, a circumstance conclusive of the fact that the people are not indifferent to demoralizing influences in position, or that public sentiment is discerned. That we are shocked at the demoralization that exists is proof of a high moral tone, and there is always a prospect of reformation when the vice of the law are not acquiesced in by the many.

There is cause for thankfulness that the people generally are increased against evils that menace the stability of the government. We should be thankful that municipal uncleanliness has excited resentment throughout the land, and that there is earnest striving for governmental purification wherever the pirates of politics are engaged in prosecuting their predatory enterprises.

As the late lamented Senator Hoar told us a few months before his death, corruption is not so rampant in public office as it was when he first entered upon his official career. According to his testimony, a higher moral tone prevailed among the people, and there is less rottenness in the public service. For that we should be thankful. At the same time we should not be too exacting. Absolute contentment is not for this life, and Schopenhauer assures us that if we were free from tribulations we would go mad. Let us then be thankful that life is not the here it would be if all our desires were gratified. Let us feel that it is better to hope for nothing and be agreeably surprised, than to hope too much and be disappointed. In that amiable spirit we may discover, upon reflection, that we have much to be thankful for. Republicanism may be thankful that Parker was the Democratic standard-bearer, and Democrats may be thankful that Roosevelt created no greater havoc in the South. Those of us who are not plutocrats should be thankful that the struggle for existence is not more strenuous, that creature comforts are becoming more commonplace, and that though the rich are becoming more affluent, the poor are not growing poorer. Even those who are no longer young may find that old age is an incentive to thankfulness if they but consider life a bore, and persuade themselves that there are serene joys of senescence when the flesh is immune to searing passions.

Open Letters to Men of Mark. No. 1.

ADDRESSED TO THEODORE ROOSEVELT, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, IN THE MATTER OF EIGHT HUNDRED AND TWENTY-ONE SOLDIERS' WIDOWS STARVING IN THE GOVERNMENT SWEATSHOPS.

BY DEMOCRITUS.

My Dear Mr. Roosevelt,

Permit me to call your attention to a statement recently published on the authority of Major Knight, Commandant of the Schuylkill Arsenal, to the effect that the Government is responsible for an effort to reduce the wages of seamstresses employed on army clothing. As you are the head of the Government I think it proper that you should have an opportunity to explain why the Government desires to economize at the expense of these women. I suppose you are aware that these seamstresses are widows, mothers and sisters of soldiers. It is reported that there are eight hundred and twenty one of these destitute employees of the republic. I assume that they are destitute because they are making shirts and trousers for the army. If they were not in dire need of the money they would not engage in this work. Is my logic accurate?

Very well; thanking you for your kindly appreciation of my reasoning powers, I will resume the recital of my facts; perhaps we can find in them a common basis of agreement and arrive at a mutual conclusion.

Still quoting Major Knight, who says he represents the Government, it appears that these seamstresses are paid at the present time forty-five cents for each shirt made by them and accepted by the Government. The rate for trousers is seventy-five cents. It is calculated by the Government that each widow, orphan, mother or sister of a soldier ought to make ten shirts per week and thereby earn the munificent sum of four dollars and fifty cents. Trousers are slower work, but I do not doubt that an industrious widow of a soldier who died for his country could earn as much on trousers as she could make on shirts. Do you follow me?

Now it is proposed by Major Knight, on behalf of the Government of the United States, to reduce this wage ten cents on each shirt and thirty-five and one-half cents on each pair of trousers. The Government of the United States, as its opinion is uttered by Major Knight, thinks that these women are swindling the taxpayers by charging excessive rates for sewing on army shirts and soldiers' trousers. The Government, as it speaks through the mouth of Major Knight, would prefer to take this work out of the hands of the widows, orphans, mothers and sisters of the soldiers, and give it to some army contractor who operates a factory in which machinery does the work at less cost and presumably in less time, to the end that the contractor may the sooner receive the profit on his own underpaid labor. I will not say that this contractor may be a unit of some sweat shop trust protected by a Republican tariff—you must be heartily tired by this time of the howl that has been ringing in your ears denunciatory of the trusts and the evil that is accruing to the laboring people of this country by reason of the high protective tariff. I will try to confine myself to the concrete idea embodied in the fact that eight hundred and twenty-one widows, orphans, mothers and sisters of soldiers are compelled to take the grudging charity of a nation which some of the husbands, fathers and brothers of these women died to preserve.

Listen, Mr. Roosevelt: did you hear that "rumble and grumble and roar"—that low, fierce voice of history telling in anguished accents how the day was won and lost at Chickamauga? Do you hear it now? Surely it is distinct enough. You were a little boy asleep in your trundle bed when those dread guns began their oratory of death, and you were shooting agates and "chinas" in the sunshine of your nursery when the rifles of Chickamauga crackled the requiem of men whose widows and orphans are at this moment pleading for the poor privilege of earning a crust of bread out of the largesse of a generous and grateful republic.

Hark! Was that a cry in the Wilderness? Or was it a groan from the trenches of Antietam? Some of these men died at Shiloh, some of them went down in the fight at Malvern Hill, some of them gasped the names of loved ones in the Bloody Angle of Gettysburg, or perished on the "dead line" of Andersonville. For all of these somebody wept, for some of them a wife, a mother, a sister still mourns—for the loving years are as days and a sorrow may be a memory as vivid in the twilight of old age as it was in the flush of youth.

These men did not lay down their lives to earn the pay of soldiers. Fighting was not their trade. They enlisted because the country was in danger. If it had not been for their sacrifice there would have been no Government to operate a sweat shop in which the widows, orphans, mothers and sisters of soldiers could earn a pitiful four dollars and fifty cents a week.

In addition to this charity work these women doubtless draw a meagre pension in part payment for what they have lost. Now, Mr. President, it is charged that the pension list has been grossly stuffed—that the generosity of the republic has been systematically abused. Would it be asking too much of you as the head of the Government to find out if the people of the United States are paying more money for pensions than is legally or honestly due? And if you discover that thousands of dollars are expended fraudulently in the Pension Department could you consistently ask that the rolls be stripped of the stuffers and the money thus saved distributed among the deserving pensioners including in this distribution the eight hundred and twenty-one widows, orphans, mothers and sisters of soldiers now working in the Government sweat shop?

I hope that you have understood throughout this letter that I have carefully discriminated between the Government and the people. It is not the people who are compelling these women to work on army shirts and trousers for four dollars and fifty cents a week. Major Knight distinctly says that it is the Government. You and I know that the Government and the people are two different entities. The people may be primarily responsible for the Government, but in the last analysis the people have as little to say concerning the Government of the nation as have the citizens of Mars. The people, by courtesy, are permitted to name the temporary officials who shall constitute the Government, but thereafter it is entirely up to the officials aforesaid in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the country.

A word from you, Mr. President, will remedy this Government sweat shop evil. Will you say that word? I sincerely hope that I shall not be compelled to remind you of this appeal on behalf of these deserving women. You have great influence with the Government. Will you try to soften its hard heart? Will you exert yourself as strenuously in this effort as you are wont to do in all other matters? You are yourself a soldier. We have not forgotten your gallant charge at the head of your Rough Riders at San Juan. It is true that you did not die there for your country, but that was not your fault — neither will

I say that it was your good fortune or the result of bad marksmanship on the part of the Spanish riflemen. All I ask of you, Mr. President, is to imagine that you were killed at San Juan, that you died leaving a widow, a daughter, a mother, perhaps, destitute. Keep in mind also, that the men who did die for their country were as good as you are, and that their widows, orphans, mothers and sisters as worthy of consideration by a grateful republic as yours would have been if you had perished in that gallant charge at San Juan. Then say to yourself: "As I would have my country do to mine so will I do unto the least of these poor women whose soldier husbands, fathers, and brothers died for their country as I might have died."

With entire confidence in your sympathetic co-operation in this patriotic charity, I subscribe myself your fellow citizen and constant well-wisher.

Officers' Purses and Public Guests

BY ARTHUR H. DUTTON.

One of the most widespread fallacies prevalent, even among generally well-informed people, is to the effect that the United States Government feeds its naval officers and pays them well. Visitors to our men-of-war nearly always leave impressed with the pleasant surroundings of the officers, whose table, while not luxurious, is almost invariably appetizing and attractive. Entertainments are frequently given on board, at which service, appointments and cuisine are above reproach.

As a matter of fact every morsel of food and every drop of wine consumed on board vessels of the United States Navy, whether in the ordinary routine of the mess table or at entertainments, is paid for out of the slim pockets of the officers themselves, and the word slim is used advisedly as will be shown later on.

Unlike the merchant service, the Navy is not "found." Food is not furnished by the Government. Enlisted men are allowed thirty cents a day ration money, and so were officers, regardless of rank, until a few years ago, when even this pittance was taken from them. Nowadays the only thing that a naval officer gets free on board a ship is a tiny closet known as his state-room. He pays for everything else that he gets, from the uniform, epaulets and sword required by the navy regulations, to his laundry and bread and butter. True, the Government pays for officers' servants, but the activities of these are not limited to waiting upon the officers. Each servant has his regular station at every exercise on board ship, his principal use in action being in the powder division, as it is called, when the men are utilized in the highly important work of passing up ammunition to the battery. Under ordinary circumstances servants must also keep clean that part of the ship in which they work, just as every other enlisted man must keep clean his own particular nautical territory.

The ship is divided, as far as the officers are concerned, into three messes: the commanding officer's mess, the ward-room mess and the junior officers' mess. A commanding officer, living alone, may of course pay as much or as little as he inclines. He simply foots the bills of his own table.

The ward-room officers and the junior officers have a regularly organized mess. Any member of either of these organizations is liable to be called upon to act as a caterer when elected by a vote of the others, although under the regulations he cannot be compelled against his will to serve more than two months consecutively. It is the duty of the caterer to supervise the mess, decide upon the character of the food and direct the steward and other servants in the matter of purchases, menu and the like. The monthly mess bills are paid into the hands of the caterer, who keeps the mess accounts, pays the bills incurred on shore, and supplies the steward with ready cash as may be needed from day to day. The average ward-room mess bill is thirty dollars per month, that of the junior officers, twenty-five dollars per month. Of course, there are times when these figures are exceeded or diminished. The mess bill on one vessel during the Spanish war was forty-five dollars per month; on another, while on the European station, it was for some time less than twenty dollars.

The wine mess is entirely distinct from the mess proper. It is a stock company. To purchase the first supply of wine, beer and cigars—hard liquor being forbidden by the Navy regulations—a number of shares, generally five to ten dollars each, are sold, and members of the mess, if they so elect, may buy as many shares as they see fit. Thereafter, whenever an officer wishes any wine mess supplies, he orders what he wants, signs a check for it just as in any club, and at the end of the month settles his bill for the amount he has drawn. When visitors come on board and are entertained, every cigar, every bottle of beer, every glass of wine drunk by them, whether they be personal friends of the officers or official guests of the nation, is paid for by the officers supplying it. This is something of which few people in this country are aware. In every other Navy under the sun the government supplies an entertainment fund to its naval officers, to be used in the entertainment of official guests. In the United States Navy, naval officers, none of whom are overburdened with wealth, and many of whom have families to support on their slender incomes, are required to pay for the entertainment of the nation's guests, people for whom they personally may not care a picayune. Many is the commanding officer, many is the young ensign, and even midshipman, who has had to dig down into his jeans to buy champagne for the naval officers and other officials of foreign countries who have come aboard to accept hospitalities which they expect to return later at their own nation's expense. It is not the custom among American naval officers to hand out cheap cigars or poor wines to their guests. They are known the world over for being the best of entertainers, and it requires no violent effort of the imagination to appreciate the drain that patriotic courtesy constantly makes upon those who officer our ships throughout the world.

So much for the food. The pay of the United States Navy is ridiculously small when compared with the pay of men on shore with corresponding responsibilities and technical training. The highest grade attainable to a naval officer, in the ordinary course of events, is that of Rear-Admiral. Rear-Admirals are divided into two classes of nine each. The pay of the first nine is seven thousand five hundred dollars a year at sea, and six thousand three hundred and seventy-five dollars on shore; of the second nine, five thousand five hundred dollars and four thousand six hundred and seventy-five dollars respectively. Rear-Admirals are the men who command squadrons, decide battles, and, possibly, the fates of nations in time of war. In time of peace they represent the nation abroad, and are very likely to be called upon to decide, on the spur of the moment, and on their own judgment, great questions which might alter the world's history. The issue of peace or war frequently hinges upon their conduct, yet their pay is less than that of many a salaried member of a mercantile house on shore. A Captain in the navy gets three thousand five hundred dollars a year on sea and two thousand nine hundred and seventy-five dollars on shore; a Commander, three thousand dollars and two thousand five hundred and fifty dollars; Lieutenant-Commander, two thousand five hundred dollars and two thousand one hundred and twenty-five dollars; a Lieutenant, one thousand eight hundred dollars and one thousand five hundred and thirty dollars; a Lieutenant, junior grade, one thousand five hundred dollars and one thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars; an Ensign, one thousand four hundred dollars and one thousand one hundred and ninety dollars; a Midshipman, nine hundred and fifty dollars and five hundred dollars. There are certain additions to these pays for length of service, an increase of ten per cent for every five years of service being added to the pay of each grade, with the provision, however, that this increment, no matter how long the service, shall not exceed forty per cent of the total amount. Rear-Admirals get no increment for longevity, which is equivalent to saying that seven thousand five hundred dollars a year is the maximum amount that a naval officer for a lifetime of service can obtain.

Of course, there are many attractions to the life of a naval officer. It is a lifetime job, with a retired list when disabled by age or injury. Dismissal can only occur through misconduct adjudged by a court-martial, but as a means of amassing a fortune, it does not compare with nine out of ten avocations on shore open to the average well educated man. The Navy has its rewards for good service, but they are not money rewards. It is not for pelf that a man enters his country's service as an officer of the Navy.

The Immensities and I

BY HARRY COWELL.

Were man, the "lord of creation," capable of humility, the contemplation of time and space would surely make him humble; for of a truth ours is a small star, filling but an infinitesimal fraction of the void, and our moment upon it bitter brief. I have yet, however, to see the study of astronomy, for instance, lessen the self-importance of sophomore or senior. Geology's sermons in stones bring home to the heart with a vividness and impressiveness all their own a sense of the "long elapse of time"—an elapse that for all its length leaves eternity no shorter, but the student thereof is no less than others exercised over the parting of his hair, and comes from the lectures of a Le Conte taking thought for the morrow, what he shall eat and what he shall drink and wherewithal he shall be clothed.

I shall never, I know, paint a Mona Lisa, with mysterious mouth, and the "fallen day" of "deep seas" about her, but this at least I have in common with Leonardo da Vinci: two things from childhood have touched my brain "beyond the measure of other impressions—the smiling of women and the motion of great waters." The smiling of stars when the night is very still—that, too, has ever touched me strangely. Surely the dwelling upon such themes as these—if anything—should make a being raised but a few inches above the sod of a very modest frame of mind; and yet I am moved, if you would hear the truth, not so much by suns and seas and women, with their unfathomable smilings, their mysteries and infinities, as by myself—the contemplating ego. The great waters in motion reveal to me my own depths, my own restlessness, my own immensity. Not the stars' altitude, but mine as I watch them, is full of wonderment. And what would a woman's vague smile mean to me, were I not a riddle to myself? "Egotist!" you exclaim, impatiently. "Man," say I, patiently, preferring the latter synonym—man speaking for man God's truth, saying the thing that is, as best he may. I, little man, make the immensities significant; without me they are meaningless. In the heart of the hearer is half of the music; in the eye of the seer is half of the picture; and the fine reader is not infrequently the better part of the best book. What would the world of matter be without beholding man—or more than man? Consult philosophy; ask of the shade of Bishop Berkeley.

This is a day of agnosticism, of scientific doubt; she whose other name is Facts-Set-in-Order is mistress of the passing moment. Yet the ancient belief in a Special Providence dies hard. Why? I will tell you. Because the vanity of man is strangely vigorous. "If I go abroad without my umbrella, it's sure to rain cats and dogs," says the modest reader who but now flung the rebuking "Egotist!" at my defenseless head. Here is a factor of meteorology which the Weather Bureau fails to take into account. Even if the jealous old thing would be a-spoiling of your new gown, in which you look so stunning, it is nice—is it not?—to think that Nature observes your goings-out and your comings-in; your down-sittings and your uprisings. Modest reader, have you never wept to think that, were you to die today—you, who give significance to star and sea—the earth would none the less revolve, the sun rise tomorrow, and man go forth to his work and labor until the evening? Have you never, anticipating a great gladness, put a seal upon your lips, lest Fate get wind of the matter and disarrange her plans to the sole end of depriving you of the good to come? If you are not the darling of Destiny, at least you are the mark of her envious disfavor. That she should let you be happy or make you miserable with equal unconcern is utterly inconceivable!

It thunders, and man asks: "What have I done amiss that God should be so angry?" The earth quakes, its foundations are shaken; the crops failing, there is famine in the land; the cattle die upon a thousand hills; the world over, there is disaster more or less unavoidable, due to altogether natural causes; then the proud peoples get them down upon their knees and humbly confess their sins; but they dream not ever that all these things come to pass in the natural course of events without particular reference to them and their sins; or their virtues for that matter, were they to imagine themselves so many Jobs being tried for the discomfiting of Satan, and that they might have glory in the eyes of succeeding generations for all time to come. The old idea of creation slain of Charles Darwin is irresistibly naive. Can you prick your finger, plucking a rose, without smiling to think that thorns and thistles came to be because the first lady found the preferred fruit pleasant to the eye, and good for food, and a thing to be desired for the sake of culture, were it for nothing else? "And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years: and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so." (Italics mine). To the mind of a modest modernist like myself, in the "he made the stars also," is vanity ineradicable.

The flowers of the field are beautiful to the eye, and their fragrance is a delight to the nostril. For their own sake, however, are they fair and fragrant—not for ours. Like all else living, they live for themselves—that is, in the state of nature. It is not easy for us to realize this. Man has been so successful in directing natural forces to his own ends that it is now hard for him to think in his heart that the constitution of things has no special regard for him. "It must have some use"—that is to say, be useful to us—"or else it would not be here." I again quote her, the modest-loving reader, who called me "egotist." Impossible that nature should care no more for us than for the beasts that perish!—impossible, but true. Were it not for our blinding self-love, and we had long ago seen that the network of forces we call Nature is wholly indifferent to our welfare and serves us only under compulsion.

We save the lamb from the wolf, for the butcher, because forsooth, it was created food for us. It flatters man to forget the time when he shared his food more or less equally with other carnivora. Once in the jungle in India I heard a tiger thank God for the creation of man. He had just dined, as was plain to be seen, and was in the mood to be grateful. For a moment the thing gave me quite a turn, to borrow a saying of the people. Then I grasped my rifle and smiled cynically—grimly, I might have said, had I been writing of some one else.

What has all this to do with me and the immensities? Much every way. But I bore you. Hear then the conclusion of the whole matter: As in the days of Genesis, so now, I am greatest of the immensities; space is bounded by the vanity of man.

The Dreamer

BY MABEL PORTER PITTS.

My way is this: to rest in the shade
Deep in the dusk of some whispering glade
Drowsily happy and satisfied;
Great are the wonders that grow apace
Out of the heart of such hallowed place;
Weird with a theme I may not repeat
Pipes of Pan lull me with music sweet;
Few know the path from the highroad wide
To way that is mine, in the shade, aside.

My way is this: apart from the strife,
Far from the tumult of clamorous life,
Courting the comfort the throng denied,
Having no care when the day is done
If I shall look on tomorrow's sun;
Glad in the light of the thing that seems,
Happy to live in my idle dreams.
This is no highway the world may ride,
This way that is mine, in the shade, aside.

The Saunterer

The Flight of Fushimi

Many of our recent rich and some of our real aristocracy were bitterly disappointed because his Serene Highness, Prince Fushimi (whose name they are all mispronouncing), did not stay his meteoric career long enough to partake of their bountiful and sycophantic hospitality. It is not often that our rich and real have the opportunity to entertain a genuine Prince even unaware. They have been fooled by the "bogus" and brummagem variety time and again, and it would have been something of a solace to crook the pregnant hinges of the knee that thrift might follow this fawning. But alas, the Prince was in a hurry. The siren song of Burlingame and the orgies of the Red Room could not lure him from his purpose. What this purpose may be nobody knows—it is a state secret that even the acute diplomats of the local press cannot guess. That it has something to do with an entente cordiale is unquestioned, but whether it partakes of an alliance offensive and defensive between this country and Japan, or is merely a request by the Mikado that President Roosevelt use his good offices in the arrangement of a modus vivendi whereby the war in Manchuria may be called off without disturbing the amour propre of the contending nations, puzzles the will of the sapient international politicians who write the editorials for the metropolitan dailies. Nothing of this, however, troubles the arbiters elegantiarum of our rich, real and best. They know little of affairs of state and it is to their credit that they care less. They are only disturbed because Prince "Fushimmi," as they name him, has escaped their parvenu clutch. How they would have paraded in the fierce glare that beats upon the princely presence! What complimentary commonplaces they would have uttered (through an interpreter)! How the ladies of quality would have dined him; how the millionaire members of the Bohemian Club would have wined him; and how sumptuously he would have been entertained along the firing line of our best society! I am glad the Prince escaped. Not because I sympathize with the Prince, for he is doomed to this sort of thing in the places where he is bound, but because I don't like to see my fellow creatures play such fantastic tricks before high heaven.

Brawn Better than Brain

Some of the spectacled moonshees of Berkeley are loudly inveighing against "the brutal sport of football," protesting that the students spend too much time in this unprofitable ambition, thereby wasting the precious hours that should be devoted to arts, sciences and the humanities. The pundits are schoolmasters always, and in the schoolmaster spirit they seek to dictate the manners of the age. Their perspective is microscopic rather than telescopic. They fail to grasp the idea that only the fittest can survive and that the strongest are the fittest. Their logic is confined to a premesis compelling the conclusion that all students are born mentally equal. This is not true. Some are born to achieve something in the arts, sciences and humanities, and others are born to draw water, hew wood, and dig ditches. Those who are fitted to survive intellectually will do so without assistance from the schoolmen, and all the advice and admonition of the professional learned Thebans will not serve to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear or a classical scholar out of a wooden spoon.

Futility of Book Lore

It is better that the young men of the universities should have strong bodies than that they should be stuffed with a learning that they cannot assimilate—a knowledge that will be of no practical use in after life. Of the thousands who are graduated from the colleges every year the majority pass into the oblivion of mediocrity. Some of them earn a livelihood at the desk; others become salesmen in shops and "firms"; a few rise to the dignity of junior partners; the lower reaches of the law, medicine and politics are crowded with college bred men. Conspicuous success is not for every man who has compassed "the advantage of an education." On the contrary most men are compelled to unlearn much that they learned in college, and all of them must learn much that cannot be taught in college, before they can even begin to strive for distinction in the fierce competition of the great world where the relentless law of survival obtains as inevitably as the law of gravitation. I offer these sapient suggestions for the especial edification of Professor Lange who has foregathered with Chaucer by the light of Skeat's midnight oil, and for the further illumination of Professor Howison who is but mad north-north-west, being able to differentiate a hawk from a handsaw when the wind is southerly.

Snatching His Crust

The learned blacksmith who reads Epictetus in the original is becoming rarer, and the college fullback who builds bridges in Patagonia is more frequently in evidence. Even the latter day philosopher who gropes through the dusk of antiquity to find a morsel of hope for despairing humanity must be equipped with the physical vigor of a centre rush to prosecute his laborious task. To carp at the "brutality" of football is to begrudge the crust that feeds Coach Hopper. If football were not "brutal" Jimmy Hopper would have gone on failing in journalism in spite of his collegiate training and his native scholarly abilities. If it had not been for his application to the technical details of football he would never have attained to fame and fortune as a purveyor of football literature for the strenuous weeklies and the ladylike monthlies. Hopper, by the way, can write on other subjects besides football but the other things don't pay. What the literary conduits usually carry is milk and water, but they sometimes pollute themselves with blood and bluster. That is why Jack London is getting into the magazines. Jack, however, is an "elemental" exception. It is the fad just now to receive him in good society. Hopper has always been in good society albeit he wasn't always welcome. When the ladylike magazines discovered through the strenuous weeklies that he could write football stories they hired him to write for their co-ed clientele. That's why Jimmp Hopper is now permitted to earn a crust from the largesse of the female periodical literature of the super-civilized East. When the novelty wears off the seminary constituency of the magazines will return to their diet of requited love and optimistic drool. Therefore make your hay while the sun shines, Jim — garner your sheaves before the rain comes, Jack.

Tennyson and Browning with the result that Tennyson seems to affect the human heart more forcibly than does Browning. If I may offer an unscientific explanation of this apparent phenomenon I would suggest that as Browning is intentionally obscure in his expression the "emotion" of his poetry is dulled in transmission to the nerve centres of the brain and almost wholly obliterated by the time it reaches the human heart. The poetry of Tennyson, on the other hand, loses none of its virile sense on its swift flight through the human brain to the human heart. Browning and Tennyson are the antipodes of each other in the ability to rouse emotion in the human heart. The test may be conclusive as a basis of comparison of the emotional qualities of these poets, but I would like to hear a report regarding experiments in other poetry. I wish these empirical psychologists of Berkeley would try Gelett Burgess's "Purple Cow" in their emotometer. For purposes of comparison they might throw in a few stanzas of Wallace Irwin. I do not advise, however, that the experiment should be inflicted on the human heart. The psychologists might borrow a few learned guinea pigs from the laboratory of Professor Loeb.

The Hurt That Honor Feels

Professor Joseph Baker, occupying the chair of political science on the Oakland Tribune, told me a tale the other day to point a moral in international diplomacy. Once upon a time in White Pine, said Professor Baker, there was a Sheriff by the name of Dan Patterson, and the Sheriff was blessed with a wife. One day while the wife of Sheriff Patterson was working in her kitchen there came to the back window a Shoshone squaw bearing on her back a papoose of her aboriginal breed. The squaw peered into the kitchen from the sufficient elevation of a barrel sunken in the backyard of the Patterson wickiup and filled with rain water. While this Minnehaha with outstretched hand implored alms of Mrs. Patterson the head of the barrel caved in and the tribeslady went kersouse into the family reservoir. Mrs. Patterson hurried into the yard to save the poor Indian from drowning. When she arrived at the place of disaster the squaw was rising like Cybele from the barrel, her babe gravely silent after the stoicism of his kind, her hand still outstretched and her tongue articulate with the demand: "Two bits!" Whereupon the application of the anecdote in these words from the lips of the Professor: "Great Britain has fallen into Russia's water barrel. Russia hurries to the rescue with profuse apology and promises to remove the barrel. She finds Great Britain emerging from the drink with hand outstretched muttering 'Two bits!' Great Britain is a nation of shopkeepers. National honor is always a secondary consideration. She is willing in this instance to 'arbitrate' a mortal insult. She will be satisfied if Russia gives her 'two bits.'"

"She won't go to the ball if she has to unmask."
"I don't blame her."

A Demand For Sidney

It is hoped in social circles that the mantle of Mrs. Salisbury will fall upon the shoulders of her son, Sidney, who is very fond of society and takes a lively interest in its manoeuvres. He attends nearly every important function, and he knows who's who as well if not better than anyone else in society. So well is he equipped for leadership that it has been suggested that the Fortnightly dances should be revived under his direction. It is pointed out that Ned Greenway is getting along in years, and that he must resign the sceptre before long, and it is pretty generally agreed that Sidney Salisbury is an ideal man for the job. Mrs. Salisbury is still living at the Palace, and her health is slowly improving.

Greenway's Calves

Of Greenway however, it may be truly said that age cannot wither, custom stale, nor commerce vulgarize his perennial vivacity. His next ball is to be pulled off a day or two before Christmas, and it is to be a bal masque. On this occasion the amiable Czar will give another hint to his infinite variety. He contemplates spreading himself not only on the floor, but on decorations and details. It has long been known that the genial Ned prides himself on the glory of his calves, and that he sports a pair which justifies his fondest hope that some day sartorial evolution will lead us back to the pantaloons of our forbears. Meanwhile the gallant Greenway consigned to long, flowing trousers, must content himself with giving the ladies sporadic treats at fancy dress dances. There is no doubt of the symmetry of the Greenway calves. They have been exhibited to society, and have been voted as graceful, according to masculine standards, as those exhibited at the last Mardi Gras by the robust society belle who appeared as a ballet dancer. Ever since that ball it has been conceded that she has the most graceful calves in society, but there are few society girls who care to make such display, knowing as they do that they cannot make good. Fancy dress balls bring out effects that are sadly disappointing. The Mardi Gras last year revealed the fact that two of our most fascinating society women are knock-kneed. But Greenway has nothing to fear. He has stunning calves. Hence the bal masque.

"I feel so thankful that I have my dear Tom," said Mrs. Bride to her dearest friend, as they walked to church.
"You should be thankful to me, then," returned Edith, sweetly, "for refusing him last year."

Ways of The Social Grafter

The social grafter is to be barred hereafter from the Presidio hops, the officers having decided to issue invitations to their functions and to exclude people who are without a card. They have adopted this course because of the discovery that people from the city were in the habit of attending Presidio dances without invitation. The women of a certain set attended nearly every hop though never invited. They took possession of the hop room, drank the punch and in many ways enjoyed advantages reserved for the officers and their guests. Some of the girls had met some of the officers in an unconventional way at informal dances and soon their set became acquainted with all the officers and they had a beautiful time until it suddenly dawned on the brass-buttoned gentry that their dances were not as exclusive as they should be. It appears that each officer was under the impression that the grafters had been invited by one of his brother officers, but upon investigation it was learned that the women had invited themselves. Suspicion first entered the mind of an officer who was in the habit of entertaining a jolly little party of friends at supper after the hops. Seeing several new faces around his chafing dish he at first assumed they were friends of his friends but upon inquiry he learned that they were grafters.

A Dowager's Feeble Memory

The Presidio functions are not the only ones to which people go uninvited. I am told that there are women who make it a practice to attend all the large teas and receptions whether they are invited or not. They usually avoid the receiving party, but appear at the luncheon table. One very distinguished dowager often astonishes the hostess of a function by attending uninvited. But as she is of exalted social position the hostess feels rather honored than otherwise. The supposition is that the old lady's memory is feeble, and that she depends on the newspapers to remind her of the daily entertainments. The Sequoia Club, I hear, has been annoyed by the buttinners. At the reception in honor of Gertrude Atherton a mob of strangers besieged the club rooms at the St. Francis, and many of them met the famous novelist and partook of the refreshments.

"Mrs. Plush says she is going to have her home furnished in an original manner."

"Then I presume she will bar antiques; they have become so common."

Ruef's Candidate

Though Abe Ruef poses as a program politician, he is never a very ardent supporter of a program that is not of his making. The State Republican machine recently decided upon Assemblyman Phil Walsh, of Alameda, for the Speakership, but Ruef kicked over the traces. He wants to manipulate affairs in the next Legislature for various reasons, one of them being that there is a lively Senatorial contest on. He feels that it is important that the next Speaker should be his mouthpiece and therefore he has selected T. E. Atkinson for the job. Fortunately Mr. Ruef is not beloved of Republican politicians in the interior, and it is only for them to know that Atkinson is his man, and they will flock to Walsh.

The Shooting of Berg

It would be interesting to know the nature of the obfuscation from which Mr. J. Downey Harvey was suffering when he filled the face of his friend, William Berg, with bird shot. According to his version of the shooting Mr. Berg made a disturbance in the bushes, and he considered it sufficient provocation for a pot-shot. He believed that Mr. Berg was a flock of quail, and he fired blindly into the bushes, rather an unsportsmanlike proceeding. If he had been bear hunting or deer hunting his conduct would not have excited so much surprise. It was an unfortunate blunder, not only on account of the wounding of Mr. Berg but because of the exposure of Mr. Harvey's code of sporting ethics. Hereafter when he goes hunting on the Country Club preserves, signals should be given warning all others to return to the club house.

Miss Harvey's Debut

Society people seem to be worrying about Anita Harvey's debut. There were rumors that she was to come out at a grand ball given by her grandmother, Mrs. Martin, and that all society would be invited. But that sort of thing does not appeal to Mrs. Harvey, who is a woman of quiet tastes to whom glare is repugnant. When it was reported that she would introduce her daughter at a dinner to about fifty of her friends, I felt that such an affair would be more to her liking. It has since been reported that Mr. Phelan, who is an intimate friend of the family, will give a dinner in her honor. However, it is possible that Miss Harvey will not make a formal debut; that she may follow the latest New York fashion which makes it the thing for a bud simply to attend a few dances. The fulsome flatterers of the dailies have been raving over Miss Harvey's beauty, but as they never discriminate in such matters when a society girl is concerned, their gush is of little importance. Miss Harvey resembles her mother somewhat, is dignified of bearing, and with a frank, straightforward manner that attracts.

The Rise of Heinze

Some weeks ago, when the stock of the Amalgamated Copper Company made a spurt, the supposition was that the rise was due to the increased demand for the metal. That was not the supposition, however, of Thomas W. Lawson, the Boston multi-millionaire who has been writing of Frenzied Finance in Everybody's and exposing the methods of Standard Oil. He offered to forfeit one million dollars to the miners of Butte if he could not prove that August Heinze no longer controlled the properties of the United Copper Company. Mr. Heinze has long been making a fight against Amalgamated, and Tom Lawson, wizard of the stock market, had a "hunch" that the Rockefellers had been forced to buy him out. He went so far as to send a certified check for five thousand dollars out to Butte, where it was placed on exhibition, as a guarantee of his good faith. It was subsequently learned that Heinze had given an option on his copper properties to an obscure Montana lawyer for eight millions, and there is no doubt but that the latter represents a syndicate organized in the interest of Standard Oil. F. August Heinze is one of the most brilliant of the young Captains of Industry in this country, and his friends in this city are not surprised to learn that he forced the Rockefellers to a settlement. He began his career in 1889, when he was graduated from the Columbia School of Mines, and he is now only thirty-four years of age. Immediately after leaving school he went to Montana, where he worked as an engineer at five dollars a day, for the Boston and Montana mining company. I was told some time ago that Heinze astonished Butte from the start. He worked from seven o'clock in the morning until six in the evening, and then went home and sat down to dinner in evening dress.

The Virtue of Bribery

Notwithstanding his passion for dress he saved money, and went to Germany where he studied for two years in the best schools of mining. Then he returned to Montana, and with a legacy from his grandmother of fifty thousand dollars he began operations. He leased mining claims and operated them, but in such a manner that he was always involved in litigation. One of his first legal battles was with James A. Murray, who is well known in this city. He leased a claim belonging to Murray and agreed to pay twenty-five per cent royalty on all ore running over twelve per cent. He evaded the payment of royalties, it was said, by mixing low grade ore with the good ore. Nearly all his big deals resulted in litigation. He fought Senator Clark and Marcus Daly in the courts, and gave both those past-masters in the high art of "working" the judiciary pointers. Money was spent on all sides without stint. Newspapers, courts and legislators were bought. When Standard Oil took a hand and used money Heinze spent two dollars for every dollar that the big corporation put into circulation. A year ago Heinze secured several judgments that badly crippled Standard Oil, and the only move left for the trust to make was to buy out the young miner. Heinze's fortune is now estimated at thirty millions.

"Hutch" Host May Marry

Great would be the surprise in club circles if the announcement were made that C. T. Hamilton of the "Hutch" had been lured from bachelorhood. Some of his friends think that the surprise is coming. They say that he has bestowed his affections on a very charming Eastern lady who is now visiting this city.

His Reformation Now Complete

According to the despatches, Viscount Deerhurst has decided to give up turf speculation for good and all, persuaded thereunto by his American wife. Lord Deerhurst really owes his rehabilitation in London society to his marriage with Virginia Bonyng, the step-daughter of C. W. Bonyng, formerly of this city. The nobleman was the worst scapegrace that ever broke a commandment, and his father, the Earl of Coventry, thought his son's ultimate reformation extremely doubtful. But after a series of sensational adventures, in England and Australia chiefly, the naughty Viscount fell in love with the ex-Californian girl, then of London, and he was no longer reckoned among the ne'er-do-weels. His only relaxation from strict virtue was the turf, and now the despatches say he has been persuaded by his wife to resign that folly. Lord Deerhurst is very well-known here, especially in the Blingum set. When he visited California three years ago, Joe Grant took him up to the Bohemian Club's midsummer jinks, and everybody pronounced him a fine fellow. Porter Ashe made a great hit by the speech he made when he was introduced to Deerhurst, and the latter burst into a roar of laughter at its close. As I recall the speech, it ran: "It gives me great pleasure to shake hands with so great a representative of the nobility of old England and I hope I am conferring as much pleasure by allowing you to shake hands with such a noble Senator of the State of California." Deerhurst said he would not mind living in California for the rest of his days, if duty did not keep him in England. The Deerhursts have three children, one a little boy who will some day be the Earl of Coventry.

One of the Buds

Eugenie Hawes decided to come out, after all, this season, though she was not really in any great haste to debut. It is not so long ago that she graduated from the Lowell High School, and then, after a few months' rest in town, went abroad with her mother and step-father, the Jack Schroeders. Miss Hawes is a very generous girl and spends liberally the fortune she inherited from her father, the late Horace Hawes. She is a clever girl, not at all frivolous, though she is fond of dancing and parties. She lived for many years in the country, at the family place near Redwood City, and she is very fond of out-door pleasures.

He Stood the Test

An incident illustrative of the charm of perfect repose and good breeding occurred the other day in a crowded Hyde street car. A young lieutenant, spick and span in khaki, sat in one corner holding out his fare to the conductor, who ignored him for quite awhile. Finally he touched the conductor on the arm and the latter said, "Your fare has been paid."

"By whom?" asked the officer, in great surprise.

"By this lady," said the conductor, indicating the soldier's nearest neighbor. Turning, the officer saw a plain, very elderly lady beaming kindly upon him, and he looked at her questioningly. He listened deferentially as she explained, with a strong German accent, that she always paid soldiers' car-fare.

"Oh, madam, you are too kind; I thank you very much," he said quietly, but with the air of one accepting a valuable gift. Rapidly, and with the patronizing privilege of prosperous old age, she chatted with him about the army, his wanderings, and the fine California climate. She had evidently taken him for a soldier of the ranks, but presently she noticed the insignia upon the dull khaki and she asked him his rank and regiment. He told her he was a lieutenant of the Twenty-first Infantry. Then the old lady became visibly embarrassed, but the gallant brave appeared oblivious of her chagrin, and kept on chatting about the city and the climate, and all matters in which she had shown interest before he was discovered. As he rose while she passed out to transfer to California street he said, "We expect to be at the Presidio for about three months, so if you ever come out there I hope you will look around for me. I am in the Twenty-first. I should be delighted to see you again." It was an unusual incident, and the officer won my admiration for his tact and bearing under circumstances that might have embarrassed one of a less refined nature.

Their Discarded Garments

Some time since one of the dailies ran a supp. story about the way New York women of small means manage to dress as well as their sisters who have incomes of several thousands a year. The secret was that the poor woman bought the cast-off gowns of her richer sister. For instance, a smart dame would tire of a ball or dinner gown after two or three wearings. Instead of throwing it away, she would sell it to a company that deals in such wares. She would receive a small sum for the gown, which would be renovated and resold at about one-fourth or less of its cost. In that way a woman of small means could wear a two hundred dollar gown, for which she would only pay forty or fifty dollars. When this article appeared in the daily paper here, there was a great pooh-poohing of it among the upper crust. "It might do in New York," said one girl, "but not in a small city like San Francisco." Nevertheless, it now appears that the scheme is to be tried in our little city, by the same company that popularized itself in New York. Last week, the unmarried women and men figuring in the Blue Book received by mail a circular letter reading:

Miss _____,
City:—

We beg to inform you that we have been appointed Pacific Coast Agents for the New York Discarded Clothing Company of New York. This company purchases Ladies' and Gentlemen's Clothing of every description, also old Sealskins, Furs, Jewelry, Diamonds, and other valuables, and will allow you the highest value possible on same. We will have our representative call on you should you desire to have us do so. All business strictly confidential.

If our smart women and men respond to this appeal, the poor relations of the rich will probably find themselves minus their perquisites of cast-off clothing.

Busy Mrs. Atherton

It is currently reported here and there that as soon as Gertrude Atherton wipes her pen after the last page of the novel she is now engaged upon she will write a life of Aaron Burr. That is going to be an interesting production, one which will be apt to rival her "flexible biography" of Hamilton in circulation, if not in popularity. Having deified Hamilton at the expense of all his contemporaries, it is going to be highly interesting to look on at the sinking of Burr into still lower depths. And then, there is the Aaron Burr cult, which has a considerable following, and much more enthusiastic about their hero than the Hamiltonians have proved. There have been fully a dozen books produced during the last few years, ranging from light fiction to serious biography, to show that Burr was the victim of a political plot, but as Mrs. Atherton seems never so happy as when she is in the thick of a melee, she will not mind a miniature Donnybrook. It was given out, when "The Conqueror" was projected, that it was to be a serious biography, and it turned out to be a novel with a biographical back ground. Then we were told that Mrs. Atherton was going to try again, and we got "A Few Hamilton Letters," and now she has jumped her ditch and come up on the opposite side. There is a chance that some one has got things mixed and written Burr when he meant Hamilton, and there is no catching up with an error once it gets into print. Let us hope it is to be Burr, however, for, going back to the classification of "Sam Slick," we got so much of the "saft sawder" with Hamilton that we are ready now for a bit of "human natur" and it will not change the points of the compass either way.

The Dolbeer Contest

The Dolbeer will contest is holding the interest of society these days, and the outcome is anxiously awaited. Though it is pretty generally believed that Bertha Dolbeer was somewhat flighty at times, her friends are of the opinion that she was of sound mind when she executed the will. The will itself, the manner of its execution and the circumstances attending the same, might advantageously be offered in evidence as proof of exceptional mental clearness. To set aside the will in the court of last resort it must be shown that Bertha Dolbeer was insane; not six months before its execution or six months after, but at the time it was drawn. As sane people have temporary fits of insanity, insane people enjoy lucid intervals, and the Dolbeer will is a document that smacks of lucidity. If she had overlooked her dearest friend and bequeathed the bulk of her estate to relatives she had never seen, and for whom she had no affection, the presumption would be that both her judgment and her sentiment were improperly located.

Her moroseness should not have excited astonishment if the story is to be believed that she fell in love with a New York doctor whom she met at Coronado, and who turned out to be a married man. It was not surprising that she looked bored at times, since it is known that she was pursued by two society chaps who had hopes of annexing her hand and fortune. It probably grieved her to think that their attentions implied an uncomplimentary opinion of her intelligence. From the accounts of her intimates Bertha Dolbeer was much of the same temperament as her companions. She was courted and did not always discourage her suitors. It was reported that one young society man won her affections and that she rejected him after learning that he was involved in an unpleasant liaison.

A Physician's Testimony

A deposition in the case that has not yet been read reveals an interesting coincidence. It is the deposition of Dr. Homer Gibney, of New York, taken a few weeks ago. He was a friend of Miss Dolbeer, their acquaintance dating two years back, when he met her in California. Two months before her death he and a friend met her and Miss Warren in New York, and took them to dinner and to a theatre. He was sure that she was sane at that time. He exchanged letters with her and talked to her over the telephone. He knew nothing of her return from Europe until one day he was passing the Waldorf-Astoria and was summoned to the court-yard to attend a woman who had fallen from a window. He attempted to restore life to the body, and was so engrossed in his professional duty that he did not, for a long time, recognize the injured woman, who was none other than Bertha Dolbeer. Dr. Gibney swore that he knew a demented person when he saw one, and that he was positive Bertha Dolbeer was as sound mentally during her stay in New York, before her European trip, as she was when he met her in California. He denied that she suffered from attacks of melancholia.

Cultivating Public Sentiment

At the beginning of the will contest the Johnson brothers, attorneys for the contestants, seemed to have had the daily press on their side. They are able attorneys and very popular among newspaper men. But E. S. Pillsbury, who is associated with Garret McEnerney, as attorney for Miss Warren, exerted a pull at headquarters in the interest of his client, and now Miss Warren's side of the case is getting full justice in at least two of the dailies. Pillsbury believes that public sentiment goes a great way toward winning a will contest.

Dutton Is The Critic

The Chronicle did good work in pointing out the serious imperfections in the designs of two important classes of our battleships, for the General Board has been called upon for explanation and remedy. At first some of the wise men of the navy pooh-poohed the Chronicle story. They did not know it was written by Mr. Arthur Dutton, an Annapolis man who was equipped with facts and figures. Mr. Dutton, now a reporter of the Chronicle, was graduated from Annapolis in 1885. He spent some years in the Bureau of Construction and then resigned from the navy. He became a master mariner in the merchant service and has navigated steamships from the tropics to the Arctic regions. He was a lieutenant in the Colombian navy during the revolution of 1902, and he enlisted in our navy during the Spanish war and was on the Gloucester and Dolphin at Santiago and Guantanamo. He was mustered out as a lieutenant, and entered journalism, but he is still an enthusiastic navy man. He was for a time naval editor of the Boston Herald, and he has written many interesting articles for the leading magazines on topics pertaining to the navy. Dutton's criticism of the defects in the battleships was timely and important. The result demonstrates the advantage of having honest criticism of naval affairs. Free criticism is not only allowed but encouraged in England to the great betterment of the British naval service. But the omniscient navy ring in Washington prefer extreme secrecy and claim absolute infallibility.

Ensign F. O. Branch, U. S. Navy, who was recently retired for ill-health, will make his home for the future in San Diego, where he and Mrs. Branch have already gone.

Too Many Weddings

The Military Secretary of the War Department at Washington has rebelled at last against a practice of army officers when they wish to send out wedding invitations. Having a large service acquaintance, an officer frequently saves himself trouble by addressing a big supply of invitations, each envelope marked "care of the War Department, Washington, D. C." The scheme was an attractive one. The work of giving each name its proper address, and forwarding it thereto, devolved upon the War Department, and the practice became so widespread that extra clerks had to be detailed in the Military Secretary's office to attend to this special duty of readdressing and forwarding wedding invitations. The Military Secretary kicked. He directed that no mail matter coming in bulk to his office should be forwarded, and gave orders that it should be returned to the sender, with a memorandum informing him that for ten cents he could get a copy of the monthly roster of addresses of officers, and do his own addressing. An officer on duty in the Department of California was recently the recipient of such a communication which accompanied a bundle of invitations which was returned to him.

There has been quite a shaking up of the local navy colony during the past week, and many departing officers and their families will be sorely missed during the present season. The detachments of Naval Constructors F. B. Zahm from Mare island, and L. S. Adams from the Union Iron works, removes two particularly popular officers, with their hospitable families. Zahm will be relieved by Naval Constructor H. A. Evans, who comes from the Norfolk navy yard, but Adams's successor has not yet been designated.

Her Social Progress

Lillie Lawlor is back in New York from Europe, and I have been told that Mrs. C. P. Huntington has taken her up. It is surprising how she wins the patronage of the rich. However, I am told that her vogue in New York was not so great as was popularly supposed, and it is even denied now that she ever had the patronage of Mrs. John Jacob Astor. I am told that the nearest she ever got to the Queen of New York's Four Hundred was at a luncheon given at Newport by Mrs. Ailene Ivers Robinson. She sang on that occasion and Mrs. Astor heard her but was not visibly affected. Her chief booster in New York was Mrs. Lounsberry, the cousin of Dr. Harry Tevis, and at her residence she met Mrs. Howard Gould who liked her voice and promised to do ever so much for her. Thereupon Miss Lawlor invited her to a tea to be given in her studio a week later. It happens that Mrs. Howard Gould has many enemies in New York society, and according to society gossip that has percolated all the way to this city, when Mrs. Gus Spreckels heard that Mrs. Gould was to be present at the studio tea, she announced her intention to fill another engagement that day. Thereupon Miss Lawlor notified Mrs. Gould that the tea had been postponed, but it wasn't and the multi-millionairess heard all about it, and thereafter she gave Miss Lawlor the glassy eye. The story is hardly plausible. Mrs. Gus Spreckels cannot yet afford to prompt the snubbing of the wives of New York millionaires.

That Fine Federal Plum

The political job-chasers are very active these days. From all parts of the State pulls are being brought to bear on Governor Pardee in the interest of candidates for the new Court of Appeals. That fine Federal plum, the District Court clerkship, made vacant by the death of George F. Morse, has started a whole pack of job-chasers. The salary and perquisites combined, of this office, are said to aggregate over eight thousand a year. Milt Green covets this plum but it is said that he will withdraw in the interest of strategic Jim Brown, who was in the public eye some years ago as one of the managers of that memorable fiasco, the Grant Senatorial campaign, which had its climax in one of the most unsavory explosions in the history of Californian politics. Brown was formerly an astute manipulator for the Southern Pacific Company, and therefore there are some people who do not regard him as an ideal man for a Federal Court clerkship. He has had good training as a practical politician, but that would not commend him to consideration as an aspirant for the clerkship were it not for the powerful pull that he is likely to invoke. If, however, it is desired to keep the court out of politics, no active politician will be considered.

Such a Nice Plan

The Bulletin proposes a fine plan for the abatement of the Schmitz evil. It is that the Republican and Democratic parties get together, agree on a candidate for Mayor, and nominate jointly a whole ticket. This is an excellent suggestion, but the plan is chimerical in the extreme. Some plans die "a-bornin'" and others are predestined to "gang agley." This one may come appropriately under either head. We have not reached the millennium. Such harmony as the Bulletin proposes has all the elements of tuneful dissonance. It is so naively proposed, however, that I should like to endorse it if for no other purpose than to cherish a pleasing illusion. Though the Bulletin does not suggest its joint candidate for Mayor, I am told that the people who conceived the harmony deal have that shrinking violet, Mr. James D. Phelan, up their sleeve. I understand that Mr. Phelan has declared that he will not take any chances; that he cannot afford to hazard his prestige by accepting a measly one party nomination. This is too bad. As a public spirited citizen Mr. Phelan should not consider such trifles. He has consecrated himself to the public weal, and he should be eager to give the people an opportunity to redeem their fair city through him. I have regarded him as of the stuff that would joyfully relinquish the laurel wreath for the crown of thorns. I hope that the apotheosis was not far-fetched. But if Mr. Phelan will have it no other way, then the leaders of both parties should get together.

George versus Gene

But there is another story, to the effect that Mr. Phelan would not be content with even a joint nomination, and that he wants a guarantee from Mayor Schmitz to quit running. As there is no likelihood of the withdrawal of Eugene, the harmony plansters have been coaxing Mr. George Newhall, the ex-Police Commissioner, to take the nomination. Mr. Newhall belongs to all the fashionable clubs, and when he was Police Commissioner he undertook to refine the department by presiding at all meetings in full evening dress. I hear that Mr. Abe Ruef, who does not seem to have been considered by those that are planning for the redemption of the city, but who knows that, as one of the leaders of the party, he must be considered, has signified his willingness to "stand in," providing George Newhall is agreed upon as the joint nominee. He says that he would rather have Gene running against George than to engage in another three-cornered fight. He thinks it would simplify matters greatly.

As to Mr. Long

In its discussion of the harmony plan the Bulletin asks, "Did not the Democrats have trouble enough last year to find a man to run against Percy Long for City Attorney, and will not Long be stronger next year than he was last?" No, Mr. Editor, the Democrats did not have any trouble in finding such a man. The election of Mr. Long last year was somewhat tainted. It looked very much as though Mr. McNab's attitude in that contest was about the same as it was in the memorable one between McNab and Scott some years ago. If you have forgotten it, Mr. McNab may be induced to repeat his confession to you, though that honorable gentleman does not like to discuss the matter. By the way, McNab's brother-in-law is a

Eves will Enter Paradise

The Pacific-Union Club is going to do an unprecedented thing, and one so absolutely delightful to the members' womenfolk that they can scarcely believe the news is true. The Pacific-Union will, on a stated Saturday, for one day only, throw open its new clubhouse to the sisters, mothers, wives and sweethearts of the members. At first, it was thought of giving a ball to celebrate the opening of the club, but the conservatives decided the effort would be too great. Then, besides, the wives of some of the snobbish members objected to a ball because it would be too mixed. After this one concession, the club says, its doors will forever be closed to the skirted sex. All the women relatives of the members, therefore, are in a flutter over the coming event. For will they not then discover what a real, wicked, whisky-drinking, poker-playing club is like? They intend, so I hear, to swoop down in swarms upon the clubhouse, on the occasion of the house-warming, when refreshments will be served and music will be played. On this great day, no men visitors will be welcomed at the club; the women are to be the sole and honored guests. And, by the way, the fiat has gone forth that hereafter no residents of this city may enter the Pacific-Union Club, unless they are members thereof. It is not that the club's membership roll is so exclusive, for it includes a few of the weirdest specimens of mentality and morality in town, but the rule was found necessary to preserve the sanctity of the place. It is a good rule, too, for there is no reason why the rights of club members should be intruded upon by unpleasant invasions of their townsmen. During the absence of J. W. Byrne in Europe Winfield Scott Keyes is taking the place of the president.

Women and Men's Clubs

There are a good many club Adams in this city who believe it was a false step when the first men's club admitted Eves to the male paradise. They argue that it cheapens the sanctuary when petticoats are permitted to swish their silken way up and down the stairs, into the reading room, library and dining room. The Bohemian Club has never seemed quite what it was in the old glorious past since every first Wednesday was given up to a "ladies' day," art exhibitions have opened to them the jinks room and society diners have invaded the Red Room. The University Club was far less exclusive after women were permitted to lunch there, and bring their friends. I hear that the Press Club, that is a majority of the members, are for closing down forever on the ladies' jinks. The Family Club is the one organization which bars women on all occasions from its rooms. The Family Club is the happiest, jolliest bohemian organization of brilliant men in this part of the world just now.

for foreign titles that she married two of them? The Marquise des Monstiers Merinville takes herself seriously. Therefore she lacks a sense of humor. Are converts from Catholicism so rare, these days, that the world considers it a great sensation when one is made? If the Marquise had based her defection on the discovery of some new truth, or on a spiritual revelation, the incident would be worth consideration, but according to her mysterious friend, who wrote to the Examiner on the subject, and whose name was not given, she left the Church because in Europe her eyes had been opened to what the Church really is, "and to its anything but sanctity." Unfortunately, her mysterious friend does not tell us in what matters the Church has failed to come up to her ideals. But it is evident that religion is not a serious matter with her. Nobody has ever claimed for the Catholic Church that its ministers can do no wrong. Lack of sanctity has frequently been observed in the Church, but nobody has ever considered that a good and sufficient reason for abandoning the religion. If it were the logical course to pursue, then we should forswear all religion. Perhaps the Marquise has been finding the support of a foreign title somewhat expensive, and has demanded the return of the money which she gave for the founding of the Catholic university. The denial of such demand would probably convince her that the Church was unsanctified.

The Literary Pursuit

Mrs. P. L. Wheeler with her two children leave this week for Mexico, where they will spend the winter. The first stop they intend to make is at Guadalajara, where Mrs. Wheeler intends to gather material for a book. In the early spring the family will return to San Francisco where Dr. Wheeler will have a home in readiness for them. Apropos of nothing, I wonder if any woman we know goes anywhere these decadent days without the intention of gathering material for a book.

A Vocal Teacher Wanted

The Charles Clarks have been entertaining a great deal both at their apartments at the St. Francis and at their big country home in San Mateo. I hear that Mrs. Clark, who is of the musical temperament, is trying to persuade her husband to have his voice cultivated. She thinks that it is of pleasing quality, and finds that he can keep on the key. Nearly all the Tobins are musical and they play a little on two or three instruments. Mrs. Clark is an active member of the fashionable Twentieth Century Musical Club. She is a pianist of unusual ability. Agnes Tobin plays both the violin and piano but her literary labors consume most of her time.

Beating The Fashion Barrier

Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels is astonishing everyone by the variety and gorgeousness of her frocks. They were all made in Paris, and are said to be ahead of the Parisian fashions. Fancy a San Franciscan beating the Parisian barrier in the matter of style! The story as it comes to me is that Mrs. Spreckels's gowns are replicas of some that are to be worn this winter by the Parisian actresses who start the fashions. She was vouchsafed the privilege of having them copied with the understanding that they would be worn only in America. A very pretty story; and one that will make the skeptical think that the Parisian dressmakers are as clever as the Parisian manufacturers of antiques for American millionaires. How subtle is the Gallic humor even among tradesmen! However Mrs. Spreckels's imported frocks are works of art, and it doesn't matter whether they are ahead or behind the Parisian fashions.

A Preparatory Rest

Since her return from St. Louis Mrs. Eleanor Martin has been taking the rest cure at her home, getting up steam, as it were, for the strenuous social life which she must face this winter. During her retirement the florists' wagons have been kept busy. Mrs. Martin has many warm, sincere friends in society.

The San Francisco Art Association's fall exhibition is now under way at the Hopkins. The exhibition, which includes water colors, pastels, black and white sketches, and oils, will be open until December second. On Friday evening, November twenty-fifth, and Thursday, December first, promenade concerts will be given under Sir Henry Heyman's direction.

Her Sad Home Coming

Mrs. John H. Boalt has returned from her long absence in Europe and has taken a flat in Broadway, where she will reside for the future. Few women have been compelled to pass through so many sorrows. First came the death of the only daughter of the house of Boalt, Alice, who married Hugh Tevis. Then Judge Boalt died, and the bereft mother and wife centred her affections about her little granddaughter, Alice Boalt Tevis. When she went abroad for a little trip, she left the child with her uncle, Will Tevis, as she felt that it would be good for the little girl to have the companionship of cousins of her own age. It was a great sacrifice for her to deny herself the little girl's companionship, and when she learned of Alice's death, and that her only remaining tie was taken from her, it was long before she could persuade herself to return to the city where she had suffered so much. However, she finally grew weary of wandering about Europe, and so she has come back to California to remain.

Dr. and Mrs. Russell Cool have gone to housekeeping in a picturesque home at the corner of Greenwich and Larkin streets. The Cools' old home, which was a part of the Robert Louis Stevenson house, is known as the Lloyd Osbourne house. It will be occupied this winter by the William Wesley Burnetts.

Jean Logan, the clever San Francisco girl who has made such a success as a dancer and producer of novelties suitable for children's entertainment, will give another delightful production this season. It is called "A Night of Revelry in Cupid's Garden," and will take place on Friday evening, December second. By desire Miss Logan will herself give several numbers.

More Men To Be Invited

Newell Drown was hostess at the first Gaiety Club dance of the season, in Century hall. Among the other debutantes belonging to this exclusive little club are Anita Harvey, Charlotte Wilson and Margaret Hyde-Smith. The Gaiety girls do not go in entirely for dancing, but also for charity as well. In their spare moments they knit slippers and sew pinafores for the poor, and last summer they rented a house over the bay and sent a number of poor people there to enjoy the fresh country air. I hear that the Gaieties intend to invite more men to their dances this year than received invitations last season. Last year some of the girls became tired of seeing the same old partners at every dance, and they made considerable complaint thereat. The majority of the club is conservative, however, and objected stiffly to inviting new men; this year, however, the minority has managed to stifle objections.

Color Schemes in Weddings

Gold and white were the colors selected for the wedding of Evelyn Craig of Piedmont and William L. Pat-tiani. The bride was in white panne satin, and the maid-of-honor, Jessie Craig, in golden-hued crepe de chine. The color-scheme at Isabelle Kendall's marriage with Kenneth Lowden was pink, and one of the bridesmaids told me that the color selection was the cause of the "nearest thing to a row" that ever crept up between bride and attendants. The girls of Oakland are getting tired of having to wear a set of gowns of the same color and all made alike.

Not an Eligible

The Rev. Edgar F. Gee, rector of St. John's, Oakland, is High Church in his ideas, and his church is just now in high favor among Oakland's smart religionists. The Rev. But—he says he is not for the domestic life. Have the spinsters been pursuing him?

Palace hotel. About seventy members representing nearly every important section of the State and the leading professions were in attendance.

Ardella Mills left Tuesday evening for New York, where she will pass the winter. She is going to be present at the wedding of a friend. The Huntingtons and all their connections will entertain her in the East and she will probably not return before spring. Miss Mills went to Portland last winter to remain three weeks and was absent three months.

Dr. Chismore's Accident

A serious accident befell Dr. Chismore the other day. He broke his hip, and though hopes are held out for his recovery, there is considerable doubt over the issue, as the bones do not knit readily. He is over in Mill Valley recuperating. Dr. Chismore is one of the oldest members of the Bohemian Club.

Expects To Go East

Maren Froelich has been exhibiting her summer sketches at her studio in Sacramento street. Besides these she has on view some of her clever ballet girls. I hear that Miss Froelich is looking longingly toward New York and that she may leave for the metropolis some time in the early spring. Miss Froelich is always in great demand at dinners and at house parties, on account of her wit and good nature. She is a frequent guest at Dick Hotaling's San Anselmo country place.

Mrs. William Lyndam Shiels is becoming one of the most popular hostesses in Oakland. She is giving a series of informal afternoon affairs invitations to which are given over the telephone. At these gatherings Oolong is the beverage that stimulates conversation.

Jane and Ethel Crellin are in Los Angeles, where they went to be bridesmaids to Laura Hubble. Miss Hubble is one of the girls who went abroad chaperoned by Mrs. Poulson and Miss Snell. There were four Los Angeles girls and the two Crellins from Oakland and they spent a year in foreign travel.

TOWN TALK

Her Delicate Thrust

An Atherton mot has been going the rounds ever since the Sequoia dinner in honor of the distinguished novelist. The mane-strokers did a great deal of gushing that evening. All of them desired that she should know that they had read her books, and they rustled up to her to say, "I sat up all night to read 'The Conqueror,'" or "I could not put down 'Rulers of Kings' until I had finished it," and one man by whom they were overheard was bored. By way of a josh he said in a jocular tone, "Mrs. Atherton, I enjoyed your 'Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch' very much." "You mean," said Mrs. Atherton, with a smile, "Mrs. Cabbage of the Wiggins Patch." All who heard it did not appreciate this delicate thrust at Alice H. Rice, who wrote "Mrs. Wiggs." The chief incident in "Mrs. Wiggs" is the dressing of the children for the party, a thing which was done in precisely the same manner but rather better, many years ago by Kate Douglas Wiggin in "The Bird's Christmas Carol," when the Ruggles children were feathered out for the party at the Birds.

That Two Dollar Show

The shrewd editors of several of the dailies were beautifully "taken in" by the press agent of "The Runaways" and the manager of the California theatre. It is a resourceful press agent who can hit upon a scheme these days for the victimizing of the newspapers in the interest of a theatrical show. Sensational fake stories about actresses have been depended upon so often to secure space in the papers, that the editors have become freezingly incredulous toward press agents. So agent Miller of "The Runaways" left the beaten track. Sunday night the newspapers were made aware of a controversy between the manager of that company and Mr. Ackerman, manager of the California. It was reported that the show manager had demanded that top prices be raised to two dollars during the engagement of his company, but that Mr. Ackerman was so devoted to principle and the clientele of his house he would not consent. The show manager was indignant at the thought of playing his fine company to a dollar audience, but Mr. Ackerman was inexorable. He preferred to keep his house dark, and the show manager preferred not to play. Threats of litigation followed, and later on, to give vraisemblance to the melodramatic plot, suit was actually commenced. But all the while preparations for the production were in progress, and the company's advertising paper was put out earlier than usual. Of course "The Runaways" will open Monday night, and the suit will be compromised. Now as to a few facts that have not yet appeared. This same company, with Mr. Arthur Dunn, the gentleman who is now the star, in that same capacity, and under the same management, played at Proctor's theatre, in Fifty-eighth street, New York, two months ago, and the prices charged for seats on the orchestra floor were seventy-five and fifty cents. Perhaps the show would make good in this city at two dollars, but it is not a two-dollar show. Perhaps Mr. Ackerman was not a party to the tricking of the press, but I am surprised that he did not look up the theatrical dope book, and expose the press agent.

The latter, I believe, learned the tricks of the trade under the tutelage of Charley Davis, who was connected with a circus for many years, and who originated the famous white elephant advertising dodge.

Some Decoration Triumphs

In mentioning last week the names of some of our San Francisco women who have found in floral decorating a lucrative profession, I inadvertently omitted the name of Miss Charlotte F. Williams, one of the best known of the number. Yet I remember many brilliant social events where the decorations were designed by her. The "poinsettia dinner" given by Mrs. Walter Dean at the Palace two years ago was one, and another was the dinner given by Mrs. Hearst in honor of Dr. Reisner, the famous Egyptologist. Then there was the Schilling dinner at which employees from all parts of the United States were entertained, and for which Miss Williams transformed the packing court into a forest glade. She also did the decorations at the Huntington-Perkins wedding at Trinity, the Roosevelt banquet last year, the reception of the Grand Commandery of California during Conclave week, the Kohl tea, the Haight dinner at the Bohemian Club and the banquet of the Merchants' Association at the Palace, the last two occurring this week.

San Mateo Meet

Charles W. Clark will entertain a large house-party next week, when the California Polo and Pony Racing Association holds its meet on the Clark grounds. Mr. Clark has transformed his course to accommodate the Association's friends and the public, and has spent a lot of money on improvements. It has been decided that the polo tournament shall be played on the club field at Burlingame. In addition to home talent, Messrs. Pedley, Praed, Hudson and Coleman, a strong contingent from the South, will appear on the field. Mr. Clark's stables are sheltering not only his own ponies but the strings of Rudolph Spreckels, W. G. Pedley and R. M. Tobin. General Barrett will be the presiding judge, flanked by Major Rathbone and John Parrott. Special trains will be run to San Mateo on each of the race days, the twenty-fourth and twenty-sixth, returning to town immediately after the last race. Society is taking a tremendous interest in the meet.

Gayley Elates The Berkleyites

Professor Charles Mills Gayley, author of "The Star of Bethlehem," and other things too numerous to mention, has indicated his appreciation of Berkeley by becoming a lot owner in the college town, and Berkeley is much pleased, the supposition being that the distinguished gentleman contemplates illuminating the burg with his aureole during the remainder of his days. The site of his future home is near that of President Wheeler but at a higher elevation, and commands a marine view.

They Are Not Sociable

Mrs. A. A. Pennoyer of Berkeley is about to leave for a year's stay abroad, where she intends to gather material for a new book. Despite the literary atmosphere, the college town is not in high favor with this talented woman. I hear that there is a good deal of discontent among those who have taken up their residence in the shadow of the great university, hoping to meet the professors and their wives. The fact is that unless one has some sort of an entree one might as well live in the Antipodes as in this culture-filled village. In addition to the professors there is a large colony of navy and army officers, retired, beside the families of those who are on long cruises or at out-of-the-way army posts. There is very little sociability among the various cliques.

A Berkeley Engagement

Florence Senger, whose engagement to Dudley Saeltzer has just been announced, is a very young girl. She is the daughter of Professor and Mrs. Henry Senger, and her childhood's days were passed in San Francisco. That was when Professor Senger was a teacher in the Girls' High School. The Sengers have for some years been shining lights among the "faculty set" in Berkeley. Dudley Saeltzer and Florence Senger were fellow students at the Berkeley High School, and later attended the university, where Mr. Saeltzer became prominent as a football player and a member of the rollicking set. For one of his freaks he was "sent down," I believe. He is the son of the wealthiest man in Redding, and with his brother will some day come into a rich inheritance. He is a great sportsman and when Professor Leuschner used to take his camping trips to the Sierras, young Saeltzer was always of the party.

She Mixed Her Lines

Among Berkeley's literati are two who always turn green eyes toward each other whenever the other's poems are mentioned. A society woman of the college town resolved to end this state of affairs. She gave a card-party, invited the rival poetesses, and offered as prizes volumes of their verse. When the game was finished the more excitable of the two poets found she was doomed to pass her inspired words, bound in vellum, to her sister scribbler. "Say something pretty, such as 'it is carrying coals to Newcastle,'" whispered the lady of the house; "and for heaven's sake say it as if you meant it." But when the excitable one passed her book to her rival she said: "Here is the prize you have won, my poems, and I know that you will agree with me that it is really casting pearls before swine." Then she sat down and wondered why the people were so silent.

for genius, when it is not to be had they accept any kind of substitute that bears even a remote relationship to it. At present they are celebrating Captain Dupont, the father of Maxine Elliott, not because he is the progenitor of a theatrical star, but on account of his relationship to Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, the famous odesmith. It does not matter much that he was not a blood relative. Suffice it for the Oaklanders that his first wife was a cousin of the New England poet. Poor Jack London is so pestered by lion hunters that he is thinking of putting the bay between himself and the bores. To mitigate the nuisance he has forsworn the telephone. Not long ago he was invited over the phone to a dinner by one of the great dames across the bay. "But I don't know you," said the novelist.

"Oh, that's all right," said the lady, "we know you are all right. We should like you to bring along a short story. It will surely be appreciated."

"High Living"

If patrons of the Latin cafes that abound on the Barbary Coast have any curiosity regarding the ingredients of the mysterious concoctions for which those resorts are famous they may satisfy it by purchasing the brochure which has been issued under the title of "High Living" by Paul Elder, for the benefit of the Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Association. This little volume contains a large number of recipes collected in the Latin quarter, and as they serve to lift the veil of mystery perhaps many of the savory dishes that heretofore found favor will no longer appeal to the bohemian bons vivants who like atmosphere with their meals. Few people would care to find inspiration for a steady diet in this quaint cook-book, but there is much in it to interest, not the least of which is the preface by Ned Hamilton. It contains a stronger appeal than many of the dishes. I quote:

The dictum went out that the sheep were to be parted from the goats; and the goats were sent to Telegraph Hill. There were many shepherds for the sheep. They were led into the green pastures beside the still waters. At night their folds were watched and tended. But the goats foraged for themselves. They roamed the rough places. They browsed upon the tin cans and detritus of life. There were none to stroke them or call them soft names. They made their bed upon the long, hard road. They lived a stained and rugged life. They made a comrade of Necessity rather than Ambition. But, they lived. It was the kids that died. They were not fitted for the chill nights and the buffetings. If they grew they were gnarled and twisted. They lay down in squalor, and they arose in misery. But the sheep were tended, and the world ran on. Then some young women took notice of this unconsidered hillside where the goats browsed gloomily, and where the kids were gaunt and strange. These were young women of the pleasant ways of life. They could have gone on in the flower-bordered paths, hearing the lark sing and stringing the daisy-chains. But they left the pleasaunces, and went up into the hard places, where the rough goats were, and the strange, white kids. Out of their devotion was born the Telegraph Hill Neighborhood Association. They made a small beginning, but it was a good beginning. There were ten thousand discouragements. But those young women put down those discouragements with courage. They established their association and rooted it in the rocks of the Hill. Where there was sickness they sent a doctor and a nurse, a flower and a smile. Where there was discour-

Gunter's Success

The Alcazar has been playing "Prince Karl" by Archibald Gunter, which recalls the story of Gunter's first success. Gunter was the son of a wealthy family and had long been a literary dilettante. When he finally succeeded in getting a publisher for his first story, "Mr. Barnes of New York," all the Gunters were duly delighted. The publishers had been subsidized by the family to a certain extent and the first edition was to be of five thousand volumes. A mistake was made in giving the order and the publishers found themselves loaded up with twenty-five thousand volumes. The only way to come out anywhere even was to boom the book. Much money was spent in advertising, the name of the book was on everybody's lips and Archibald Gunter's vogue had commenced.

Reminiscent of the Kirkhams

At last the meteoric career of poor Leilah Kirkham Yarde-Buller is ended, and it now behooves some sympathetic character-depictor to embody "Lady" Yarde-Buller in a novel. The dailies have left me little to say except to comment on the end of this extraordinary woman, whose life was packed full of exciting episodes. Her eccentricities at times approached insanity, and she ended her days in a sanitarium. Old-time Oaklanders relate many stories of Leilah Kirkham's youth, and stormy womanhood. The Kirkham family were always a mystery in many ways to their Oakland neighbors, for they had a way of keeping their own secrets which both baffled and puzzled. The Kirkham home was at one time one of the show-places over the bay, and after other old homes went to seed by reason of the owners' death or removal, the Kirkhams still kept up their ancient state, and gave their house an annual coat of paint. But Oakland grew, and the city demanded right of way, and a street was cut through the grove of feathery bamboo that was the striking feature of the Kirkham grounds. The trees, too, planted to ensure immunity from the gaping gaze of outsiders, were cut down. At one time there was a boat-house at the end of the Kirkhams' yard, with a string of boats moored to its posts, but after the lake was cut off, the estuary filled with mud and spoiled it for rowers. Wharf-rats found a home in the old boat-house.

COLLECTION OF RARE NOVELTIES.

Mr. and Mrs. Graham, of New York, have on exhibition in Room 725, the St. Francis hotel, a most beautiful and valuable collection of hand-embroidered shirtwaists and gowns, neckwear and table linen, also a remarkably rare and unique variety of exclusive holiday novelties. These particular articles of art are only imported in one pattern of each kind and should be very desirable for Christmas presents where extreme individuality is desired. Mr. and Mrs. Graham also take orders for hand-embroidered table and bed linens, towels, and the most elegantly executed monogram work on any fabric.

Greenwood's Thanksgiving

BY ROBERT MACE.

Reginald De Peyster Greenwood, fastidious and cultured man of the world, and master of all the emotions that he was, could not, in this instance, simulate composure. It was quite apparent that he was dreadfully embarrassed. His flushed face attested his self-consciousness. He was sorry that he had entered the big department store. It was not his custom to patronize those big establishments in which girls are employed as clerks. But he had read an advertisement setting forth that something new in pajamas had been imported, and Greenwood's fad was fancy garments for night wear. And he had just decided to buy a suit of white and lavender stripes. He was sure that nothing so magnificent had ever adorned his graceful figure. It was after he had given the salesman his name and address and was waiting for his change that the pathetic violet eyes and exquisitely trim figure of the maid behind the soda-water fountain had done their deadly work.

There is no sadder sight than a work-weary face with the beauty of a goddess on every feature, and a pathetic appeal in every characteristic curve. Such was the face of the soda-water maid. She was rather tall and her face gleamed with the pallor that is born of long hours of fatigue. But her thin cotton dress failed to conceal the outlines of a most beautiful arm; moreover, her hands were slim and very white, and tipped with delicate filbert-shaped nails whose pinkness rivaled the momentary flush that his gaze had brought to her cheek.

Greenwood knew that she had seen the white and lavender striped garments, and he felt that she suspected him of being a feather-brained dude; or, perhaps, she thought him a rake who wore such garments to make an impression on some simple maiden of her own type. He made his exit from the store as quickly as possible.

Greenwood was not an intentional lady-killer. Indeed it was only his tenderness of nature that made him respond to every girl in San Francisco's smart set who fell a victim to his fetching person and charming manner. That his means were small was no bar to his social success, for he had blood of ancient blue, and plenty of name to back it. He was one of the popular members of the Bohemian Club, and also one of the fastest. But not long before the opening of this tale he had pledged vows of eternal fidelity to Miss Follansbee, plump and blonde, with baby-blue eyes and a ridiculously rich father.

But after leaving the department store that day Greenwood could not help comparing Miss Follansbee, the dashing society girl, with the beautiful soda-water maiden, and much to the former's disadvantage. Though it was only a few days before that he had poured forth words of burning passion into Miss Follansbee's eager ear, he was now reflecting that she wore bizarre frocks and impossible hats.

The next day Greenwood went back to the department store, but not for more pajamas. He patronized the soda-water fountain, and received the beverage from the shapely hand of the girl with the violet eyes. He remarked that it was a nice day, though it was raining, and when he recalled the fact he became embarrassed again. The violet eyes smiled, and Greenwood doffed his hat and retired.

That night Greenwood confessed to himself that he was in love, and the next day he went back again, bought two glasses of soda and talked about the weather. The maid with the violet eyes disclosed the fact that she possessed a silvery voice, and when Greenwood walked up the street the voice lingered in his ears.

That night at the Bohemian Club he dined alone, and over a glass of fizz he wondered what some of the fellows at adjoining tables would say if they knew of his romance. He had never felt so sentimental. He thought of Miss Follansbee and then began to despise riches, but at the same time he recalled that his aged and wealthy grandmother was not long for this life. It was upon her that he drew quite liberally, and thus managed to eke out bouquets, bon-bons, theatre boxes and golf clubs.

The next day he strangled his thirst for soda, but early that November evening he walked in the direction of the department store. The rain was pouring down, and running in big streams along the pavement. As he approached the store there came swiftly toward him a figure that he instantly recognized. The figure was struggling against the wind, and was unprotected from the rain.

Greenwood accosted the figure politely, and sheltered it with his umbrella. "I—I—beg your pardon," he stammered, "but will you let me protect you from the rain?"

The girl glanced at him shyly.

"Is your home far away?" he asked.

"No; I live on Howard near Sixth," she said.

"I will walk there with you, if you don't object."

The girl silently placed her hand on his arm, and they walked along together.

Before reaching their destination Greenwood told her that he was greatly interested in her, and he hoped she would not think him rude if he asked her to permit him to see her often.

She was almost too embarrassed to reply, but she told him she would introduce him to her mother. Greenwood was thrilled with pleasure. Lucy O'Brien—that was her name—introduced him to Mrs. O'Brien, an honest-faced, big limbed woman. She was glad to meet him, and thanked him for his kindness to her daughter.

It was a small flat that the O'Briens lived in, but it was scrupulously clean and neatly furnished. Greenwood was asked to call again, and Mrs. O'Brien suggested that he might like to come to Thanksgiving dinner. He said that he would be delighted.

For a whole week Greenwood argued with himself. He was intent upon convincing himself that he was foolish, but the face of Lucy O'Brien haunted him every minute of the day, and he could not banish the sound of her sweet voice. He was head over heels in love.

On the day of national rejoicing he presented himself at the O'Brien flat. Shortly after his arrival he was ushered into the little dining-room, where dinner was served by the widow O'Brien. It was a simple repast, but well cooked. Mrs. O'Brien was skilled in the culinary art. Greenwood sat beside Lucy, and every word she uttered gave him a thrill of pleasure. As the dinner progressed he chatted amiably with her, and found that she was a very intelligent girl. He was in most exuberant spirits until the turkey was served. He happened to turn to Lucy to make some unimportant remark, when he was amazed to see Mrs. O'Brien use her knife as though it were a trowel. She seemed to be partial to dressing.

At that moment it occurred to Greenwood that to become Lucy's husband meant the acquisition of Mrs. O'Brien for a mother-in-law.

After dinner he explained that he had an important business engagement. The following Sunday he dined with Miss Follansbee.

A Play That Shocks

There are more shocks than thrills in "Hearts Aflame," the play by Genevieve Greville Haines, now appealing to Majestic patrons. Even the cynical and unsqueamish are shocked on being taken into the confidence of a polished roue, who calmly plots the seduction of a married woman, schemes to lure her from her husband, discusses ways and means with his friend, and without having received the slightest encouragement. The villain who pursues his unholy passion for a pure woman in the chill atmosphere and Arctic solitude of his bachelor quarters is distinctly a melodramatic creation. When you meet him across the

MISS LAURA KINZE von KISIELNICKA,

The distinguished German contralto, who will be heard for the first time in San Francisco at Steinway hall, next Tuesday evening.

footlights you find it hard to take him seriously. He is a painful conception, the aftermath of a playwright's mental debauch. And such is Mr. Paul Charteris, the central figure of "Hearts Aflame." Miss Haines found him in a novel which was probably a "best seller," a feast of intellect to which the lovers of slushmushgush were invited. The play has a lot of prurient passion and takes a mild plunge into hysterical melodrama, and yet if the implausibility of Charteris doesn't strike you it should not be hard to follow the development of the plot; for despite its shortcomings, the play has two powerful situations and two or three clear-cut characterizations. Miss Haines has a whole kit of familiar theatrical conceits which she lets loose at appropriate intervals, and if there was nothing more to the play than the second act it would be worth while. The supper scene in Charteris's quarters is an artistic transcript of the sort of life it purports to deal with. It is in this act, by the way, that Eleanor Gordon gives rein to the temperament of which she has more than once given hint in less important roles. She appears as a loosely-moraled young French woman of the music hall stage, and there is nothing pallid in the passion that she exhibits. She is almost Carmenesque, and almost too realistic for polite stage purposes. When she flings her arms around the neck of her lover, and imprints a burning and protracted kiss on his lips, there is more than a suggestion of Sappho in the performance. Next to Miss Gordon I should rank Harry Mestayer in this week's production for his work as Reggie Browne, the society beau. But the company is strong in the masculine element. If there were as many capable women as there are men in the company it would be a very strong organization. Mr. Gilmour plays Charteris so earnestly that he almost succeeds in refining the character. Howard Gould's degenerate husband is effective in spots. It is an exceedingly melodramatic portrayal. But Mr. Gould's impersonation of a drunkard is that of a man who has never looked on the wine when it bubbles. Going lame in one leg and affecting a thick tongue with the aid of a negro dialect is hardly the way to counterfeit inebriety. Miss Adele Block brings a few gowns to her aid in the role of Mrs. Harmony, but she lacks the five o'clock tea repose, and her emotional work is far from convincing. Miss Block is the unfortunate possessor of an inflexible voice that does not lend itself to the nuances of emotion.

Theodore Bonnet.

The Beautiful Maxine

Of Maxine Elliott's beauty there is no dispute. The graces of her person are akin to those that gave to the art of ancient Europe those classic models which have been the inspiration and despair of the chisels and brushes of the modern world. It is the art of Maxine Elliott that has not won universal recognition, and singular as it may appear, her beauty is responsible for the obtuseness of the public. That she is a woman of artistic temperament and capable of artistic achievement I have long maintained, and now that she is coming back to the Columbia as a star I am pleased to report that she is not stellar touring on her beauty alone. I recall that when she played Portia to the Shylock of her unbeautiful husband, Mr. Nat Goodwin, the New York critics remarked that she was too beautiful for the role, a singular objection, since the genius that endowed Portia with a large and keen intelligence, and the ability to "turn two mincing steps into a manly stride," did not sacrifice one trait of her essential womanliness. However, the critics would not commend Maxine Elliott's Portia, but when she made her appearance in "Her Own Way" they were forced to confess that she possessed genuine histrionic ability, and though I have not much confidence in the judgment that pronounced her too beautiful to play Portia, I hope to be able to endorse the verdict in the case of "Her Own Way." It has long been believed that beauty was first aid to an actress, and though it is a good thing for a woman to have about her it is far from being essential to success on the stage. With Lily Langtry and Mrs. James Brown Potter green in the memory we were inclined to regard any actress advertised as a beauty as that and nothing more. Maxine Elliott, being a woman of brains, was ambitious of a nobler fame than that which is insured without effort by unusual physical graces. She had confidence in her art, but was handicapped both by her beauty and her husband; the latter having long been idolized by the theatregoers, radiated a glow that dimmed the lustre of all others in his immediate vicinity. So the fair Maxine decided to sever the domestic leading strings, and test the full candle-power of her own light. And from all accounts the test was highly satisfactory. Her success in New York last season, with failures strewing Broadway, and her husband conspicuous among them, was a pleasing surprise.

The bill at the Orpheum this week is one of uniform excellence. There is something in each turn to suit every one in the audience. If it were possible to pick out a headliner on the program I would choose Augusta Glose, whose monologue is the best ever. Miss Glose has a charming personality, what is known as a refined voice and a magnetic manner. Her imitations are clever and her dialect true enough to life to be screamingly funny. "Why Doogan Swore Off" is the vehicle used by comedian Murphy to exploit his talents as a funny Irishman. It is an entertaining little skit, rather above the average Orpheum playlet as to construction and lines. The Three Rammoniers are a trio of strenuous Frenchmen who do all sorts of seemingly impossible stunts on a ladder and a trapeze. Miss Rammonier succeeds in thrilling every one in the audience by her feats on the high trapeze, but preserves a highly nonchalant manner throughout the whole performance that is admirable. John T. Kelly continues to keep gallery and parquet in an uproar and the "Navajo Girls" are as tuneful as ever.

The Climbers

It was a bold stroke for the Alcazar management to put on "The Climbers." Clyde Fitch's clever play abounds in a great many difficulties, not the least of which is the number of competent players required for the many interesting parts, most of them having been written to order for the different members of the temperamental company that Amelia Bingham gathered together two years ago. Lillian Lawrence steps gracefully into the role that Miss Bingham created, dresses the part fully as well, and makes as interesting if not quite so beautiful a Mrs. Sterling as the actress-manager. John Craig would be a credit to any company and his work in "The Climbers" adds greatly to the decidedly favorable impression he has made here. Luke Connness has a very difficult part in the weak Mr. Sterling, and although he is not a Lackaye he plays it cleverly enough. A more ingenuous ingenue than Miss Woodson could hardly be imagined. She is one of the most unartificial actresses that the Alcazar has ever had and it is to be hoped that her future experience in stock will not render her mechanical and stogy. As the youngest daughter she is deliciously droll in the cynical lines of the part. Joseph Maher does some of the cleverest character work of his career as Mr. Trotter. Miss Winifred Gordon does well in the small part allotted to her. The others in the cast do creditable work. The play is exceedingly well mounted for a stock company production.

Herschel Mayall had a chance this week to do some admirable acting as the hero in the war-drama, "Winchester," at the Central. Major Kearny is a brave, fine character, just suited to Mayall's characteristics. Howell also has an opportunity to do some of his best character work, as the Southern officer. Miss Clifton gains in favor every week with the theatre's patrons, and her portrayal of the lovable heroine is refined and sympathetic.

ETHEL CLIFTON,

The young and talented leading lady at the Central. Miss Clifton will have a strong part in "Queen of the White Slaves," next week's bill.

LILLIAN TYCE and IRENE JERMON,

The "Real Irish Girl" and the Singing Comedienne, who will live things up at the Orpheum next week.

"The Star of Bethlehem"

An important event in the history of dramatic art in California will be the production by the Ben Greet players of the miracle play of the Nativity, "The Star of Bethlehem," reproduced from the old English cycles of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries by Charles Mills Gayley, Professor of English literature at the University of California, and arranged for representation by Ben Greet. Manager Greenbaum promises a splendid production, with musical numbers appropriate to the work, by a male choir and string instruments. The play will be given the entire week beginning Monday, November twenty-eighth, with matinees Wednesday, Friday and Saturday. Seats will be ready next Wednesday morning. Each scene is announced by an angel, who acts as a narrator. The picture of the manger, and the characters of St. Mary the Virgin, and Child, Joseph and the Angel, are said to be marvelously realistic and impressive. "The Star of Bethlehem" should be seen in order that it may be fully understood and appreciated, it being something that students of church history and all interested in the ways of the Middle Ages should witness.

Next Week's Bills

Maxine Elliott in Clyde Fitch's play, "Her Own Way," comes to the Columbia Monday night, November twenty-first. There will be a special holiday matinee on Thanksgiving day in addition to the regular Saturday matinees. Manager Dillingham will present Miss Elliott with the same production seen in New York. Miss Elliott will be assisted by a strong company, which includes Charles Cherry, James Carew, R. C. Herz, Georgia Lawrence, Fanny Addison Pitt, Nellie Thorne and little Donald Galaher.

At the Alcazar will be given the first San Francisco production of "The Village Postmaster," a comedy of rural life in New England, which had a run of three hundred nights at the Fourteenth street theatre, New York, and others little less remarkable in Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago. For two entire seasons it filled the Great Northern theatre, in Chicago, in opposition to "Way Down East" and "Lovers' Lane." Lillian Lawrence and John Craig were very successful in this play at the Castle Square in Boston, where it ran for four weeks. To follow, November twenty-eighth, comes Hall Caine's "The Christian."

"Queen of the White Slaves," which will be produced for the first time in this city at the Central Monday night, is a gigantic and thrilling melodrama, with nineteen scenes and six acts, every one filled with soul-stirring incidents. The plot tells of a young woman who is about to be abducted and sold to a firm in China which sell white women. The rescue is made only after the most exciting situations ever staged and of course all ends happily.

The fourth and last week of "The Messenger Boy" at the Tivoli will be distinguished by two special events. The first of these occurs on Tuesday evening, the twenty-second, and is the benefit arranged for the Women's Exchange. The second is the extra Thanksgiving matinee on Thursday afternoon, the twenty-fourth. What with the grand operatic matinee on Sunday, the twentieth, with Mme. Francisca as "Lucia," the Women's Exchange benefit and the Thanksgiving matinee, it will be a busy week at the Tivoli. Behind the scenes and in the rehearsal rooms of the big opera house, all is agog over the elaborate preparations that are being made to produce "King Dodo" on the twenty-eighth instant. This will be one of the most ambitious of the many similar undertakings made by the Tivoli management. Among the chief objects of interest in the "King Dodo" production will be Irene Outtrim, the Tivoli's new soubrette, who makes her debut in America as a principal of the organization.

"The Taming of Helen" will follow "Hearts Aflame" at the Majestic Monday night. The play is the second effort and the most successful of Richard Harding Davis's attempts in the field of playwriting, and it was a big drawing card when presented here two seasons ago by Margaret Anglin and Henry Miller. With the capable people that form Mr. Morosco's strong and well-balanced stock organization, there can be no doubt that "The Taming of Helen" will equal the Miller-Anglin production of the play two seasons ago.

The musical tomfoolery, "The Show Girl," which ran for four months at Wallack's, New York, will receive its first production in this city at the Grand at tomorrow's matinee. It will remain the attraction for two weeks. Hilda Thomas will reappear after an absence of several years, and will have the assistance of Sam Mylie and a splendid company, a fascinating feature of which will be a beautiful chorus of thirty New York girls. Magnificent scenery and costumes are promised and the music, which was written by the composer of "The Tenderfoot," is said to be very catchy and melodious. Special prices will prevail and there will be a special matinee Thanksgiving day.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew, the eminent comedy couple, will reappear at the Orpheum after a long absence from San Francisco, in "When Two Hearts Are Won." Webb's seals will be in evidence with their juggleries, brass band effects and comicalities. DeWitt, Burns and Torrance will offer "The Awakening of Toys," in which they introduce some excellent work in acrobatics and equilibrium. Lillian Tyce, known as the "real Irish girl," and Irene Jermon, a dainty singing comedienne, will appear for the first time here.

For Thanksgiving week an unusually strong program will be given at the Chutes. Edward Raymond and Beatrice Tricey, a renowned comedy duo, will appear here for the first time, in "A Mr. and a Miss Mistaken," and Karl and De Elmer, known as the "flying flames," will give a startling aerial gymnastic act. Musical Bentley will present the original specialty that has won him fame all over the East, and Duke Johnson and Mae Wells, the "colored criterions," will change their songs, dances and costumes.

The sixth annual benefit in aid of the charity fund of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco will take place at the Orpheum on Friday afternoon, December ninth, beginning at one o'clock sharp. The very best attractions from the leading theatres of the city will be on the program and the performance will be continuous. The local managers have relieved many cases of illness and distress and buried several unfortunate actors during the last twelve months and, in consequence, their funds have been depleted to a considerable extent. The public is always quick and ready to respond for this really worthy cause, however, and the big theatre will undoubtedly be packed.

Good Things Coming

No sooner is a London or Broadway success available for stock than alert Manager Price, of the Alcazar-Central theatres, snaps it up with the decisiveness of a bull terrier despatching a rat. The result is the Alcazar presentation of many plays which have been heard of here but not seen. "The Village Postmaster" has been given all over the East for five years, and is still challenging the lead with "Way Down East." It required a great deal of figuring to secure it for stock, but the Alcazar hands it out next week as a Thanksgiving dish fresh from the oven. The list to follow includes such well known successes as "Are You a Mason?" "Mistakes Will Happen," "Taps," Mansfield's "Heidelberg," Willard's "Professor's Love Story," Clyde Fitch's "The Girl and the Judge," "The Stubbornness of Geraldine," "Captain Jinks of the Horse Marines" and "Harriet's Honeymoon," and a long line of romantic plays such as "Alice of Old Vincennes" and "When Knighthood was in Flower."

The Hidden Melody

BY OLIVER J. WHITE.

The glimmering lights of Broadway got into his brain, and he left home and his people and came to live in the city. He met a woman, and she was not just what she should be, but he loved her, married her, and when she left him it broke his heart; that is really all there is to the story. It's as old as men and women and as commonplace as some of them. This is written in self-defence, for, if at the end of a story the reader is left unmoved or unsurprised, the blame falls on the story writer, unless he explains before hand the trend of the tale. Remember then, that the glimmering lights got into his brain, and it being an impressionable, artistic brain, they were his inevitable ruin, for genius often takes electric lights for stars, and the stars demand satisfaction.

There is no need wasting time in a retrospection; we have nothing to do with Strangler's former life in the country: he led the usual commonplace existence, was appreciated by the few, depreciated by the many. He was gifted with the sense of melody and before his lips could form words, they formed harmonies; he fingered the church organ until he grew to be a part of it; he was a musician and a great one at seventeen. That was when the glimmer of the lights came before his eyes and led him into the vortex — (that is an old expression, but it is a good one) — led this crude, unformed boy into that diseased world, Bohemia.

Seated at a rude, jingly piano was John Strangler. His long, thin bony fingers jangled out rag-time melodies and waltzes arranged from sentimental songs; he never heeded those he played for, and for a long time after, he took "pink eye" Jose's place at the stool. They did not heed him, further than to make some ribald remarks about him, to which he replied not. He gave a strange new atmosphere to the place and soon became one of its chief attractions. Reporters took him up and wrote the usual Sunday stories about him; very, very sentimental stories, for they were written on the spot — on beer-slopped tables; cigarette-stained fingers sketched his face, and even they could not rob it of its innate refinement. John Strangler had become a part of this life as he had become a part of the organ.

The women soon grew to love him. His strange pale face fascinated them no less than his peculiar manner of paying them no attention. He expected this, knew it would come and repulsed them with masterful ease, until one night, during a resting space, he ventured on a simple little melody of his own making: a quaintly wistful little thing like a momentary thought that flits in and out one's mind and leaves no ripple after; when he finished, he felt soft fingers in his hair, and started. There was a wild laugh, and a young woman hurried away to one of the tables, where a thin, dissipated-looking manikin held forth behind a barricade of empty bottles. To obliterate the incident, Strangler dashed into a twinkling rag, and the room swayed with dancers.

That night in his room he recalled the touch of the fingers and the expression of the face, and recalled also that she from the first had been different from the others. Do you begin to see the trend of the tale, the utter conventionality of it — isn't she always "different" from the others?

Pearl Bowser was her name; she had golden hair, and was very tall — that is what we should have noticed. John Strangler could have told you that her eyes were a twinkly black; that her form was — those things are matters of taste. She had golden hair and was very tall, this he had always known. Now he knew something else: her fingers were very soft and soothing. She was a character, was Pearl Bowser, as gentle as a gentle woman when she desired, or as mean and heartless as a social coquette; just the woman to attract such a man as John Strangler — affinities take strange forms at times.

Little impromptu melodies soon grew to be a regular part of the night's entertainment and she would come over to his side and stand there listening, and though in the past he had always dwelt in the melodies, his eyes would now sometimes wink into hers and he'd grow dizzy and a strange feeling would come into his heart — a dull, dry ache, and he wasn't so much the fool that he didn't know the meaning of it all.

One night she called him over to her table. A crowd of gay bucks had come in and one of them wished to play the piano. Only too pleased for the moment's rest, he gave up his seat. This was when she called him over. He remembered months after that she whispered something to the dissipated manikin, and that the manikin sneered and joined another party. But at the time, he said nothing. The incident meant nothing. The youth at the piano, encouraged and flattered by the applause, played for an hour, and in that hour the fates had their little joke. Strangler told her his story, told her his dreams, in the colorful words that artists can use when speaking of those things nearest the heart, and as his voice trembled with the telling, her eyes grew wet with the listening, and he saw it. The usual sudden and uncontrollable desire that we've so often read about came over him; reaching across the table he took her hand — and what do you think? — asked her to be his wife — to bear his name. Can you imagine anything so ridiculous, asking this creature — the queen, one might say, of this earthly hell — to bear his name? Only one more ridiculous thing could happen, and it did. She agreed to it, and as she did, the fates went to sleep. They were not heeded — such a union would take care of its own consummation. It has always been so since men and women made mistakes. The youth at the piano played until his fingers ached, played until they dragged him from the stool and closed up for the night.

For awhile we can leave the atmosphere of smoke and dirt and get a breath of fresh air as they did, but only for awhile. The reader can understand that once in, we can never thoroughly get the smell of it out of our nostrils. Yes, I'm sure you'll understand that.

These two foolish people, John Strangler and his wife Pearl, rented a little hall room and were happy in a feverish way. Happy, deliriously so — one moment, the next a little doubtful, for there was scarcely enough space for a great doubt in such a small room. He gave up his position as keyman at McTeague's, and with fortune's aid, and by making the price small, got a church position — for as I said, the organ and he were as one.

Completely weaned away from the old atmosphere, the life that we passed over as being inconsequential, came back to him — the memory of his desires and dreams, the dreams that had died one by one but whose memory exuded a quaintly haunting perfume, that beguiled him into thinking they were only asleep; and one night while his wife's head lay on his breast a melody came to him, and in this melody was, I must repeat, the life we passed over. And the melody lengthened as the night did and before morning the finis was supplied. And what do you think it was? — the life fate had bade him live. Its curses, its tears, its sins, and its inevitable end. It was as though the music said, "Listen and choose"; it made an odd musical number, so odd, that John

TOWN TALK

Strangler hid it deep in his heart and no one, not even his wife Pearl, knew anything of it.

After a long Sunday service one morning Strangler complained of a headache, and his wife Pearl took him to a druggist, a friend of hers, who gave him sixteen powders.

"One of them will cure your headache, three of them will kill you."

His wife Pearl complained that she had headaches every morning; that was how sixteen powders were prepared. In the little hall room John Strangler cured his headache and was so pleased that he carefully secreted the powders away, of course first showing the hiding place to his wife Pearl. That night he awoke strangling. The druggist's face was familiar—he could not remember it in the morning for it had always been at night when he had seen it; it was the thin, dissipated little manikin and he had brought back the smell of McTeegue's dance hall.

They were preparing, the minister and the choir, for a stupendous church concert and John Strangler expected to astonish them with his playing, when some one complained of him in an anonymous note. They were invited to investigate his past, which they did, and on the morning of the concert John Strangler was shown the note and the proof of its truthfulness. He found his wife ill, and kept the news from her, resolving to struggle it out. She never knew he went without food to pay for medicine. She never knew what it meant to him to call in a certain party who said, though not a doctor, he understood drugs and could cure her. John Strangler knew this certain party understood drugs, for once, when wild with a headache, the certain party had given him sixteen powders, don't you remember, and they had worked wonders. He was down to his last penny, and his wife was very ill when the idea came to him; he went to McTeegue's and asked for a position. McTeegue smiled: "I knew you'd come back; they always do, unless they die."

A thought flashed through John Strangler's mind and made him laugh happily. "Not all, McTeegue," he said—"not all—my little wife Pearl."

McTeegue grinned, then, looking at the boy's white face, replied, "That's so, John, how do you make it out?"

"We manage to live," Strangler jerked out quickly as if to end the talk; "I'll come tonight." When John Strangler went home to his wife, he found fresh drugs on the table and his wife was much better.

That night his fingers danced. He repulsed those who asked about his wife, and did it in such a way as to bring tears to many eyes. One woman said, "I hope she appreciates him." This was one with whom he had been particularly harsh; strange creatures, these women.

At twelve o'clock he noted a strange thing; the door was opened and the dissipated manikin came in, caught sight of him, whispered to some one in the hall and hurried out again. It was after this that he played his best. At closing time he was complimented by McTeegue. "Have a drink?"

"I must go home to my wife Pearl."

"I wouldn't be in a hurry," said McTeegue. But he was, and let them know it by running from the room.

It was snowing and the snow tickled his eyes; it was cold and the cold pinched his ears; but he was happy, was John Strangler, for he had made enough to pay for the drugs and so be even with the manikin. He didn't want him around, and, ungrateful as it might seem, he meant that his wife should cut the manikin dead, when the debt was paid. He bought some violets of a dried-faced old peddler—his wife loved violets. He wanted a bit of coffee, but the flowers were more necessary.

"For your sweetheart?" said the peddler.

"For my sweetheart," said John Strangler, and to himself, "God bless her little heart."

He tip-toed into the room. How carefully he searched for a match, and how thoughtfully he lighted it outside the room, that the noise might not awaken her. The lamp burned in a flickering, half-hearted way. He feared the flickering might wake her. He glanced at the bed; the room was cold. He opened the little door of the stove, the fire was out. He thought of the poor little girl, freezing, and too weak to know it, too sweet to complain. He glanced at the bed, he gathered a few sticks of wood, stuffed them into the stove, lighted a bit of paper at the lamp's flame, and started the blaze. Then, fearful that he had disturbed her he glanced at the bed, and with a pitiful sob, fell on the chair and table, crushing the violets and almost knocking the lamp from its place.

The wood fire crackled and sparkled and snapped, heating the room, and John Strangler's sobs kept time with the snapping of the wood. No one imagines for a moment that the woman was dead; do you have to be told in plainer fashion that she had simply left him? John Strangler did not. He didn't have to touch the bed; he knew she was gone. His heart told him, just as it told him he loved her when her fingers first touched his hair.

He led a lonely life. The days he spent in searching; the nights in playing for the dance of Satan at McTeague's. He grew whiter and thinner, and almost lost the trick of the hall. For one night, in the midst of a wild waltz, he interpolated a weird melody of his own, that put the dancers out of step and irritated them by its suggestiveness. When he was criticised by McTeague he replied in such a way that his notice was inevitable.

In his little hall room that night, a strange thing happened. The melody that he had hidden away came out of its own accord, and droned him to sleep, and he lived over his life in the dream that followed, and even his wife Pearl came back to him and said:

"John, if I had only known what was in your heart, I never would have left you; let me come back to you."

And when he awoke and reached for her hand and felt nothing, but the cold air of his room, and looking for her face, saw nothing but the shivering gray dawn through the chinks of the shutters, he knew it was the end; that some one stronger than he had willed it.

He had given up the search and sat in his room writing; he wrote but one letter, a long one to his wife Pearl. When he had finished, the day had slipped into night, and the night was welcome.

"I have lived," he mused, "I have known love, I have known heartache, I have been a weakling, but I have known these things: I have had two mistresses, one a faithless one, the other despised, degraded, and yet true; shall I spend my last hours with the memory of the first, or—" The hidden melody stole out of its hiding place; it was strange, unearthly, and the strangeness of it brought tears to his eyes, and the unearthliness of it mastered him; with a determined movement, he rose, slipped into his overcoat and went to a little cupboard. Under a number of boxes he found some powders; he counted them—there were four. "I'll leave one," he said, "she might return with a headache." He glanced about the room, closed the door and slipped out into the night.

They missed him at McTeague's. A short-haired, pug-nosed youngster took his place, and did very well, but somehow they missed him—the women did—but you never would have guessed it, for their laughter was louder and more boisterous. Had you but known, this was the surest proof—that they missed him.

John Strangler hurried up town, away from the lights of the cafes into the quiet streets of the sleepy-folk; he thought of the youth of years ago, finding his way about this great city in the dark. Finally, he came to the church. You understand, of course, his object in going there: he wanted to play the organ. It was a very fine organ and he understood it thoroughly. The door, by some chance or other, was open. Taking a last glance of the street, he entered and the door closed and locked him in. The smell of the deserted church got into his brain, and sent strange fancies flitting through it. He felt his way up the winding stairs to the organ loft, his heavy feet at times stumbling against the wooden steps, sending an echo rumbling down the aisles and around the dust gray pillars. He took his seat upon the organ stool, and throwing back his head, downed the three white powders. Then, pressing down upon the great pedals of the organ and pulling out the creaking stops, he gave utterance for the first time to the melody he had hidden from every one, even from his wife Pearl.

No doubt you are asking yourself why I've taken the trouble to write this far. Believe me, one of the reasons is, that it is no trouble at all. Thus far, I've had easy sailing. Now comes the difficult part. How can I make you believe that as Strangler stepped into the church and closed the door between him and the world that had crushed him, his wife Pearl came staggering up the street, beautiful as ever, and yet with a different beauty than was hers in the old days at McTeague's. How can I make plausible the fact that on those very church steps up which a moment before John Strangler had passed, his wife Pearl sank like a vagrant autumn leaf that has lived and died and augments its beauty in the dying? For a moment, she did not stir. Then, with a hard, tense expression in her eyes, she reached into the pocket of her frayed jacket and drew forth three powders. As she lifted the first to her lips, John Strangler struck the first chord of his melody. Startled by the sound, she almost rolled from the steps. Then she listened, charmed; each note was a heartbeat, each heartbeat was a word, and the words were telling her a story, the most wonderful story ever written—the story of a human soul; its aspirations and its sufferings. She knew not why, but her mind reverted to John Strangler; her eyes grew big with wonder; the coldness left them; tears came into them; she let her head drop and sobbed. Suddenly the music stopped with a discord; she listened but heard nothing but a tingling silence. Tossing the powders away from her with loathing, she sprang from the stone steps and with a laugh in her heart, hurried down the street.

Under the dead man's door was found a note:

"If I had only known what was in your heart, I never would have left you—let me come back."

THE AMERICAN GENTLEMAN'S WHISKEY.

"Some like coffee, some like tea," runs the old nursery rhyme; and some connoisseurs in whiskey like bourbon while others like rye. It is all a matter of taste. However, when the manufacturers of Hunter Baltimore Rye sub-titled their product "The American Gentleman's Whiskey" they hit the nail squarely on the head. The American gentleman likes Hunter Rye, and calls for it at his club, for many reasons. One of these is its superb quality, another is its purity and the fact of its thorough aging. Age matures, ripens, enriches and purifies; hence the refined and perfect quality of Hunter whiskey, of which no one has ever quaffed without pronouncing the verdict, "It suits me."

Here is the evolution of sheets of sterling silver from blank whiteness, to Tea Sets, elaborate Trays, imposing Beakers, delicate Vases and Loving Cups. From the "spinning" to the most elaborate chasing Silver objects, plain and ornate, are being produced by craftsmen, with original designers. Here in our very city is a factory producing work that for excellence and beauty in all details ranks as high as the output of any Eastern Silver or Gold workers' manufactory.

The review of the Tolmie pupil recital and other musical notes of the week, crowded out for lack of space, will appear in next week's issue.

THE LUXOR APARTMENTS

San Francisco's Most Luxurious and Home-like Apartment House

The opening of this magnificent structure, situated at 857 Sutter street, between Jones and Leavenworth, marks a great improvement in the popular apartment house of today. It stands six stories with imposing front of stone and pressed brick. It is owned by, and was planned and constructed under the personal supervision of Mrs. Lee, who until recently has so successfully managed the Hotel Granada. Her long experience and knowledge of the needs of guests has been evidenced in making this new building as nearly perfect as a home of its character can be made. The apartments contain five or six rooms, each suite having in addition a large reception hall. The dining-rooms, finished in weathered oak, are spacious, with beam ceilings, and contain glass china closets. The bedrooms are large, having high ceilings prettily tinted. Each apartment has a servant's room, connected with every room in the apartment by electric bells. The bathrooms are luxuriously appointed, having tiled floors and walls. The suites may be rented, furnished or unfurnished, as the management caters only to the highest and best class of patrons. The furnished suites will be models of the furniture dealer's art. The ground floor has been transformed into an elegantly fitted dining-room, adapted to the giving of receptions, parties and dinners by the guests, and a first-class grill will be run. A decided novelty, costing sixteen thousand dollars, consists of an electric system of dumb elevators, one of which passes through each apartment and connects with the grill-room. Through this means, by merely telephoning to the cafe, any order may be filled, and within a few moments transmitted to the desired apartment. A most complete and modern telephone system is being installed, and the building contains upward of twelve hundred electric lights. It is steam heated throughout, and by its peculiar construction there is not a dark room to be found from top story to basement. Every room has light and sun exposure. This is one of the most desirable and attractive features of the house. In each kitchen is a commodious safe so arranged that it is continually exposed to the air. One of the greatest advantages is the wonderful view that may be had of the city of San Francisco and its surroundings from every room in the building. Of the Luxor it can be said that it is truly a home for those who can afford to enjoy the luxuries of well-fitted homes.

WILL MANAGE THE BALTIMORE.

H. C. Shannon, for many years manager of the Langham, New York city's most exclusive family hotel, and for several months in the same capacity at the Moana hotel, the prominent resort of the Hawaiian islands at Honolulu, has been appointed manager of the Hotel Baltimore, in Van Ness avenue. Mr. Shannon's many years of successful experience are a guarantee that the Baltimore will enjoy a reputation second to none in the city.

A Thanksgiving dinner without the cup of cafe noir at its close would scarcely be considered a complete dinner. To insure the coffee's being of good quality, satisfying to every palate, it is well to serve Armer's "Very Best," the most palatable, pure and nutritious coffee known.

The Beautiful Pleasanton

Mr. E. S. de Wolfe has certainly shown his capacity for making the people who are his guests comfortable, as well as happy, in his magnificent hotel. Although he tells me it is not so, one would think after visiting the private dining-rooms, the main dining-room and the rich but tastefully furnished parlor, that the house had been overhauled throughout. Mr. de Wolfe tells me that he has hardly gone beyond the main floor in his work, but that the whole hotel will be attended to in a like apt fashion in the course of a short time. The Pleasanton is fortunate in having the services of one of the finest chefs in California. This, combined with perfect service, and the beautiful china and glass on the tables, should make one as contented at a Thanksgiving dinner as though in one's own home.

—The Rounder.

Piedmont Homes

(Referring to back cover.)

As the accompanying map shows, the Realty Syndicate has, by its Key Route extension, reduced the running time between San Francisco and Piedmont to 35 minutes, bringing the finest residence section of Oakland so close to the city that a business man may now have his home in the sunny Piedmont hills though his office must be in the smoke laden air of San Francisco. For six months past a tremendous change has been wrought in the districts opened to city buyers by the Key Route service. In the Central Piedmont Tract, formerly a wheat field, there are now many beautiful homes fronting streets artistically laid out, commanding a panorama of the bay and ocean, and standing high above the fogs. The Realty Syndicate puts its property in the best condition before placing it on the market. Streets are macadamized, sewer and water mains, artificial stone sidewalks, curbs and gutters constructed, electric lights and gas brought to hand, and shade trees planted on every street. One attractive feature of the Realty Syndicate sales is the presentation of an order on the Syndicate Nurseries for two dollars' worth of nursery stock for every foot of land bought, thus assisting each home builder to beautify his lot. Through the Piedmont Building Association the Realty Syndicate has constructed a number of houses in the Central Piedmont Tract.

THE BUILDING OFFER.

Houses are built to suit purchaser on the initial payment of 20 per cent total cost of house and lot. The balance of total cost, after deducting the first payment of 20 per cent, can be paid in small monthly installments including principal and interest. The interest is deducted from the monthly payment and the balance, after deducting such interest, is applied on the principal; reducing the amount of interest and principal for the following month. Interest ceases immediately on amounts paid on the principal and the purchaser always knows the exact amount he owes. The method is the same employed by all savings banks on building loans. This is the most liberal building offer on the market, as the purchaser can occupy his home before even the cost of the lot has been paid. Taxes are paid by the Piedmont Building Association until a deed is given. During the holiday lull in building operations is an opportune time for investigation and preparation of plans. All inquiries should be addressed to The Realty Syndicate, Real Estate Department, 1212 Broadway, Oakland; Rooms 24-26, 14 Sansome street, San Francisco.

In Financial Circles

During the week under review business has broadened considerably, transactions in stocks showing an increase of over one hundred per cent. Dealings in bonds amounted to $151,000, in shares to 15,103, divided as follows: 2,200 lighting, 184 S. V. W., 861 miscellaneous, 75 banks and 11,783 sugars.

Gas and Electric showed considerable weakness, declining to $53, closing at $53.1-2. Alaska Packers' Association steadily pursued its downward course, closing at $93. Holders are anxiously awaiting the Advisory Committee's report; the protracted delay in the matter naturally indicates the appearance of new obstacles in the way of financial relief. Next in the way of declines came Giant Powder, losing 3 1-2 points, closing at $61.1-2.

The feature of the week's doings was furnished by sugar stocks. As long predicted by me, investors began to wake up to realize the enormous profits plantations are about to yield, and at times it looked as if the excitement of years ago were to be revived. Hawaii Commercial, as before stated, declared monthly

Among the most rare collection of flowers on exhibit in this city is that to be found at Manning's, Post and Stockton streets. Miss Manning has shown great aptness in the flower decorations at many notable occasions and her exquisite taste is often so apparent that the remark, "The flowers were furnished by Miss Manning," is frequently heard.

dividends of 50 cents. Makaweli will pay 20 cents on December twentieth, and Paauhau is reported to join the dividend payers some time in December. Hawaii Commercial closes at $74.1-2; Makaweli, $32.1-4; Honokaa, $17.1-2; Paauhau, $19.1-4; Hutchinson, $15.3-4. Raw sugar is now selling at 45-8 with an upward tendency. I am trying to get estimates of the prospective earnings of the various companies for 1905, which I may be able to communicate to you very soon.

—The Financier.

Recent purchasers of Pope-Toledo touring cars are Truxtun Beale and Col. R. A. Eddy. Mr. Beale will use his car on his ranch near Bakerfield. The Pope Motor Car Company was awarded the grand prize at the St. Louis Exposition, which is a very flattering testimonial, as grand prizes were only awarded to three American manufacturers. The photographs have been received by the Pope Toledo Touring Car Company of the entire line of Pope-Toledos for the season 1905. The cars are principally of the side entrance type and the prices are as follows: 20 h. p. four-cylinder, $2,950; 24 h. p. (Vanderbilt race type), $3,650; 40 h. p., $6,150; 50 h. p., $7,650; 60 h. p., with Pullman body, $10,000. All Toledo cars very much over-run their rated h. p., as in the case of the 24 rated h. p. These motors develop from 32 to 34 h. p.

Musical

The Playing of Jacobi

Milton Jacobi is a pianist who has the gift of pleasing. There is such an ease and absence of effort in his playing that he seems to be making up his music as he goes along. His attitude at the piano is natural and easy, he does not hump his back over, nor claw the keyboard, nor indulge in any of those facial contortions which are so farcical. His touch is beautiful, resulting in a clear singing tone, produced without abusing the pedal. The idea of anything labored never intrudes itself, and technique is the last thing you think of in listening to him, unless perhaps in the Rheinberger Capriccio written for the left hand alone, or in the Schubert-Liszt "Erlkonig." For the most part his playing, at his recital in Steinway hall on Tuesday evening of this week, was characterized by a beauty of sentiment and interpretation rather than by force and bravura. The most pleasing numbers on a very charming program were the Schubert Impromptu in G major, the Liebling Valse de Concert, the three Dvorak Humoresques, the two Rubinstein numbers, and Albert Elkus's Lady of Shalott. It is not often that a youthful student shows the individuality of Milton Jacobi.

Music lovers are manifesting great interest in the concert to be given by Miss Laura Kinze von Kisielnicka, the contralto from Dresden, at Steinway hall, next Tuesday evening, November twenty-second. Much has been heard of Miss von Kisielnicka, who comes from one of the most distinguished families in Germany, and Eastern and European critics speak in the highest terms of her voice, which is one of unusual power, range and tone. She has studied under the most eminent Italian masters and her production, interpretation, phrasing and enunciation have been pronounced to be as near perfection as possible. She will sing numbers by Mozart, Schumann, Brahms, Giordani, Draeseke, Hindach, Wagner, Wolf, Massenet, Schubert and Chaminade, and she will also be heard in the Saint-Saens aria from "Samson and Delila." Miss von Kisielnicka will be assisted by Mrs. Alice Bacon Washington and Miss Hulda Anderson, pianists, and Mr. Hother Wismer, violinist. Seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay and Co.'s Monday and Tuesday.

At Mrs. Marriner-Campbell's musicale in honor of Miss Alexia Bassian the following program was rendered: Songs by Mr. Walter Campbell—Life, Blumenthal, The Earl of Morey, Old Scotch; piano solo, Bolero, Chopin, Miss Eula Howard; by Miss Bassian—Les Heures, song cycle, Augusta Holmes, Good Bye, Tosti, A Lament, Lambert, Il Bacio, Arditi; by Mrs. Klippel Schaffter—Die Post, Schubert, Romeo's Ladder, Chadwick; by Mrs. Greenleaf-Kruger—Synnove's Song, Kjerulf, My true love hath my heart, Randegger, In the Woods (by request), MacDowell; by Mrs. Marian F. B. Robinson—The Ballad of the Trees, Chadwick, Blow, Blow thou Winter Winds, It was a lover and his lass, Gerard Barton; songs by Mr. Campbell—The King and the Miller, Old English, My little love, Hawley. Miss Julia Tharp accompanied the singers.

"Double Harness," Anthony Hope's latest novel, which has been appearing serially in one of the magazines, will begin in the Sunday Call Magazine tomorrow. This is one of the finest fiction features that the Sunday Call has ever given, as Mr. Hope occupies the highest place among English or American novelists. The first prize story in the fiction contest, "At the Fountain of Trevi," written by Cora Cressy Crow, will appear; a series of quaint homilies by Opie Read under the general caption, "Jottings of Old Lim Jucklin," begins, the first being entitled "On Hell." "On and Off the Bread Wagon," by Charles Dryden, continues; there are several novel Thanksgiving features; Madge Moore has a page on "The Girl Who Flirts," and there is the usual book page and the puzzle page.

A Woman's Way

It was a case of George and Charlie. George was good and earnest and true. Charlie was bad and frivolous and vain.

The first named had striven for Aramantha's heart, body and soul. Now she was telling George about it, was Aramantha.

"Oh, George, it's just too awful, I can tell you," was her final verdict, after summing up Charlie's harsh treatment of her injured self. "To love and be spurned is worse than never to have loved at all, at all!"

"Sure," returned George. "It's a brutal shame, now, that Charlie should have been so cussed mean."

Then he drew her near him with words not exactly original with George, "Come rest in this bosom, my own stricken deer."

Aramantha took the hint and rested. The next breath, however, found her again in a spasm of tears.

This was more than George—poor, tender-hearted George—could bear. He rang for a cocktail.

"Don't cry so, Aramantha, dear," he said. "See, have you not got me? Turn your back upon that fool wretch Charlie. Send back his letters. Remember him no more forever."

And Aramantha, glancing up at her benefactor, proceeded immediately to dry her eyes, and do as Aramantas from time immemorial have done before her—she went back to Charlie.

Walter Morris left for Goldfield in the four-cylinder Columbia a week ago Monday. The trip began from Stockton Tuesday morning. Sacramento was reached in good time, although many bad bridges had to be crossed, which resulted in a broken spring. Auburn was reached Wednesday, after a lot of hill climbing. Morris wrote from Auburn: "Ocean Wave" (the name of the big machine) is doing very well and takes the grades in good shape. I think by steady going we will reach Summit by tomorrow evening and Reno the following day." The next day (Thursday) a letter from Summit was received here, saying: "We arrived here on top after a day of climbing and working our way through many places that were what I call fierce. We finished the last fifteen miles in the dark. It was pretty bad going and many times Arthur had to go ahead to figure out the road." Reno was reached the next day, some bad roads being encountered. Up to this point however, was the hardest part of the journey, especially up to Summit. The Columbia machine is owned by L. L. Patriek of Goldfield and will immediately be put into service between the two mining towns to carry passengers.

One of the recent sales of a four-passenger Autocar by the West Coast Motor Car Company was to E. J. McCutchen, the attorney. The excellent qualities of the car were demonstrated to him on a run to San Jose after which he decided autoing the "real thing." Accompanied by his wife and Mead Hamilton, Mr. McCutchen ran the auto to San Jose last Sunday.

Miss Mabel Dodge went to the intercollegiate football game last Saturday in her Autocar, which has seen better days but nevertheless is running in fine shape.

Dr. J. Henry Barbat has again decided to adopt the automobile to convey him on his daily rounds, claiming to have found a good, reliable machine in his Autocar runabout. Dr. Palmer can be seen daily going on his rounds in the Autocar.

Byron Jackson, first treasurer of the Automobile Club of California, enjoyed a short run last Sunday in his light touring Columbia. On every trip he is accompanied by Master Byron, his eleven year old son, who is almost as expert as his father in operating the speedy car.

William M. Saben of the University of California went on a four days' trip last week in his Autocar runabout and had a most enjoyable time. He toured all about San Jose and ran to Santa Cruz and into the mountains, the little machine taking the steep grades without any trouble. No mishaps occurred.

W. W. Van Arsdale, accompanied by his sister and a friend, drove his Autocar to the park last week to take the examination for a privilege to operate his auto. Examiner Saville, after a half-hour's ride with Mr. Van Arsdale, was satisfied that the well known sportsman had fully mastered the running of his horseless carriage.

E. P. Brinegar, of the Pioneer Automobile Company, left last Tuesday for an extended trip through the East. He will visit the factories represented by the Pioneer Company on this coast. He went direct to St. Louis, there to join a special Oldsmobile train which carried to Detroit all the Oldsmobile representatives who rendezvoused at St. Louis on November fourteenth. The entire party are the guests of the Oldsmobile Company.

Mrs. Frank Baker Zahm, Mrs. I. Edward Palmer and Mrs. E. P. Brinegar were seen driving through the park in Mrs. Brinegar's new Winton touring car on Sunday.

W. F. Hunt and family made a trip to San Jose and return on Sunday last in Mr. Hunt's Oldsmobile light tonneau touring car.

The Pioneer Automobile Company is in receipt of photographs of the new nineteen hundred and fifty dollar four-cylinder Winton touring car. The Pioneer people are very much elated over this machine and think it will be the winner for the season of 1905.

Automobile owners and dealers all over the country are greatly interested in the contest being held by Motoring and Boating, to determine the most popular automobile in America today. The selection will be made by the public jury of purchasers and riders in cars. The White still heads the list, and the following is one of the latest ballots for this make of automobile: "I should think that of automobiles the White steamer is the most popular car in America, owing to its smooth and silent running and its reliability and flexibility of power, which make it a first-class climber. It is less subject to mechanical accidents than

This photograph, which was taken in a hail of bullets, during the battle of Wheeling (Military Manoeuvres), shows the 9-12 horse-power Cadillac car driven by Lt. P. W. Northey, beside whom is seated the Danish attache, Capt. Alex. de Kauffmann, A. D. C. to King of Denmark. In the tonneau are Major J. H. V. Crowe, R. A. gasoline cars, and more simple to operate. It is more popular than others of the same class because of its automatic arrangements. It gives a working pressure in less time than others, owing to its flash system of generating steam. Its boiler cannot be damaged by getting dry. It is commendable for its absence of water gauge and level, its absence of incrustation or sediments in boiler owing to rapidity of circulation; its economy in steam owing to the use of compound engine; its economy of water owing to the use of a condenser is remarkable, as well as the absence of noise of exhaust. The fire is not impaired by strong wind, which on the contrary is made to assist the draft. Its popularity is also due to the fact that it has always showed to advantage in endurance runs."

Wiley B. Allen, the well known Pacific Coast piano man and automobile enthusiast, has just returned from the St. Louis Fair. After spending four or five days looking over the different automobiles he decided the Rambler side entrance touring car was what he wanted for 1905. On reaching San Francisco Mr. Allen immediately placed his order with the Rambler Automobile Agency at No. 1331 Market street, for the car of his choice, and can now be seen daily driving about town in his Rambler surrey, type No. 1, which was delivered to him last Monday. Mr. Allen is much pleased with his new car. His 1904 car was a Rambler Model K, which he drove upwards of four thousand miles, including several mountain trips, which were made very successfully.

The Tribune of Ashland, Oregon, in a recent issue contains the following interesting item: "Ed. McKinney and Charles Snow, who returned from Klamath Falls a week ago, are pioneers with autos in Klamath county. Messrs. McKinney and Snow went to Klamath Falls from Ashland to act as carriers to and from the fair grounds. They certainly earned what money they made, when one considers the sixty-five mile trip, over roads almost impassable from rain, rocks, and with a grade in one place of 2,500 feet within three miles. They assisted on their return trip in extricating some freighters who had got stuck in the mud, but their machines went up grades, over rocks and through mud on both trips without an accident, barring a punctured tire. Their autos are six h. p. White stanhopes, thirteen hundred pounds in weight, and the first machines ever seen in Klamath county."

The beautiful new 1905 White steam touring car is still attracting no end of attention whenever the auto is seen gliding over the usually rough city streets. The White has been demonstrating its wonderful hill climbing capabilities by going over the California street hills from Kearny to Powell streets without the slightest trouble.

The Pasmore Pupil Recital

Mr. H. B. Pasmore gave the second pupils' recital of the season at Lyric hall on Thursday evening of last week, introducing eleven pupils in solo and some forty in the choral works. In the first recital there were eleven soloists and two quartets, making twenty-two soloists presented thus far this year, all of whom have been more or less successful. In a short and appropriate little talk to his audience, which by the bye was a fine and appreciative gathering, Mr. Pasmore explained that the reason for this success lies in his practice of working always for Voice; that he answered the oft repeated criticism that his pupils lacked dramatic fire by explaining that dramatic expression is the last step in voice culture, and that many teachers fail in their aim by making it the first; the voice is the product of the mind and the vocal organ as much a mental development as physical; that the voice is the singer. If this were not so, a man (or woman) of seventy-five would sing better than ever before, for he is then a more fully developed artist than at any earlier period, but the voice being gone, he can no longer sing. It was interesting to note the way in which the singers illustrated the soundness of this theory, for Mr. Pasmore presented pupils in various stages of development. Miss Wilson, Miss Zucker, Mr. Lawrence, Miss Tolmil, Miss Wolfskill, all with voices of great promise, sang with the sweetness of voice and expression that is natural to the earlier development. Miss Obermuller, Mr. Lacey and Mrs. Larsen showed that they had reached the period when dramatic expression could be safely indulged. Miss Smith and Miss Benedict were really dramatic, though still within bounds, while Mrs. Basford both in the quartet and in her solo numbers, gave expression to great dramatic power. This was particularly true of Saint Saens' "Bell Song," with its tremendous climax followed by the pianissimo ending, which, because of its exceeding difficulty, is usually shouted fortissimo. Few in the audience really appreciated how splendidly Mrs. Basford sang this song, nor did they seem to realize that she sang, during the evening, from E flat (the third space in the bass clef) to the high C of the soprano voice. The audience was very demonstrative over Miss Smith, Miss Wolfskill, Miss Obermuller and Mr. Lacey. Mr.

The San Francisco Conservatory of Music

European and Eastern musical authorities who have from time to time paid San Francisco a visit have always commented upon the excellence of the facilities offered to music students. "Why bother about sending your children abroad," they ask, "when right here in your own city you have admirable teachers, who can lay the ground-work so well?" They say that it is all very well to send the students abroad after they have acquired a certain amount of knowledge, for it is true enough that we have no "musical atmosphere" here as yet. We are too young a city for such an atmosphere to have had time to form. It will come later, no doubt. But in the meantime, there are teachers, born musicians, in our midst, who are doing a remarkable work in developing the love of art and music, and imparting knowledge to the students under their care. One of the most successful institutions for students to acquire the love of music, because of the comprehensiveness and thoroughness of its teachings, is the San Francisco Conservatory of Music, at the corner of Eddy and Jones streets. The San Francisco Conservatory of Music has been established for nearly twenty years. Professor E. S. Bonelli, the owner and director, has, with his musical and business ability, made the institution not only lucrative but also a power in the musical world of the Coast. His one aim and ambition has been to turn out able and efficient teachers from his Conservatory; and judging from the number of teachers here who owe their musical and financial success to him, he has certainly accomplished the result so dear to his heart.

The Conservatory is fully equipped, the faculty consisting of fourteen teachers, each teacher having been selected more as to his efficiency as an instructor than as a mere executant. And, although both pupils as well as teachers are under thorough discipline, the director, Professor Bonelli, is beloved by all who have worked with or studied under him. About fourteen years ago the Professor thought of removing his Conservatory to New York, but a pressing petition was gotten up by his pupils, to beg him to remain here, and he decided to listen to their pleadings, and stay in San Francisco. A copy of the petition hangs in the reception room of the Conservatory, and is one of the director's most prized possessions. Professor Bonelli believes that both teacher and pupil owe each other strict punctuality at lessons, a mutual interest in their work, and a mutual agreement to do well the work given them to accomplish. Every student, whether of remarkable talent or merely mediocre ability, is accorded the same degree of attention. There is no favoritism shown. The pupils are inspired to do the best they are capable of, by the desire not only to please the director, but because they have been taught to take an interest in their music itself. Three times a year students' concerts are given at the Alhambra theatre, and the public is invited to attend and note the progress the students have made in their studies. These public affairs give the pupils confidence to appear before an audience, on a public stage, and also serve as a sample of the work accomplished at the Conservatory. These concerts are far more interesting than the average pupil recital, mainly because of the variety in the work shown, the range of instruments and composers, and the fact that the pupils are of all ages, from the smallest child to the adult student. On the thirtieth of November, the next of these interesting affairs will be given at the Alhambra, and those favored with invitations are looking forward to the concert with pleasure.

Some very great artists have endorsed Professor Bonelli's work. The New York Musical Courier of date September tenth, 1888, said: "Dr. Louis Maas (the well known pianist) speaks highly of Bonelli's method and success as a teacher." Madame Camilla Urso, the much lamented violinist, also spoke very highly of his method and teachings, in an interview reported in the Evening Post, in which paper Eugen d'Albert also expressed his praise of the work of Bonelli. Of one of the pupil recitals an Examiner critic wrote: "The piano performances at Professor Bonelli's concert were revelations. The pupils have a wonderful technique and play with a spirit, freedom and expression remarkable for their years. Even a little tot played a difficult selection as though it were the easiest and most natural thing to do." And a Chronicle critic said: "Mr. Bonelli's pupils demonstrated beyond a doubt what a thorough course of systematic training can accomplish. Their technique is something remarkable and they play with clearness and expression rarely heard." It is of interest to reproduce here an extract from a letter from Berlin, that appeared in Town Talk for March third, four years ago: "Among the musical events in Berlin this season, there is particularly one which will prove of extreme interest to San Francisco music patrons—the concerts of Miss Maud Durrant, which will take place some time this fall. Ever since her arrival in Germany's capital, the young musician has met with remarkable success. At the time she entered the Royal High School of Music she was compelled to pass a difficult examination together with thirty-five other applicants. Out of these thirty-five, but twelve were admitted; and Miss Durrant had the honor of receiving not only the highest percentage, but was personally congratulated by the examining professor who, in terms of flattering character, complimented her upon her execution and method. In fact her technic evoked the applause of the audience assembled on the occasion. The professor asked Miss Durrant further the name of her instructor and when the fortunate young student said it was E. S. Bonelli of San Francisco, a gleam of recognition appeared in his eyes and he said: 'Ah, to be sure, we had some of his pupils here before and Professor Bonelli's students are the best American students who are in the Royal High School.' In speaking of other pupils of Professor Bonelli, reference was had to Miss Carrie Bowes and Harry Tichau, both of whom were very successful in Berlin. This unsolicited compliment was extremely valuable to Professor Bonelli, as the professors of the Royal High School are loth to acknowledge the ability of American teachers.

A glimpse at Professor Bonelli's studio is interesting, as affording an insight into his tastes and the personality of the director of a successful conservatory of music. A beautiful Everett grand piano is the main attraction to the musical visitor, and the Professor speaks of his instrument in highest praise. The studio is a commodious room, furnished artistically, with a few good pictures and portraits of pupils on the walls. The Professor is a modest man, and it is difficult to get him to talk about himself. He would rather talk about his pupils, and his work. He is of Italian parentage, and was born in St. Tomas, W. I., in 1853. When a mere lad, he showed considerable musical talent, and his parents sent him to Hamburg, Leipsic and Berlin. Later, when he was ready for a public career, he entered the concert field, but ill health compelled him to abandon concertizing and to accept the harder part of an instructor. Though he may have lost his chance of fame as a soloist by this step one cannot wholly regret it, for had Professor Bonelli stayed in the concert field San Francisco would not have had his Conservatory of Music. Mrs. Bonelli is the clever and enthusiastic assistant of her husband in all his undertakings. She is a charming, gracious woman, with musical talent of no mean order. It is Mrs. Bonelli who directs the admirable mandolin orchestra, which is one of the features of the institution. The orchestra studies the music of both popular and classical composers, and is particularly commendable for its perfect tempo, and the fine expression and spirit with which its selections are rendered.

When the Conservatory gives its pupil concerts these are made the occasions to bestow prizes upon the students who have received the highest percentages in theory and harmony, through a series of examinations, oral and written, previous to the concert. The recipients of these prizes naturally feel highly honored, for the rewards mean that good, solid work has been done by the pupils fortunate enough to receive them. There is nothing slipshod or careless in the Conservatory method. Everything is thorough. While many teachers aim merely at brilliancy and show in their pupils' performances, Professor Bonelli discourages anything that has not for its foundation genuine knowledge and steady application.

The several moves of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music have always been made with the object in view of the greater convenience and comfort of the students. The present quarters, at Eddy and Jones streets, are ideal for their purpose. The building was remodeled to suit Professor Bonelli's ideas of what a Conservatory of Music should be. Bay windows were added so as to admit the sunlight freely, and at the windows imported Italian shades, of transparent material, give the building at night a most picturesque appearance, when the light shines through the shades. Ten rooms of the Conservatory are devoted to teaching purposes; then there are the office and the reception rooms. Refinement and luxury are everywhere observable in the appointments.

Ten pianos are in constant use at the Conservatory, four claviars and four technicians. There is melody all day long, even up to ten o'clock at night, for the stringed instruments are kept busy until very late hours. The violin orchestra meets on Thursday evenings. This orchestra is composed of both sexes, including some of the best young amateurs in the city. The Mandolin Club, whose work has been so favorably commented upon by the local critics, meets on Monday nights.

It may well be seen that when San Francisco possesses such a comprehensive institution of music in its midst, it is unnecessary to send ambitious students abroad, at least until they are sufficiently grounded in their work to appreciate the musical atmosphere prevailing in the continental cities. Having himself been educated abroad, Professor Bonelli naturally impresses upon his pupils the benefits that will accrue from finishing studies under European masters. But everybody does not expect to go abroad. Everybody's talent does not lead to such a step. The study of music does not necessarily mean a public career. There is just as good work to be done at home as a teacher. Or, if one does not intend to teach, the study of music is necessary if one would learn to understand and appreciate the works of the great composers, interpreted by artists in their concert tours to San Francisco. Only by a knowledge of music can one comprehend its beauties. General culture is not complete unless one is on speaking terms with at least the rudiments of music.

Such a work of culture is carried on by the teacher of music. He may not be able to do more than encourage and instruct talent, but he thus gives an insight into the great world of beautiful music. The students at the San Francisco Conservatory are taught how to analyze the compositions given them to study and practice, and they thereby understand what they are playing. There is nothing mechanical about their playing. They phrase with expression because the beauties of the composition have been revealed to them. This is why the critics of the daily and weekly papers attend and commend the pupil recitals given by the Conservatory. They are really worth while, for they show what a faithful, conscientious, cultured director may do in this line when he puts his whole heart and soul in his work.

A glance at some of the programs given at the pupil recitals of the Conservatory will serve to show the scope of the institution's work. Among the composers whose works are represented are Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Chopin, Paderewski, Kuhlau, Lange, Gregh, Grieg, Litolff, Brahms and others. —The Music Critic.

The Brilliant Miss Brandt

Enid Brandt is now a slim, undeveloped girl of twelve. Her playing, however, is neither slim nor undeveloped, but would more properly befit one of the giants of the piano. Her first number was the Saint-Saens Concerto in G minor, Mrs. Brandt at the second piano. To say that Miss Enid's rendition of this number was heroic is not a misuse of the word. Notwithstanding the success she achieved, I question whether a child of her years and frame has any right to play such a piece. The demands upon the physical side are too great. Such things should be left for the fully grown. The Haydn "Theme and Variations" was a sufficiently difficult number to display Enid's wonderful technique, including that trill with the third and little finger. In the Romantic group her playing showed signs of fatigue. Her own little composition, "Theme and Variations," was pleasing, with good musical subject matter. The Liszt Polonaise in E major closed the program. Little Enid Brandt is worthy of all the encomiums that have been showered upon her. Her mastery of technique is little short of the miraculous. The audience at her recital was a representative one, comprising not alone the usual contingent of music lovers but also a large force from the world of fashion and society.

The Kopta Concert

One of the biggest things ever played here at a chamber concert was the piano trio of Tchaikowsky done by the Koptas last Sunday. Mr. Kopta was the violinist, Mr. Lada 'cellist and Mrs. Mansfeldt pianist. This work, dedicated to the memory of Rubinstein, was played here for the first time. It is in two parts, the first elegiac in sentiment, the second a theme with variations. It is taken through twelve treatments, illustrating many moods, but returning to the elegiac, leading into a funeral march. It is a painting on a large canvas, and all the Tschai-kowsky palette goes to its coloring. It arouses and holds the interest throughout and is full of harmonic and melodic surprises. The number was splendidly handled by the artists. Mrs. Mansfeldt at the piano had an especially difficult role, in which, however, she achieved a signal success. The other numbers were the Beethoven string quartet Op. 18, No. 2, the andante from Mendelssohn's Op. 44, No. 2, and two Dvorak waltzes. The last were full of piquant rhythm and shading and won the favor of the audience, who demanded an encore. The next concert is set for December eleventh, when a piano quintet by Arensky, one of the younger Russian composers, will be performed for the first time.

Minetti's Concert

Mr. Giulio Minetti and his orchestra scored a triumph for their first concert of the season. Mr. Minetti is showing his ability as a conductor, and his players evince every result of docility, attention and careful rehearsal. The heavy piece of last Friday evening's concert was Bazzini's Symphonic Poem, "Saul." It was magnificently given and deserved all the applause it received. The Massenet number for strings, "Le Dernier Sommeil de la Vierge," was played with feeling and suavity. The Minetti organization is strong in the matter of strings, and this number was well selected to show purity of tone and accuracy of bowing. I do not think the arrangement of the Vieuxtemps "Ballade et Polonaise" a happy one. It was played by four unison violins with orchestral accompaniment and one missed the verve and individuality which a solo player can put into it. The soloists were the Misses Freeman, Muller, Johnson, and Wright. The concert began with Auber's "Masaniello Overture" and ended with a suite from Bizet's "Carmen." Bravo, Minetti!

The Mansfeldt Club Concert

The second piano recital of the Mansfeldt Club will be held on Friday evening, November twenty-fifth, in Steinway hall. The program will be: Berceuse, op. 22, Serenade Espagnole, op. 26, Valse-Caprice, op. 24, Zaremski, Miss Ethel Duke; Liebestraut, op. 3, Brahms, Tanz-Arabske, op. 3, S. Liebling, Chant Polonais, No. 5, Chopin-Liszt, Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 7, Liszt, Miss Helen Stocking; Rosamond and Cleopatra from suite "Dream of Fair Women," Lady of Shalott, Bagatelle, Albert I. Elkus, Miss Joan Baldwin; Vogel als Prophet, Schumann, Prelude, op. 27, No. 3, Liadow, Rhapsody, No. 12, Liszt, Miss Fernanda Pratt. The Mansfeldt Club is composed of some of the advanced pupils of Hugo Mansfeldt, who have devoted themselves to the study of the methods and creations of the masters of pianoforte composition. Its semi-monthly private sessions have been so productive of enjoyment and so stimulative of understanding and appreciation of the great composers and their works, that the club has determined so to enlarge its scope as to reach others with whom its members have a distinct community of interest, hoping that they may find in these projected concerts such enjoyment as will make the association mutually pleasurable. Associate membership is open to any student or lover of music.

H. B. Pasmore, who has composed a musical rendering of the most popular yells of the Universities of California and Stanford, is the idol of the students at Berkeley. His composition, entitled "The Contest of the Yells," was played in Golden Gate Park on Sunday, and received with great applause. It was Mr. Pasmore who wrote the football song, "Hearts of Oak."

Another of Marchesi's Pupils

Alexia Bassian returned home some days ago after a long absence abroad where she was a pupil of Marchesi. She is now on the concert stage, and she left the other day for Australia where she is said to have a long engagement. Unfortunately she made no public appearance in this city to give her friends an opportunity to ascertain whether Marchesi had greatly improved the voice that was once heard in grand opera in this city. However she invited the criticism of her native town, Fresno, where she appeared at the Barton Opera House. The evening before her departure for Australia she sang at an "at home" given by Mrs. Marriner Campbell. In parlor singing she made a very pleasing impression. I regret that Miss Bassian did not give one of the local managers an opportunity to exploit her for she came home well supplied with British press notices. — The Music Critic

Thanksgiving in San Francisco

Der Rathskeller, Hotel St. Francis.

Cafe, Hotel St. Francis.

Although Thanksgiving be of New England origin, yet this day of good cheer, this apotheosis of that great American bird, the turkey, will be observed more devotedly in San Francisco than in any other city of America. The lavish game market around us and the opulent store of fruits that California's perennial summer produces will bless the tables of such as are fortunate enough to be living in the reigning city of the Pacific shores.

On Thanksgiving day the cosmopolitanism of San Francisco will impress itself ineffaceably upon the stranger within our gates. Every school of gastronomy is represented among the local chefs. The brigand from Bulgaria and the diplomat from Seville may each have his favorite dish made to his liking by one who understands its mysteries.

Thanksgiving will be a great day at the Hotel St. Francis. Such are the preparations in the commissary department of this big institution that whosoever dines at the St. Francis on Thanksgiving day may well feel that he is being treated as a distinguished guest. As the first Thanksgiving day in the history of the hotel, the management is going to make it an event. Victor Hirtzler, the chef, well known to every epicure who has visited Strassburg, Germany, in the past; Gaston Renon, the famous pastry chef formerly with the Ritz Hotels in London and Paris; and James C. Lieb, maitre d'hotel, late of the Waldorf-Astoria, New York, will unite their forces to make a gala day for the gourmet.

A fact which isn't as well known as it should be is that the charges at the hotel St. Francis are the most moderate in town. One can lunch in the unique Rathskeller, and dine or take supper after the theatre in the Cafe, at as little expense as he would have to bear at any good restaurant, though the surroundings and perfect service would lead one to expect a high charge.

Der Rathskeller was the whole thing with the Stanford boys who made their headquarters at the St. Francis for the football game. Filled with the crowd of college men, this quaint Dutch room, with its array of steins and antlers, assumed a very jolly atmosphere.

The Cafe of the St. Francis is becoming an important institution socially. At the afternoon tea, which is served daily from four to six, one may meet there so many of the smart set that this room seems destined to be to San Francisco what the terrace of the House of Commons is to London. The Cafe is a beautiful hall whose decoration was inspired by the Cluny Museum of Paris.

The visit of Prince Fushimi was the occasion for a gorgeous display of flowers and Japanese decoration throughout the hotel. Massive vases and beautiful screens combined with the exquisite floral effect made one of those artistic transformations for which the Japanese are justly famed. Prince Fushimi and his suite will stop at the Hotel St. Francis for a few days on their way back to the Orient and many preparations are being made to entertain the noble visitor in a truly representative San Franciscan way.

Letters

Comrades In Arms

There are two surprising circumstances in connection with the authorship of General Charles King—the number of stories he finds time to write, and the uniform quality of his work, which, if it never soars to great heights, also avoids dropping to great depths. This is the more notable since General King confines himself within comparatively narrow limits. His tales are almost always “garrison tangles” involving the soldiers of some military post and a limited number of outsiders. There is always a series of mysterious happenings and more or less misdirected suspicion, and always enough of interest and uncertainty in the denouement to keep the reader alive and alert to the very end. “Comrades in Arms” is the latest volume by the soldier-author. The first half of the action takes place at Fort Minneconjou, where the hero, Lieutenant “Pat” Langham, recently transferred from the East, where his engagements have been of the parlor and ball-room variety, is set down at a Western post amongst men who have been meeting the Indians on their own ground and on their own terms. Langham, it must be confessed, is considerable of a dude in comparison with his new comrades in arms. To begin with, he is the only son of a fond and foolish English mother, who will persist in addressing all her letters to “Mr. William Pitt Berkeley Langham.” Having practically unlimited means, the young man is able to indulge in such luxuries as uniforms made to order by fashionable New York tailors, solid gold collar ornamentations, a full and complete outfit of citizen's toggery, which he wears whenever military rule and etiquette do not insist on the uniform, and in addition, a private stable of thoroughbreds, and a man servant. When we are introduced to this somewhat resplendent creation, he is far from being a favorite with his comrades, and one cannot altogether blame them for looking somewhat askance at the gentleman, more especially as it is being whispered about that despite his elegance of attire, a large portion of his correspondence is in the nature of dunning letters from trusting creditors. As a matter of fact, Langham is a good fellow, in the army for love of the military profession, and transferred to the West at his own request. His financial embarrassment is caused not by undue extravagance on his part, but by the mortal illness of his mother, whose affairs are in the hands of a rascally agent whose sanctimonious exterior has been the means of elevating him to positions of trust where he had practically no surveillance in his villainies. The big man of the community outside Fort Minneconjou was Amos Bullard, mine owner, banker, etc., and also elderly husband of a beautiful and brilliant young wife. Between Lieutenant Langham and Mrs. Bullard there had sprung up a warm friendship, misconstrued on all sides. There had also been some sharp words between Langham and Lieutenant Crabbe, with a hint of a later meeting in which matters would be settled between them. Langham had also had occasion to reprimand his man, Fox, for some misconduct, on the same day, and there were preliminary signs of an Indian outbreak, so that when Langham was mysteriously shot when returning to the fort after an evening's leave of absence, and Crabbe was unexpectedly missing from the ball-room and Fox disappeared from the vicinity, it was an open question whether the Indians, the servant or the fellow soldier was the guilty one, for there was circumstantial evidence pointing strongly in all directions. Lieutenant Gridley, who is as much the hero of the novel as Langham, is one who untangles the knot, but it would be unfair to both General King and his readers to tell how it is accomplished. Meanwhile, Langham's mother died while he was still incapacitated from his wound, and her affairs were found to be in such a tangled condition that he was obliged to resign from the army and devote himself to business, but quite naturally, attached himself to the National Guard in New York, where he soon drilled his men to a state of perfection. Then came the war with Spain, and a chance to see real service in the Philippines, where the old regiment had been ordered, so there is a reunion of friends and a chance to show the metal of the good soldier. Gridley, the silent, whose history previous to his enlisting in the army, has been locked in his own breast, proves to have had a romantic youth and a great sorrow which links him with the Bullards, and woven in and about the other affairs of Langham is his more or less interrupted courtship of Kitty Belden, “the daughter of the regiment.” All the mysteries are cleared up in the end and there are several happy marriages after the cruel war is over. “What Happened in the East” is by no means all love-making, for there are some stirring accounts of the Filipinos, their treachery and the necessity for drastic measures in dealing with them, as well as some scathing comments on the policy of the yellow journals in raising a cry over the methods of conducting the campaign against the insurrectos. "Just as in the days of the Indian wars the good folk farthest removed from the scene were the loudest in their denunciation of the troops on the spot. To these latter it was death if they lost, and defamation if they won. The men who put an end to the most savage and intractable side of the insurrection were summoned in turn to take their punishment." So, too, in speaking of the Indians and their outbreaks, General King does not spare the whites who incited them to acts which would necessitate some recognition by the military authorities, and then, themselves committing depredations which could be attributed to the savages, nor does he spare the gossips and tattlers of either sex nor infractions of military etiquette on the part of soldier or civilian. He is equally successful in his portraiture of fair women and brave men. Published by the Hobart company.

Take a Rest

A great many San Francisco people are planning to spend days and weeks during the Fall and Winter at Hotel Del Monte. No other resort in California offers such a combination of attractions—sea bathing, golf, automobiling, bowling, tennis, fishing, and all out-of-door sports. Instead of going from place to place seeking comforts, the wise ones of society spend their time at Del Monte by the sea. Address GEO. P. SNELL, Manager, Del Monte, California.

TOWN TALK

Criticism of Jack London

"Probability has no place in a certain sort of modern fiction," so says the literary editor of Munsey's, and goes on to illustrate his text thus: "No such man as the hero of Jack London's 'Sea Wolf' ever existed or could exist upon the earth, and most of the incidents that adorn this strenuous tale belong strictly to the cycle of genii. Its cheerful ignorance of sea life and sea scenery would once have started a shriek of dismay; but nowadays we no longer notice such strainings upon credulity, having long fared upon worse in the pleasing words of the wild-eyed school of fictional art." As to ignorance of sea life and sea scenery, what Jack London doesn't know on that subject he will not learn from the literary editor of Munsey's. The jolt reminds me of the one aimed by one Rose-Soley against Frank Norris's "Moran," and when Mr. Norris got through enlightening that too clever critic it is safe to say he knew a few things more than he did when he so lightly took up his pen to poke holes in a subject he knew nothing about. Wolf Larsen assuredly is an unusual character, improbable, perhaps, but not impossible — not more so than the captain whom F. Marion Crawford casually mentions as making his apprentices construe Homer in their off hours, but it makes not a half pennyworth of difference whether a character is improbable or impossible or both, provided the author can make us believe in the probability and possibility while we read. It is easy enough to reason ourselves into cold-blooded incredulity of anything after the excitement is over. Besides, where is the use in weaving romances about the obvious and commonplace? The butcher and the grocer are worthy people, no doubt, but we see them in the flesh every day and we have a tolerably correct idea of how they live and what they wear, and what they think about things in general. As to the "cycle of genii," it is true that ocean-bound steamships and bay ferry boats do not collide every day, but that is an accident which has happened more than once in our bay. There is nothing new or exceptional about shanghaiing sailors or landmen, and as to the rest, a captain is monarch on his own deck, and there is no means short of a successful mutiny for preventing him from doing just as he pleases as long as he keeps himself without the jurisdiction of courts. If there is a weak place in the story it is not in the character of Wolf Larsen nor the incidents in which he is the dominating figure, but rather in connection with the woman in the case and the love making, which seem to have been brought in against the author's better judgment, as a concession to the sentiment of a novel-reading public, which must have a courtship and a marriage of some kind in order to feel that it has had its money's worth.

Josephine Dodge Daskam (Mrs. Selden Bacon) is the mother of an infant girl, and there is some speculation as to what modification the little one will effect in her mother's way of looking upon children in general, for the members of Mothers' Clubs, petticoated and pantalooned, seem to have an idea that because Josephine Daskam regarded children as neither imps incarnate nor angels unfledged, she was unfit to record her observations at all. But whether it were Philip on a rampage in the kindergarten, or Ardelia on a fresh air trip, or Dickey at his dancing class, or that dear, delightful Binks all over the house and out doors, any one who knows children as they are, not as they ought to be, or as they appear when on exhibition for a half hour to their fashionable mammas, will recognize the humanness of the little procession. If Baby Bacon proves to be a tithe as entertaining as Binks, and why, shouldn't she? there is reason to fear that her mamma will not be able to spare time to write about her.

—The Bookworm.

A Tragedy

It was a glorious morning. The Man awoke just as the radiant orb of day appeared above the horizon. He arose, stretched himself, and for a few moments was in pensive mood. Presently he busied himself with his toilet, with marked deliberation, and with not the slightest suggestion in his manner of his contemplated deed. All was quiet in the house.

There was no one stirring save the Man, and he moved as quietly as possible, as if fearful of arousing some one. On the completion of his toilet he stole quietly out into the nipping and eager air, through a rear door.

The scarlet sun had made but little progress on its journey through the heavens.

The Man walked somewhat hastily toward a small shed where he procured an axe. He seemed perfectly calm. His movements would not excite the slightest suspicion, but the weapon in his hand was of eloquent import.

He sauntered across the yard, leisurely, and into a building in which perfect quiet reigned. But scarcely had he entered when a commotion was heard. In another moment a heavy thud awoke the echoes faintly, and then all was quiet again.

Presently the Man appeared at the door!

There were blood stains on his hands!

The Thanksgiving sacrifice had been offered up.

— The Trapeze.

JUST READ THIS - YOU'LL BE GLAD

This is written to remind you that every man or woman needs at intervals a change of scene and climate in order to feel well and to do one's best. It's to remind you, too, that just after the early rains the California country, and particularly the region about Hotel del Monte, "field and tree, and sky and sea," is most alluring:

"Then, if ever, come perfect days."

This is to tell you, also, that by reason of remarkable natural conditions, this present fall and winter season of 1904-05 is far advanced, so that the months of October, November, December and January are sure to be like Spring, with Summer peeping around the corner. The golf links sweeping over the hillsides that slope from blue Monterey bay were never greener, meadow larks carol among the live-oaks, palms and pines send forth young buds and branches, flaming dahlias wave in the breeze. This isn't the season for midsummer gaiety, but it's just the time and the best time for you to take a week or so of idling rest, cheerfully mingled with sport on the golf links, on horseback, climbing the mountains that rise to the eastward, or angling for the game fish of the bay.

Remember this, that Hotel del Monte offers more natural attractions and more comforts and luxuries than any other resort in the world. Remember, too, that the climate here is delightful every day in the year, and should the warm rains keep you indoors, there's bowling for exercise, and miles of corridors and glass-enclosed porches. Remember, too, that this hotel is fashionable only because it offers the best; that it is popular because every one can here have a good time, any time, every time. Remember, too, that it's a home place, where the children can be happy, and families can enjoy themselves for months without disturbing household cares.

Why not plan to spend a week or two here? Get out your golf sticks and woo Mother Nature and good health on the luring links. Write for terms, or run down any Saturday or Sunday and see for yourself. Special Saturday-Monday rate from San Francisco, including railway fare and two days' board at the hotel, only ten dollars. Leave Third and Townsend-street depot at three o'clock (parlor car), reaching the hotel at six forty-eight.

Their Thanksgiving Prayers

I thank Thee, Lord, that I am thus far the most popular of the season's buds; I thank Thee that my father has a big bank account by which I am enabled to have the smartest gowns, and most expensive hats in my set; I thank Thee that I am an expert at tennis—the game of Love—and golf; and I thank Thee that I am beautiful, with a classic profile and a naturally stylish figure.

I thank Thee, Lord, that Thou hast made the other buds so homely, and I pray Thee that Thou wilt confound mine enemies, the tabbies, and the manoeuvring match-makers, that all rich and eligible suitors will be turned from their daughters and granddaughters, and lured into my corral. Amen.
—The Debutante

I thank Thee, Lord, that I am regarded by certain of Thy ministers as a Menace to the Nation; I thank Thee that Thou didst put it into the mind of one of Thy reverends thus to term me and my kind; I thank Thee that by this means our sad and husbandless condition has been brought before the public eye.

How long have we waited, Lord, for the ears of the world to be opened to our wail. Could we go out into the highway and lasso a man when we felt the need of a help-mate? Not so, but we thank Thee for the advertisement one of Thy ministers has given us. To Thee we give thanks. Send us speedily, Lord, an answer to our supplication.
—The Bachelor Maid.

I thank Thee, Lord, that I am not as other women are; that I have three generations of ancestors; that my clothes fit well, and are of fine material; I thank Thee that my husband is of the elite; I thank Thee that my children have made good matches; I thank Thee that I have no poor relations to shame me in the sight of my friends of society; I thank Thee, Lord, that my husband has no country cousins to drop in upon us at inconvenient seasons; I thank Thee that I know no poor and stupid people to whom I must give the freedom of my house.
—The Snob.

I thank Thee, Lord, that my creditors are kind and do not press me to pay when my money stock is low; I thank Thee that I have played the pools to profit this season; I thank Thee that I am enabled to pay my poker debts, and my club dues and bar bills, and walk forth in the streets with the consciousness that I am a man of honor; I thank Thee that there are laundries and tailors and boot-makers sufficient in number to supply my simple needs whether I have the cash to pay or not.

I thank Thee that an heiress has bestowed upon me her favor and that in the months to come I may be assured of plenty.
—The Impecune.

Other People's Ideas

From "The Making of a Country Home."—A. C. Wheeler. (J. P. Mowbray; J. P. M.; "Nym Crinkle.")

We must not forget that the great bulk of the heroism of life lies among the uncelebrated persons who do their duty unflinchingly and never know how heroic they are.

However much in common a man and woman may have in life, however close they grow together in affection and in purpose, one remains masculine and the other feminine to the last. Try as they will to see things with the same eyes, things insist in looking unlike to them.

It is worth noting that a change of of attire sometimes affects a woman's disposition.

To most men of an executive turn, the possession of a work bench and tools more than renews the zest of youth. If there is any constructive skill at all in a man, the bench invites it into action, and if he is at all handy, it is the most remunerative piece of furniture he can have.

There were other forms of energy, the relation of which to results was no more easily computable. Every amateur gardener has to go through this phase of doubt, just as does the theological student. There is a time when final causes and onions appear to be a delusion and a snare, and raising truck takes its place alongside the attempt to square the circle. But if the student in the higher criticism or the lower vegetables remains a student long enough, some liberating light falls across his disbelief and his other truck beds, especially when he has some orthodox old hand near by who has thought it all out.

There is a kind of zest in walking on the edge of a beautiful precipice, that would be lost if one had wings. A man must overcome opposition, face incredulity, turn the other cheek also, make brains take the place of capital, and have patience enough to wait ten years; then, if he isn't broken down by contumely and drudgery, perhaps his children will get the reward.

It is worth recording that the ordinary man, capable of setting himself a worthy task that involves his purely masculine qualities, is usually supplied with a dogged determination that has to be reckoned with. The ordinary man does not like to be beaten even by events.

Sometimes the phraseology of the ordinary man means so much that it is not wise to translate it into a politer currency. This feeling of aggressive grip approaches to heroism, especially when there are limited resources of friends and money, but it is a heroism very much like the poet's or the soldier's, apt to be posthumous in its celebration.

There are some women who are incapable of understanding what a home means. We all get the credit of being horn domestic. But the best of us, I guess, have to learn it like our other lessons."—Lucy.

WHAT CAN I EAT? NOTHING AGREES WITH ME.

Do you ever say that—do you ever feel that life isn't worth living because you are continually in pain, sick to your stomach and can't eat a single mouthful of any substantial food?

After you do eat a little do you feel a lump in your stomach? You know you have dyspepsia and you feel that nothing will cure you.

But there is a cure—a positive cure—a quick cure. That cure is Dr. Spencer's English Dyspepsia Wafers. They haven't been on the market long, but they are doing more for suffering humanity, people suffering with dyspepsia, than any medicine ever gotten out.

After taking a few of Dr. Spencer's English Dyspepsia Wafers you will be in a condition to eat everything—you will be strong and well again. No man or woman can expect to be healthy without proper amount of food every day and the proper digestion of this food.

Dyspepsia destroys all the agreeable qualities that enter into a man's or woman's make-up.

It is almost an impossibility for anyone with a severe case of dyspepsia to look pleasant. The continuous, miserable cast-down feeling is bound to make itself shown in appearance and conversation. Dr. Spencer's English Dyspepsia Wafers are the sufferers' certain cure.

Try one box of them and if you don't feel better you will be the first case up to the present time who has not been benefited. Price 50 cts. a box.

Department No. 3. No. 92728.

MAY HARVEY ELY,

Plaintiff.

vs.

FRANCIS H. B. ELY,

Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said County in the office of the Clerk of the said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:

FRANCIS H. B. ELY, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, upon the ground of Defendant's willful desertion of Plaintiff for the period of more than one year continuously, next immediately preceding the date of the commencement of this action, and also upon the ground of Defendant's failure to provide for Plaintiff the common necessities of life he having the ability so to do, for the period of more than one year continuously next preceding the date of the commencement of this action; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court at the City (SEAL) and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 7th day of October in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four.

A Great Republican Reformer

The battle for reform was waged with great vigor in several States during the recent campaign, but nowhere was such a signal victory achieved as that to the credit of Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin. People throughout the country are familiar with the brilliant achievements of Mr. Joseph W. Folk of Missouri, because his prosecution of the boodlers was of a spectacular character and covered a long and exciting period, but La Follette did not begin to attract general attention until his arena was extended beyond the borders of his own State, by the fight made against him in the Republican National Convention. He was booted out of the convention with scant ceremony. Postal grafters have been shown much more courtesy than was vouchsafed La Follette by the people of his party in Chicago. Republicans dearly hate a reformer. They regard him as a meddlesome trouble-brewer, a pharisaical faker, whose professions are cant and whose performances are in furtherance of self-interest. Consequently the reformer is a rara avis in the Republican aviary. But La Follette is an aggressive Republican reformer, and he has won a great victory against big odds. He was opposed by all the leaders of the disintegrating Hanna machine; the Senatorial clique fought him from start to finish, but he secured from the people of Wisconsin the ratification after many vicissitudes of the Direct Nomination law, for which he began his fight ten years ago. This gives every voter a voice in the selection of candidates for office. Even United States Senators will be selected by Australian ballot, for every voter shall have the right to declare whom the party's candidate for Senator shall be. The banded corporations of the country were against La Follette because they feared the entering wedge for which his plan provides, a plan that threatens the system by which the trusts dominate the affairs of government today. If the Wisconsin idea is contagious, the end of frenzied finance which Tom Lawson has predicted cannot long be delayed. Governor La Follette has given the bonded corporations the greatest shock they ever received. He is now free to enforce his policy of equal taxation, and his companion plan of a rate commission to stop the discrimination by which transportation companies paralyze some industries and galvanize others. He has struck at the root of that great evil from which grew that infamous combine known as the Standard Oil Trust. Governor La Follette is worth watching.

Planning for Good Government

Certain distinguished public spirited citizens who are devoting themselves to the solution of the problem involving the abatement of the ruefschmitz evil are enthusiastically in favor of concentrating the strength of the decent elements of the community in a joint Democratic-Republican convention. The plan is one of inviting aspect, but there is a condition precedent to be achieved—the elimination of Abe Ruef as a factor in the Republican machine. This, however, is not such a stupendous feat as some people imagine. The greed of Ruef, and his ruthless rule, have excited the prejudice of many influential machine politicians who are eager to combine against him and divest him of the political power that came to him by accident, and that he has exercised with porcine perverseness. Ruef could never have become a political boss without the name of Schmitz to conjure with, for his defects of temperament and training render him impossible. His personality is repellant, and there is not in his nature a single one of those traits for which bosses are distinguished, and to which is attributed their success in manoeuvring for ascendancy. And now that the name of Schmitz is losing its charm, having become too closely identified with the general condition of moral and political shamelessness of the city, there should not be much difficulty in reducing Ruef to the ranks in which he had long been pestiferously active. But it is doubtful whether those public spirited citizens who are now the proponents of the harmony plan will be so enthusiastic by the time the convention meets. If, as it is suspected, they have already agreed on a candidate for Mayor, they may change their views as to the expediency of a harmony candidate, in the event of the rejection of the man who is now being groomed by them for the job.

Concerning a Candidate

It is conceded by the battered, bruised and bleeding fragments of the Democracy that the Republicans, in the event of the overthrow of Ruef, should have the selection of the mayoralty candidate. Organized labor has depleted the ranks of the Democracy in this city, and the Republican party has a majority of over ten thousand. That is conceded by all intelligent politicians, and therefore if one party is to endorse the candidates of the other, it is only fair to concede to the Republicans the right to name the man for Mayor. But the people by whom the harmony plan was conceived feel that they should be consulted about the selection of a candidate. They are distinguished merchants of this city who recently sat up and took notice of the boisterous orgy into which the municipal Administration plunged nearly three years ago, and to which public attention was first invited in the columns of this paper. These distinguished merchants have rendered valuable public service in the past, and they are now lending dignity and force to a crusade against a shameless crowd of knaves.

DR. CHARLES W. DECKER

DENTIST—Phelan Bldg. Rooms 6, 8, 10, 48. 806 Market St. Phone John 3847.

Celebrated "KNOX" HATS

Eugene Korn, the Hatter, 746 Market Street

They have been awakening public sentiment and arousing the community from the doldrums. It is their purpose to wage an unrelenting war against the criminal push, and at a banquet last week their loud tocsin tolled the first alarm, their warning to the frail ones of politics to abandon the fleshpots of a wide-open town. In the organization which the merchants have consecrated to the cause of good government there are many aggressive, public spirited citizens who have the courage occasionally to plunge, with a fine aplomb, where others fear to tread. Some of them are not unwilling to prove their civic zeal in the imminent deadly heat of a campaign, and it has been broadly hinted that there is among them well seasoned mayoralty timber that would not thrice refuse the crown. But the practical politicians—even those who abominate Ruef rule and are eager to relegate Schmitz to second fiddle in a ten-cent vaudeville orchestra, are slow to enthuse over the mercantile reformers. They express appreciation of the civic pride of those gentlemen, and of their activity in hastening the quietus of the unregenerate boss, but they do not consider them qualified to dictate party policy in a municipal campaign. They fear that if the merchants were permitted to select a mayoralty candidate, they would choose a man who could not win even though Schmitz were his only opponent. Unlike the merchants, the practical politicians are of the opinion that it would be well to keep the issue between capital and labor in the background in the next municipal campaign.

Those Gentle Critics

That keynote banquet held by the merchants last week, for the purpose of giving impetus to their good government propaganda, was not such a sensational affair as some of the dailies would have us believe. The star spellbinders were far from being intemperate in their remarks. On the contrary, their repression, considering the motif, and the material to inspire them, was amazing. Here we have a municipal government noted far and wide for its scandals and its degrading influence; there is nothing secret about the principles on which it is conducted, and its tolerance of methods that bespeak a low moral tone is not a matter of conjecture, for the Grand Jury and the press have made public much of the shameful record; nevertheless the subject was treated at the banquet with caution and diffidence. Everybody dealt in glittering generalities. The speeches sounded as though they had been written with a view of evading prosecution for slander. Mr. Wheelan excoriated the subordinates of the Administration, Mr. McNab offered a few platitudes, and Mr. Phelan, who is noted for his banquet courage, contented himself with a rhetorical jolt that was positively tame. The mildest newspaper critics of the Administration have smashed it a good deal harder than did the banquet spellbinders.

The Fostering of Individuality

A contemporary questions whether individualism is not going out with the old-fashioned home. "We live in layers; we are fed like troopers in a common mess; our privacy is confined to a couple of rooms; we flit lightly from rented house to rented house with never a wrench at the heart; we move on trivial provocation—a dollar's raise of rent, a dispute with the agent over the tinting of a wall or the mending of a window. We revere no ancestral halls, for we are birds of passage, building our nests for a season only and never taking root anywhere. Here today and there tomorrow—that is our rule of life." All of which argues a decay of family life but an increase of individualism. It is an age of egotism. From the infant in arms to the graybeard tottering on to eternity the point at issue is mine. The cult of child-study encourages in the first conscious moments the exaltation of the ego. Mothers and nurses are cautioned to keep hands off and attempt no system of discipline lest they thereby restrain the flight of genius. Rather must they stand in reverential attitude and themselves learn. The kindergarten carries the good work forward and the public school advances it another step. On every side the watchword is "Hands off." Children are trained in the belief that they have no duties except to themselves. If Mary Jane wants to go off on an excursion on Saturday or holiday, she simply goes. That there are household tasks in which she might assist, or that there are good reasons why her going may inconvenience others is no argument to her that she should subordinate herself. If William wants to engage in a practice game of football instead of attending church service, he dons his togs and sets out. Church simply has no right to interfere with sport, and that, as far as he is concerned, ends the matter. If parents are so absurd as to issue commands they are ignored, and if school authorities are even so much as suspected of harboring base designs on the freedom of pupils they are met with a strike or a boycott. The wife who finds marriage irksome rushes off to the divorce court for relief, and the husband who does not find a champagne menu maintained on a steam beer allowance, kicks over the traces. If everything at home is not precisely to daughter's liking, she sets up an apartment of her own, though it be but a forlorn hall bedroom. It is not living long in old houses that makes home, but a community of interest, a life lived in common. We are not suffering from the loss of individuality but from individuality run riot.

As to Plagiarism

Harold Bolce says in the November Booklovers' Magazine, "Nor is plagiarism considered a literary offense in Japan. The more a writer can interlard his story or essay with ideas, phrases and even paragraphs from the works of masters, foreign or domestic, the greater the proof of his scholarship. To advertise a borrowed extract by the parade of quotation marks would be an exhibition of questionable taste: it would serve to indicate that the writer had recourse to this vulgar expedient to announce an erudition which he feared might otherwise escape attention. . . . If a song gave pleasure five centuries ago why not borrow its beauty to adorn a poem today? And why cumber a shelf with an unread philosopher when his maxims can be appropriated to illuminate a contemporary essay?" Why, indeed? And why need we, Occidentals, wax indignantly virtuous over the literary ways of the Japanese, when the same thing is carried on on our own side of the Pacific and the other side of the Atlantic, and all that propriety demands is that the transfer shall escape detection? Editors and publishers, who have to exercise eternal vigilance in order to protect themselves from imposition, say that their greatest safeguard is not the honesty of would-be authors but their lack of industry. It is only because it is too much trouble to copy or recast what is out of date and forgotten that they are not victimized every day in the week, for it is manifestly impossible for any one to keep the run of even the contemporary output of a year, much less a lifetime, or all the centuries since the invention of printing. Some one recently made the discovery that Mrs. Burton-Harrison's novel drama, "The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch," is in effect a condensation of "East Lynne," and that, in turn, was a clean steal of an old English novel called "The Admiral's Daughter." Within the last two or three years Leslie's Weekly reprinted one of Dickens's short stories with a new title and a new author, and when attention was directed to it, there was some sort of a lame apology to the effect that it was one of a series of tales to be published in that way with a guessing contest concealed somewhere thereabouts. As nothing had been said in advance, and no more "fakes" followed, it is obvious that the excuse was fabricated to cover the editorial error. Some score of years ago the Harpers published a novel of Charles Reade's in serial. On reading the first installment, many people recognized it as something which had appeared years before in an English magazine as a translation from the French. No explanation was ever forthcoming as the death of Charles Reade took place before he could be taken to book. And so one might go on, endlessly, citing instances, from Shakespeare to Hall Caine, where similarity of plot or language, if not both, would seem to be more than coincidence. William Dean Howells defends the so-called literary plagiarisms on the very same ground upon which Mr. Bolce condemns the Japanese, namely, that ideas belong to those who can make best use of them, and that when good things are buried in the oblivion of old-fashioned dress it is a merit to bring them forth to the light. Bacon spent a great deal of time in that occupation, and Montaigne confessed that he did the same thing. As to quotation marks they are more often introduced from pedantry than from any necessity for embellishment or elucidation. And when it comes to appropriating the substance of philosophy and epigram, what are all the clever brilliancies of our modern novels and dramas but the "Teachings of Epictetus" or the "Thoughts of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus" done into the vernacular, embellished with slang or otherwise brought down to date? When it comes to charging the Japanese with commercial and literary shortcomings, we have an excellent opportunity of making practical application of the Scriptural parable of the beam and the mote. The Oriental morality does not recognize any wrong in the appropriation itself, and there is no shame in being detected. On the other hand, the Occidental mind is complacent enough at the theft, but shrinks from the discovery. Which is the better system?

Zangwill on Anti-Semitism

Israel Zangwill is not taken seriously as a modern Moses by his co-religionists. He says many things that do not meet with the approval of Jews. They admire his literary style, his stories and his financial success, but not his political philosophy. He recently asserted that Jews are not a popular people; that anti-Semitism is growing in this country and England because the Jews are clannish, and with Israelitish stiff-neckedness have spurned intermarriage, the only natural process by which two alien nations can be welded. If Mr. Zangwill were more familiar with the facts he would not have erred so egregiously. The prejudice against the intermarriage of Jews and Christians is mutual, but dissimilar. The Jewish prejudice is purely religious; that of the Christian is variously inspired. A similar prejudice is confined to the jarring Christian sects. Religious conversion is a prerequisite to marriage among various races of people. The Jewish consciousness shrinks instinctively from intermarriage, but not from any feeling of superiority or because of race exclusiveness. It is the belief of Jews that they cannot "witness to God" with disunited families. The unity of their social organism is not the individual but the family, and that unity can be maintained in its strength only by harmony in religious conviction.

Kipling May Have Been Responsible

Somebody has discovered that Kipling was responsible for Admiral Rojestvensky's terrible blunder. In one of Kipling's stories he treats of the manoeuvres of the British navy and tells of the sinking of the enemy's battleships by torpedo boats that crept on the leviathan under cover of a fleet of trawlers. The Russian admiral who was responsible for the Baltic fleet outrage has not pleaded in extenuation the realism of the Kipling story, but no doubt if he is able to prove that he had a copy of "Their Lawful Occasions" in his cabin, and swears that he imagined that Japanese destroyers were masked by the Dogger Bank fishing fleet, England will give weight to the matter when the time comes for fixing the damages. And then, perhaps discussion of the old question of the responsibility of the novelist to society will be revived. The fanciful fiction writer has brought about considerable mortality by suggesting ways and means to homicidal fiends. Kipling's publisher should bring influence to bear on the Russian admiral to induce him to blame the novelist. Here is a great opportunity for a revival of the Kipling boom.

Lawson's Great Message

BY THEODORE BONNET.

More blood, sentiment and heart throbs abound in Tom Lawson's story of "Frenzied Finance," now running in Everybody's, than in any other tale of current magazine literature. A more thrilling or sensational depiction of man's inhumanity to man, of money lust, of moral degeneracy, has never been printed. It is the most important message to the people of this country since Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation, but its import is not yet generally appreciated. Lawson is not in the position to command the immediate attention that was vouchsafed Lincoln, but it is already apparent that he did not undertake in vain the abatement of those appalling evils that are concomitants of the vicious and demoralizing system of finance which is today responsible for the plundering of millions of people, for the growth of an arrogant plutocracy, and the debauching of public officials in every State in the Union. It seems providential that at this time there should be in the Presidential chair a man fired with patriotic fervor, comparatively free from entangling political alliances, pledged to serve but a single term, and therefore unlikely to bid for the favor of those colossal capitalistic combines that usually dictate the policy of ambitious statesmen. Mr. Roosevelt has given ear to the palpitant message of the Boston financier. He has ordered investigation of the methods and practices of that gigantic glutton known as the Standard Oil Trust, whose pestiferous offshoots, according to Lawson, ramify through almost every industrial institution in this country, and whose slimy trail may be traced through legislatures and courts, and into Executive Mansions. There is reason to believe that President Roosevelt is wedded to ideals for the next four years; that he is going to bid in earnest for a niche in his country's pantheon, and will therefore strive to reconcile his performances with the glorious professions which illuminate the handsomely bound output of his strenuous pen. There is no doubt of the President's aggressiveness, and he has abundant resources at his command for the exploitation of that magic field which has been yielding such rich harvests to the wizards of Wall street. He should have no difficulty in making the explorations essential to an expose of the methods by which the plutocratic Mephistos alchemise watered stock into coin of the realm while you wait. Ordinarily a President would not care to tackle the job that Mr. Roosevelt has cut out for himself, for the Standard Oil octopus is a revengeful beast, but our Executive, pledged to retire to private life in four years, is not cultivating a lively sense of favors to come. Moreover, his impetuosity in shouldering responsibilities is one of the temperamental characteristics of the man; one that absolves him of being a cunning politician. He has always shown an insatiate wish to know about everything and ascertain for himself, a willingness amounting almost to a passion to acquaint himself with activities on the ground floor. So it is not surprising that he has decided to investigate Standard Oil. If he shall succeed in verifying half that Tom Lawson has charged, there will be a violent disturbance, seismic and cyclonic, behind the seemingly impregnable ramparts of high and haughty finance. Mr. Lawson has already excited the consternation of the unholy crew, for he has taken the public behind the scenes and exposed the mechanism. He has shown how investors have been plundered and how the Government has been pressed into the service of the rogues and thieves. He has pointed out that National Banks are the accomplices of high-toned highwaymen, and that the leading insurance companies are controlled by the immoral stock jobbers of the over-capitalized trusts; that the stability of those insurance companies depends on the honesty of one man, and that that one man is no saint. He has shown that much of the surplus capital of those insurance companies is invested in securities that purport to be bonds but which are nothing more than watered stock. Mr. Lawson is not a mere alarmist, writing on hearsay testimony. He is one of the most astute financiers in this country, and he is writing of transactions in which he participated. His motives may be questioned, but the financial history which he relates is largely a matter of record. He is being denounced on all sides for "peaching on his pals," but to read his story in an unprejudiced frame of mind is to be convinced of his sincerity, and of his desire to render a great public service. The repentant sinner engaged in making reparation by inflicting shame and humiliation on his accomplices is not an heroic figure, but it requires courage to assume a role that invites scorn and contumely. Lawson makes no denial of his sins, but he takes good care to contrast himself advantageously with Rogers, Addicks, Whitney and the other unstriped felons and whited sepulchres of haut finance. He represents himself as having been reluctant to enter into many of their unsavory projects, but though he knew they were corrupting public officials he was silent and sequacious. He is a picturesque egotist, who has long been in disfavor among fashionable club men of Boston and New York, whose enmity was largely due to his independent spirit. He is aggressive and blunt, a self-made man who has no great respect for blood and lineage, and it is no doubt with great pleasure that he is now accentuating the fact that the most contemptible scoundrels engaged in swindling the public, the men who are not to be trusted by their own associates, who repudiate bargains with gentlemen as unhesitatingly as they cheat legislators whom they have bought, are scions of the best New England families, leaders of the most exclusive society and members of the most select clubs. Some of them have been sneering at his utterances, and efforts have been made by the trust magnates to counteract the effect of his startling expose, but nobody has dared prosecute him for libel, notwithstanding the fact that nothing approximating his attacks in bitterness and severity are to be found in the pages of modern journalism. That his lash has raised welts is evident from the covert retaliation of some of his victims through subsidized financial journals, and from the misrepresentations of certain financiers which he has been quick to expose. Many servile journals have scoffed at his recital and taunted him with his own checkered past, but he has the satisfaction of knowing that his revelations have caused a flutter in the White House, and that the magazine for which he is writing has, by reason of his performance, attained a circulation and an advertising patronage that have made it one of the most valuable journalistic properties in the country. And whatever may be thought of his personality it must be conceded that he has rendered a great public service in elucidating the mysteries and legerdemain of High Finance, and exposing the sham of those great business interests that the politicians are at all times so fearful of disturbing.

Open Letters to Men of Mark. No. 2.

ADDRESSED TO JOHN HAY, ESQ., SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, AND RELATING TO HIS PROPOSED PEACE CONGRESS AND ARBITRATION TRIBUNAL.

BY DEMOCRITUS.

My Dear Mr. Hay:

I am informed by the public prints that you are the intellectual force in a scheme to furl the battle flags and to federate the powers of the earth in an international comity whereby all disputes may be passed upon judicially and all questions finally settled by due processes of laws founded in equity, justice and universal peace.

It is your beneficent purpose, I take it, to establish a court of last resort in which judgment shall be rendered among the nations and rebukes administered to many people, after the manner of the word that Isaiah the son of Amoz saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem out of which he prophesied that in the last days the people shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks—a time when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

It is a millennial dream worthy of you, Mr. Secretary—gentle poet, wise statesman, upright citizen. Let me dream a space with you—let me sit with you in your Place of the Brooding Dove where the summer silence is penetrated at intervals by the hum of bees winging their flight to Hybla; where the warm sunlight sifts through interlacing boughs of olives seeded from the veritable tree from which the bird of peace plucked a branch to bear back to the stranding ark; where the perfumes of violets and sweet lavender are wafted on “the dewy wings of courteous Zephyrus;” where Justice sits, unbandaged, wide-eyed, her sword sheathed and her scales empty—her immemorial occupation gone because men have learned that the Law of Might is not the Law of Right—that force is the robber’s weapon, and that no man’s liberty may trespass the boundary of another man’s freedom.

Enter William Hohenzollern, Emperor of Germany by the grace of the God of Battles—enter the war lord divinely regnant over all the tribes of Goths and Vandals and pirate Saxons. In all humility comes he clad in sackcloth and covered with ashes—penitent for the deeds of his warring ancestry and eager to covenant with the other kings and rulers that all their swords shall be beaten into ploughshares and all their spears rewelded into hooks for the pruning of vines and fig trees. His majesty has left his clanking sabre at the door of this peaceful tribunal and he has hung his spurs on a pruning hook in the antechamber. All that he brings with him of his martial accoutrement is his mailed fist and it is to lay this iron gauntlet and brass knuckles on the clerk’s desk that he has obeyed the summons of the court.

The modish woman’s stationery is as much a part of her nowadays as her dainty wardrobe. Cooper & Co., 746 Market Street, are showing the newest modes in paper and envelopes, dies and seals.

Methinks I see the warrior prince of Hohenzollern bowing his crested head in the presence of your Court of Arbitration, Mr. Hay—and it is a goodly sight; but, alas, it is only in my dream that I see this noble spectacle.

And now I see the autocrat of all the Russias—he of Holstein-Gottorp—surnamed the Great White Czar, meekly laying his sceptre beside the shepherd’s crook under the shadow of the Dove’s outspread wings. Like the murmuring of autumn winds in the Carpathian forests his voice steals through the portals of my ears: “I am sorry that I am the Great White Czar,” he is saying. “It is not my fault. It is an accident of my birth—itsself an accident that I have never ceased to regret. I am not personally responsible for this war in the Far East—my Grand Dukes, my brothers and my mother-in-law are the accessories before that fact, your honors. But I am free to confess that I didn’t put my foot down on those Ducal assassins very hard and for that declare myself a culprit at this bar. Neither did I forbid the attempt to rob China of Manchuria and her northern provinces. Therefore am I in a measure morally responsible for the murder that is doing in the extreme Orient. I am here to apologize and make amends as far as may lie in my power. I was the first monarch to suggest this Court of Arbitration and to advocate the universal peace proposition. I have left my sword out there alongside the sabre of my brother monarch, William of Hohenzollern, and I have ordered that it be beaten into a ploughshare and presented as a token of my esteem and goodwill to Count Tolstoy—my spear is already fashioned into a pruning hook with which I shall trim the orchards of my oppressed dependency of Poland. In the meantime, your honors, I would ask for a writ or warrant out of this court authorizing me to use my pruning hook on the necks of my Grand Dukes and my mother-in-law, the Princess Dagmar—otherwise all my promises, all my effort will be in vain.”

Then comes Mutsuhito, Meiji Tenno, Heavenly Emperor and Mikado of Japan, announcing to the strident strains of accompanying samisen and koto, that he has decided to abandon the Samurai tradition and compel his warriors to let Kuropatkin go in peace. As these Samurai are entitled to wear two swords one of them shall be beaten into a ploughshare and the other shall be made over into a rice sickle. There is something proud and commanding in the port of the Mikado as one who has been victorious, but there is also a hint of impatience in his bearing as if he would have a decision of the court before the God of Battles has opportunity to change his mind concerning the campaign in Manchuria. He knows that the Emperor of Russia is praying with all his heart that Russia may come out of this scrap with honor, and as the hierarch of Shintoism he knows that the gods are but human in their last analysis, and humanly susceptible to such piteous appeals. Furthermore he is painfully aware that the finances of the Japanese empire are running at very low ebb and must eventually go dry if the drain is not speedily stopped.

This, I think, will serve as a sample of my dream — and yours. All the others came into court — Edward of England, seventh of the name; Francis Joseph of Austria, poor, harassed old monarch whose hope of peace is in the tomb; President Loubet, representative of a race whose utter degeneracy precludes all possibility of successful war, and whose continuity as a nation rests solely in universal peace wherein may be bred moral cankers and the vices of a civilization ripe unto rottenness; Humbert of Italy, whose place among the so-called Powers is equivalent to that of the second fiddle in the operas of La Scala and for whom, therefore, peace hath victories more renowned than those of war. These are the chief protagonists in your pastoral of universal peace as I saw them in my dream — as you probably see them in your waking hours.

Now that I am fully recovered from my pipe dream of peace, "not poppy, nor mandragora, nor all the drowsy sirups of the world, shall medicine me to that sweet sleep" again. Once more I find myself in a world of strife and greed and covetous desire — a world where the end justifies the means in spite of an altruism that was born with Buddha and came to its perfect fruitage in the life and teachings of Christ; a world where only the fittest can or ought to survive. Now that I have, like Abou Ben Adhem, awakened from our dream of peace, Mr. Hay, I discover that we are deluded by a hypocritical confidence in our fellow man. For myself I find that even you, Mr. Secretary of State, are chasing an ignis fatuus — floundering through the swamps and morasses of theory in pursuit of a phantom that has never, in all the ages of human existence on this earth, attained to the dignity of a living, palpable, substantial entity.

What, in very truth, does your proposed Court of Arbitration purpose, Mr. Hay? Thus far I have heard much of the Powers in the composition of your tribunal, and not a word concerning the little peoples. What voice will the weaker nations have in this court? Do you think the wrongs that have been committed upon these weak nations will be redressed in the Council of Supreme Justice? Will you permit the Colombians, the Filipinos, and the Hawaiians to come into court as plaintiffs against the great Republic that has made them subject to its alien laws, robbed them of their heritage, and even denied them the constitutional right to trial by a jury of their peers? Don't dodge, Mr. Secretary — right is right and justice is for the meanest as for the noblest; don't try to hedge beneath the dusty subterfuges of an outworn diplomatic sophistry; come up like a man and declare to the world that you are honest in this effort to spread the divine gospel of peace on earth and goodwill to men — and to corroborate your assertion tell us that in your Court of Arbitration the Colombian, the Hawaiian and the Filipino can have the same justice that will be meted to Great Britain and Russia in their cause now pending. Say this to the world, Mr. Secretary of State, and the world will believe in you; in your sincerity of purpose, and your desire for the real peace that passeth understanding.

Then we will hale Great Britain before the bar in the matter of that South African conquest; we will make Germany show her title to the province of Shantung; and we will have issued a restraining order and perpetual injunction against English, Russian and Japanese aggrandizement in Tibet, Manchuria, and Korea.

The dream, Mr. Hay, is beautiful; but the reality is quite another thing. For my part I hope that you will fail utterly in your beneficent purpose — not because I am opposed to peace on earth and goodwill to men, but because I detest hypocrisy and pharisaism in all its phases, and especially when it is unconsciously manifested in the good intention of men like yourself — intellectual men whose mental grasp ought to save them from such absurdity as you seem bent upon in this utopian scheme of universal peace and catholic justice.

A Word for Winter

BY HARRY COWELL.

When I was a boy, the impiety of many of my opinions was wont to make the hearts of my spiritual pastors and masters very sad indeed — hearts tenderly, though somewhat officiously, set on plucking me, green brand that I was, from the burning. For instance, I thought aloud, as not a few good children of larger or lesser growth think in silence, that heaven must from all accredited accounts be a place insufferably monotonous. And to me monotony was then, as in fact it is now, the blackest of black beasts. I remember that I took particular exception to a couple of quite innocent lines in a hymn which I was used to hear sung repeatedly, without expression: —

"There everlasting spring abides
And never-withering flowers."

Spring and flowers I loved full well, but that was passing spring and those were fading flowers. In my little Pagan heart, anticipating the poetry of William Johnson, I exclaimed: "And O the reason why I love them is because they die." From the very beginning, the beauty of the evanescent had cast its delicate spell upon me. While yet in the nursery, the poetry and pathos of the mortality of things had moved me, an unmistakable mortal, deeply, strangely, terribly almost. I am earth-born, the denizen of an uncertain sphere; and chance and change have always had a natural charm for me. Not that I knew in the days of my youthful impiety, as now I know, that the first word to be said in favor of winter — a word so obvious that one hesitates to say it — is, that without it there is no spring; that the everlasting spring of heaven and California is not spring, nor any season at all. Ah me, child that I am, impious as ever, still audaciously thinking aloud the secret thoughts of silent piety and patriotism! Nay, I will not believe it; it cannot be that the bad boy who every seventh day broke afresh the heart of his Sunday-school teacher was father to the man who now writes these eminently decorous sermons week after week. Oh well, the truth has always at least the charm of novelty.

For many a weary day, then, from now on until bird-mating time, here in this unchanging heaven of ours have I been subject to a strange nostalgia, a curious homesickness for the snows. 'Tis nigh a score years now since my window-sill has seen a robin hunger-tame. Gladly would I give strawberries and cream after my Christmas turkey, and all the rest of it, to be soundly frost bitten once again. The back of my neck is lonely for the friendly balls from the hands of grinning urchins. Nay, more; my own hands remember; and are aware of their emptiness. I am tired of "darling buds of May" the year round. I long for the sight of earth desolate, the color of sorrow; of hips and haws in bare hedges; of trees leafless and windworn; reminiscent of old age and death and all the immortal mortality of things. I have a childish desire to breathe upon a window pane and see the fronds form, exquisite, fantastic, strangely beautiful. Fain would I yet again sit before a great wood fire, idly watching the curious beauty of red flame, falling into those rare reveries of old, waking up from my dreaming only when a log fell with a crash and a host of trouble-suggesting sparks flew upward and out into the dark; or when the storm without rattled the shutters and added to the sense of comfort indoors; or perhaps — the reverie being exceptionally rare, the dreaming deeper than usual — only when nothing remained of the red glory that was but a sad handful of gray ashes. While the mood lasts, how I pity poor little proud native sons and daughters of the Golden West who know nothing of the season, "when icicles hang by the wall, And Dick the shepherd blows his nail." It grieves me sore that even the great all-embracing poet himself must compliment his lady of the sonnets with his "But thy eternal summer shall not fade"; and with the rest, have his fling at winter by coupling it with discontent and ingratitude and other the like undesirable things. Man, however, was made neither for everlasting springs nor for eternal summers, nor yet for unending harvest times. Not for either or all of these belauded seasons alone, but for winter also, was he made.

Winter is not all roughness. Like death, it has its unmatchable refinements. Solemn into the "white silence" man goes forth to muse upon man. During the many hours of darkness he has time to bethink him that all earth's weary ones will sleep well at last. The peoples of the Northland are seldom flippant. High seriousness is in snows. The long nights are full of thought. The bird of wisdom sleeps by day; the earlier the sun goes down, the earlier is he on the wing. Winter teaches man the value of the hearth. At the same time, the sons of the snows are virile and inventive. Jack Frost is the father of civilization.

Again, what is the use of a castle in California when no poor half-clad wretch stands shivering envious at your door? With your toes to the flame, to pity the naked abroad in the night is a luxury reserved for lands of inglorious climate.

The summer for light reading and flirtation; the winter for literature and love — love that somehow seems more distinctly human, a delicate thing withdrawn a little from nature, sweetly out of season, as it were.

Red-blooded optimism delights in the season of snow; the sharp sting in the air whets the appetite for life and all the wild joys thereof. Like hardy shepherd boys, we glad believers in the best blow our nails, gleefully rub our hands together and stamp our lusty feet upon the stubborn earth until we are all a-tingle from top to toe. The Greek in us meets "with a frolic welcome" warring wind and foe-like frost. I have a tear ready for the heart that has never beat high to the music of sleigh bells and the merry ring of steel upon the ice.

But mistake me not. I would not have winter forever. That, no less than everlasting spring or eternal summer, would be the reverse of heaven. How much of wished-for winter could my hungry heart eat? I know not. We are creatures of perverse appetites. What we have not, that we would; and what we have, that we desire not, nor can desire. The fable of the fox and the grapes is not the whole truth: the more out of reach, the more heavenly sweet the fruit—"on lips that are for others." Were it not for the fact that the things that seem most ours we may lose any minute, and possession were more a mockery than it is.

On Laurel Hill

BY MABEL PORTER PITTS.

How heedless they on Laurel Hill!
The lark that has lain dumb
With weight of night within his throat,
With darkness silencing each note,
Near bursts his heart with melody
Now day is come;
But matin song finds no responsive thrill
In these, the heedless ones, on Laurel Hill.

On Laurel Hill they love the night
With pale stars overhead,
For when the earth lies dark and cold
White tendrils seem to ease their hold
And give each sleeper freer space
Within his bed.
What care these silent ones for dawning light
That ever fails to reach them in their night?

Here's name and fame with moss o'ergrown
And white stone sinking lower;
Each day the city grows apace,
Each day some trav'ler seeks the place
And to himself a homestead takes
To roam no more.
On Laurel Hill each, housed beneath his stone,
Like surly hermit, guards his hearth, alone.

The Saunterer

Baiting the Syndicate

Reviewing the Examiner's persistent attack on the Oakland Realty Syndicate, I am inclined to regard the action of the newspaper as savoring of persecution. Surely it was enough that the business methods of the congeries of financial interests should have been discussed in a single article; there was no necessity for iteration and reiteration of the charge that the Syndicate is peddling its certificates without security for their ultimate redemption. Even the Examiner, however, does not directly charge that these certificates will not be redeemed. The newspaper's innuendo that the investment is worthless is conveyed in an inquiry as to the solvency of the corporation issuing the promissory notes. This is unfair. The Examiner knows, as everybody knows, that the people who are behind the Syndicate are solvent. F. M. Smith is a millionaire. F. C. Havens, the financier of the scheme, is the owner of yachts and automobiles—the outward evidence of millionairehood; his sons are high salaried officials of the Syndicate and its collateral enterprises. The standing of the Herons, the Engs, the Maxwells, and the Sterlings is beyond reproach in the social environment of Oakland. They pay their debts on demand; they wear good clothes, and they ride in automobiles. Why should the holders of promissory notes issued by this eminently respectable coterie of financiers worry about payment of the principal? Even the Examiner doesn't charge that the indebtedness to the purchasers of the Syndicate certificates exceeds four million dollars—a mere bagatelle; if necessary, F. M. Smith could redeem the entire amount with a stroke of his pen; F. C. Havens could easily pay the debt with money secured by his personal note.

Safe, Sane Finance

The insinuation of the Examiner that the Syndicate is a "get-rich-quick" scheme is untenable in view of the fact that any man may go into the marts of trade and the temples of finance and procure all the money he wants on his promissory notes bearing six per cent interest per annum. Any business man will loan any other man one hundred dollars for ten years at six per cent. Figure it for yourself: You receive six dollars a year, or sixty dollars in ten years, plus your principal. Why should you ask for "security"? Suppose the "security" is inadequate, how can you lose as long as the promissory notes are selling in the marts of trade and the temples of finance? Is it not a self-evident proposition that as long as Peter pays Paul the latter cannot lose? and is it not also clear that when Peter has paid Paul he ceases to be Peter and is Paul for the next investor? Go to! thou carping, envious, fault-finding, meddling, interloping censors! What do you know about finance—safe, sane finance? Read Tom Lawson and you will learn that the methods of the Realty Company are based on principles as sound as those which govern the activities of the Morgans and the Rockefellers. Much depends on the honesty of the people who are handling your money, and nobody questions the honesty of Mr. F. M. Smith. He is a philanthropist and a public spirited citizen, and in Oakland he is making two blades of grass grow where but a single one had flourished.

Fish to Oakland's Net

Oakland is not making outcry against the Syndicate or its methods of raising the wind. Oakland laughs and says that the Syndicate is the best thing that ever happened to the town. Only the superb genius of a Havens could have devised such an effective scheme for the improvement of Oakland. Heretofore it has been necessary to issue bonds for money with which to improve Oakland, and the interest on these bonds was assessed to the property owners. Now comes the Syndicate and gives its promissory note for a few millions and pays its own interest. The money thus obtained is used, in part, for the building of roads and the operation of street railways. Much of it is spent in Oakland. Therefore Oakland rejoices. Oakland's chuckle is evoked by the circumstance that very little of this money borrowed by the Syndicate is Oakland money. Some of it comes from Santa Rosa, some of it from San Jose, some of it from the other towns of the State, some of it from Hawaii, some of it from the Eastern States—the progressive citizen of Oakland doesn't care where it comes from so long as it comes. Like Monte Cristo, the Syndicate can boast, "The world is mine!" and like the elegiac poet the citizen of Oakland can sing, "What is thy loss is my eternal gain!"

It Will Be a Bonnie Fight

I would advise the Examiner to cease its clamor against the Oakland Realty Syndicate. Some day the Syndicate will talk back, and when the Sir Oracles of Oakland finance ope their lips, let no newspaper dogs bark. It must not be forgotten that the Syndicate supports an organ all its own in the suburb of Emeryville, a semi-detached village fronting on Fortieth street in North Oakland. To be sure, this organ got the Syndicate into this trouble, but with equal facility it can pull the Syndicate out of the mud. F. M. Smith is a fighter of no mean calibre, as his rivals in the field of journalism have learned to their sorrow already; then there is F. C. Havens—he has a pen for any fate, and he can write with all the fine frenzy of a Lawson when his subject is finance; then comes Poet Sterling—master of the verse that made Byron famous in "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers"—look out for Sterling! Heron is a logical fellow—Heron will do the heavy firing on the flank of the enemy; Maxwell belongs to the Cossack arm of the service—Maxwell is a rapid-fire writer of the sarcastic order; and Engs lisps in numbers—he could edit a financial review with great eclat. These are the regular staff, but the Syndicate has money enough to hire all the swashbucklers of the press—the most capable and unscrupulous soldiers of fortune whose pens are in the market for sale to the highest bidder. When the Syndicate is ready for action there'll be blood on the moon.

Awaiting Developments

All the Senatorial candidates are now emulating the patient, philosophical Micawber. Each has gone about as far as he thinks it advisable in the quest of votes, and is waiting for the machine operators to formulate a program. George Knight is probably more active than any of the other toga aspirants but he is exerting his "pull" at the Eastern end of the wire, with a view of having pressure brought to bear on the machine. Nobody knows what progress is being made by any of the candidates, and at this time the chances of all save Bard are about equal. Senator Charley Shortridge is enjoying the situation immensely and promises to upset the plans of all the candidates by putting Postmaster Fisk in nomination. Fisk has not announced his candidacy, but Shortridge insists on making a Senator of him.

When the South Gets Together

The Senatorial candidates have not a great deal of time in which to round up votes, for the Legislature will go into session on the second of January, and on the tenth of that month the first ballot for Senator will be taken. Meanwhile the politicians of the citrus belt are becoming exceedingly anxious, for they have been advised that if they do not get together a northern man will get the toga. Fancy the roar that would go up in Los Angeles if the two Californian Senators were to hail from north of Tehachapi! Knowing as I do the spirit that prevails in Los Angeles, I am inclined to the opinion that there will be a consolidation of the Southern vote before long. The people will demand a compromise candidate, and as there is not the remotest probability of a union of the Bard and Flint forces, it is not hard to understand the confidence of Oxnard, who enjoys the friendship of both factions. But meanwhile there is talk of other candidates coming into the fight. Congressman McLachlan is talked of and I have heard U. S. Grant and Truxtun Beale suggested. It has been reported that I. W. Hellman Jr. was thinking seriously of getting into the fray. For many years the Hellman family has had an eye on the toga. Steve White's first trip to the legislature was in the interest of Hellman Sr. and it was in the opposition of Hellman to Hearst that the old Examiner-White feud had its origin.

The Snubbing of Schmitz

That great labor champion who struck the pose of a martyr to the cause the other night, appears to be losing caste among the people for whom, according to his own story, he has suffered much. I remarked the omission of the name of Mayor Schmitz from the list of those present on Monday night, at the reception in honor of the great labor leaders given by Mr. James H. Barry of the Star. At that reception Gompers, Mitchell and other distinguished rep-representatives of organized labor hobnobbed with Mr. Fremont Older, editor of the Bulletin, who has been leading a most aggressive campaign against the grafters of the Schmitz-Ruef Administration. And yet Mr. Schmitz tells us that despite the purity of himself and his immaculate followers he is being persecuted on account of the cause of which he is a distinguished proponent. Perhaps the next great banquet will be a Schmitz function with Ruef as host, given for the purpose of enabling the down-trodden Mayor to castigate the labor leaders for so publicly expressing their unbelief in his protestations.

If Tom Should Marry

In the Bohemian Club there is a mild suspicion of another impending defection from the bachelor ranks, and there is considerable anxiety anent the prospect. The young bachelors are the principal contributors to the gayety of the institution, and if many more of them bend their necks to the galling yoke, the aching void will become a serious matter. Of course there are many old bachelors in the club who have taken a prophylactic against matrimony, but they don't count. They merely sit around and grumble. They never would be missed, but the sprightly youngsters ranging from forty to fifty years are important factors for the promotion of hilarity. What would happen—is the question I have heard asked—if Tom Barbour were to become genuinely sentimental, and follow in the footsteps of his friend Joe Howell? Barbour belongs to the younger set of bohemian bachelors. He is a successful Captain of Industry, engaged in a profitable foundry business, and he is one of the most enthusiastic members of the club. He has a genius for determining the punctilios of club dinners and all Red Room functions, and he sees that the aplomb of the club is preserved at all times. He is skilled in nice distinctions of club intercourse, and so it would be a serious matter were he to be lured into domesticity. But stranger things have happened and Tom is a gallant beau as well as a bohemian.

Back to Provincial Practice

When Mrs. Peter Martin was out here last year she was shocked to find that our provincial society picked up its train in the dance. She considered the practice bourgeois and she said so. In her opinion it was evidence of a penurious spirit, and of the want of that Vere de Vere repose which is eloquent of an indifference to vulgar cost. Presto! every train was dropped and dragged. Our society girls showed Mrs. Peter that they could be just as reckless as she, and many meagre wardrobes saw their finish before the season was over, for dancing floors are not always immaculate, and the feet of the most graceful society beau are occasionally given to trespassing. But the girls are now beyond the range of Mrs. Peter's critical vision, and once more trains are being held up. Said a society girl at the Greenway dance, as she picked her frock high from the floor, "Even at the risk of looking like a bowery girl I will have clean skirts." In New York, by the way, where trains are lowered, women do very little dancing. About seven times around and then a long promenade is considered the proper thing.

It's Too Expensive

I am informed that the Peter Martins are wintering in Europe because it is cheaper than the season in gay New York. Mrs. Martin likes Europe, however, for she had a great vogue over there on her first trip, when she was entertained by the Grand Duke Boris, of the wonderful bracelets, who was shipped home from the front some months ago for unmilitary behavior. But Mrs. Martin prefers New York in winter and would stay there if it did not require such a vast fortune to keep up appearances. To live at the pace that her friends live renders necessary the steady income of a multi-millionaire. Mrs. Martin does not like to keep house with fewer than fifteen servants. The society woman who cannot afford that number is regarded as a "piker" in the New York swim. It is therefore economical to live in Europe.

Lucky Miss Harvey

Society has been breathing easier since Mrs. Eleanor Martin sent out her invitations to a ball to be given in honor of her niece, Miss Harvey, at the St. Francis. It will be the first ball given at this hotel which is destined to become the scene of many important social affairs. Mrs. Martin has limited her invitations to the younger set, most of the debutantes and a few of the younger married people. Anita Harvey is beating all the debutantes in the number of entertainments given in her honor. Among the important affairs besides Mrs. Martin's ball to be given for her, is a large dinner and theatre party scheduled for the thirtieth by the Walter Martins and the Phelan dinner which, of course, will be a most elaborate function. Mr. Phelan is particularly skilled in the dinner-giving art. As a ceremonious host he is a great success.

Spontaneous Spongitis

It is said that Ah Sing died of a complication of diseases and doctors. The doctors deny that he died of them and the diseases have not been interrogated. Ah Sing came to the County Hospital accompanied by cirrhosis of the liver and appendicitis. He was taken in hand by Drs. Hart, Pruett and Morton, who soon deprived him of his liver and appendix and thereupon declared, upon the authority of medical logic, that a liverless man could not suffer from cirrhosis of that organ and that the elimination of the appendix obviated a recurrence of appendicitis. Nevertheless Ah Sing died. Another surgical operation was necessary to ascertain why he died. Dr. Curry delved into what remained of Ah Sing and announced that death was the result of peritonitis. Now peritonitis is something entirely distinct from cirrhosis of the liver and it is only distantly related to appendicitis. Moreover, the doctors who had cured Ah Sing of his liver and appendix have testified that in their internal explorations they found no evidence of peritonitis in the dips, spurs and angles of Ah Sing's anatomy. Dr. Curry, however, explains that Ah Sing died of a peritonitis acquired subsequent to the removal of his liver and his appendix—an inflammation superinduced by a sponge of sterilized gauze which he found in front of Ah Sing's kidney. At first Dr. Curry thought that the sponge might have been left in Ah Sing by the original surgeons, but these savants have each positively asserted that it is not their habit to leave their surgical tools and implements lying around loose inside of the people on whom they operate. It is clear, therefore, that the change was spontaneous, like the combustion that killed a character in one of Charles Dickens's novels—a possibility strenuously denied by the scientists. Dr. Hart says he lost no sponge in Ah Sing; Dr. Pruett is absolute in his assertion that the sponge attached to Ah Sing's kidney is no part of his paraphernalia; and finally, Dr. Morton declares that he wouldn't be so careless as to leave even a sterilized sponge in a living human carcass. We are therefore forced to the conclusion that Ah Sing died of another of those new diseases that are constantly being discovered by the doctors. For lack of a better name we will call this new disease spontaneous spongitis and we will classify it for the time being with the fungitis ills that flesh is heir to—the mushroom growths of the human viscera. It is regrettable, however, that our learned friend Dr. Sangrado perished before he had opportunity of investigating this new and peculiar ailment.

"Doctor Quack has found that Reggie is suffering from brain fag."

"That doctor would find symptoms of appendicitis in an appendixless man."

When Sansome Street Sits Up

The George Newhalls have become the most picturesque couple in San Francisco. George is about the nattiest man in commerce and Mrs. Newhall is exceedingly chic. She often rides down town, late in the afternoon, in the very smartest of open landaus, and accompanies her husband home from work. The most correct of coachmen is on the box and is at once the envy and admiration of all owners of fine equipages. The spectacle of a smart landau in Sansome street is so unusual that it attracts a large throng of gaping lovers of the spectacular to the front of the Newhall office building when Mrs. Newhall waits for George. When she is joined by her husband they drive briskly away and the inconsiderate small boys frequently make a big sensation of the event. The Newhall home in Pacific avenue is rapidly nearing completion. It will have one of the finest interiors in town, slathers of money being spent on the furnishings. There is to be a big house warming to which will be bidden nearly all of society.

He Intercepted The Mexican

Tom Williams of the California Jockey Club is rapidly becoming one of the richest men in the State. His "gameness" is a valuable asset, and he is always willing to take a chance when a financial proposition appeals to his judgment. Not long ago he met a nephew of President Diaz in this city, and learned that he was en route to Chicago to interest capital in a big slaughter-house concession obtained from the Mexican government. "You don't have to go to Chicago for capital," said Williams; "We have some money in this part of the country." The young Mexican was not partial to Chicago capital. Williams organized a corporation to finance the scheme, and put up one hundred thousand of his own money. I hear that the business promises to be more profitable than the sport of kings, and there are several men about town jubilant over the prospect, for Williams, always alive to the interests of his friends, took a few in on the ground floor.

When you hear Brown say that he dislikes Jones because Jones has a habit of overlooking people it is safe to conclude that the latter is keen of discernment, at least in the matter of Brown.

The Wells-Hanna Engagement

One of the most interesting of society belles is Miss Marie Wells, whose engagement to Mr. Selby Hanna has just been announced. From the moment of her debut Miss Wells became the object of much interest, not only on account of her beauty and her charming manners but because of the graces of her mind which have imparted to her individuality much that distinguishes her from the average young woman in society. A woman of such pleasing personality was bound to receive a great deal of attention from the fashionable beaux, but she did not take them seriously. She was partial to men of talent, and at one time it was rumored that she was engaged to Theodore Wores, the artist. At that time he was painting at Monterey, and Marie Wells and her cousin who was then Miss Oge, now Mrs. Truxtun Beale, were visiting the historic town. He painted the portraits of the two Marias and the picture was shown at a Bohemian Club exhibition. It was subsequently learned that Mr. Wores' interest in Miss Wells was only that of the artist for a charming subject. Of late Miss Wells has devoted herself to intellectual pursuits rather than to social dissipations, and when she met young Mr. Hanna she found in him a man of congenial temperament, one who has broadened his mind in travel, and has tastes that harmonize with her own. Mr. Hanna is a scion of old California stock, and on the death of his father he inherited over half a million dollars which is invested in local real estate. The marriage will take place in January and the young couple will then go abroad. A tea was given in honor of Miss Wells this week by Mrs. G. A. Boyer at 2340 Franklin.

Muffs at the Hopkins

There were several muffs carried at the members' reception at the Hopkins last Thursday night, the opening of the fall art exhibition, and they appeared somewhat out of place as an adjunct to reception toilettes. But as they appear to be the fashion, as picture hats worn with decollete gowns were a few years back, the incongruity will evidently pass unnoticed by the devotees of La Mode. Some very pretty frocks were worn, blue and pink being the favored shades. Maye Colburn looked very modish in a dark blue silk, with an ermine stole and muff, and a hat framed in pink rosebuds. Marie Wells was in pale blue with a chic little hat of the same shade. Miss Eva Withrow, the artist, in a gray brocade and a white poke bonnet, looked like a picture from an 1860 fashion-book.

The Pictures

Though Captain Fletcher considers this exhibition the best showing of pictures seen at the Hopkins for many a day, it is especially remarkable for its freedom from masterpieces. The pictures, while of even excellence, are not conspicuous for original ideas and treatments. Some of the smaller canvases are gems in their way but there is a sameness about them that fatigues. Less technic and more originality is what our artists should strive for. Piazzoni's "Midsummer," Sidney Yard's "Storm," Neuhaus's sketches and the Latimer redwoods, some Halfmoon Bay sketches by Anne Frances Briggs, Alice Chittenden's "Springtime," with the canvases by Neilson, Gamble, Stanton, Willis Davis, Norman St. Clair and some others, make up a good showing of Californian artists. Edith Whitefield has a bit of landscape that is one of the best things, I think, she has ever done. Sandona's group of children's heads does not appeal to the lover of beautiful juveniles, but as character studies the heads are interesting. The miniatures this year are real works of art. The tiny things count for more work than the canvases which are many times their size, but very few appreciate the labor spent upon a miniature portrait. Among the miniaturists exhibiting are Mrs. Franklin K. Lane, Lilla V. O'Ryan, Madame de Junossa, Miss Campbell and Madame Areales. A very beautiful miniature, with Hester Myers as the subject, is the work of Marion Grace Norton, a young girl still in her teens. She shows remarkable talent, and rare refinement in the treatment of her subject.

A Rumored Engagement

There is a faint rumor of an engagement between Leontine Blakeman and Lieutenant McMillan of the army. Most of Miss Blakeman's admirers have been in the army, and more than once her friends have thought that she was about to become the wife of a martial hero. She is the cousin of Ethel Keeney Tomlinson and made her debut in society at the same time as her cousin. They were of the quartet whom Mrs. Salisbury excluded from her dancing club in their first season for no reason except, perhaps, that the Czarina objected to having attention diverted from her proteges. However the four debutantes managed to have a very good time without the assistance of Mrs. Salisbury. Their social status was secure and could not be affected by the whims of the Fortnightly leader.

Peppery Personalities Excite Indignation

Personal journalism is becoming obnoxious to the Berkeley professors, and they have decided to circumscribe the liberty of the press or, at least, of the Daily Californian, the students' official organ, edited by William T. Hale. He has been criticising his superiors in such a peppery fashion as to excite their indignation. He was very severe on Captain Nance for daring to enforce discipline, and he lampooned Professors Setchell, Cory, Jones, Lange and Reiber until they resolved to call a halt.

Determined on Reform in Dress

The Guttersons are singing the swan song of provincialism in Berkeley. It isn't down on the program just that way, but every one who went to the musicale the Freemans recently gave realized that a reform wave was rolling over the college town. Mrs. Freeman, who is patronessing a series of musicales in her beautiful new home, is a cultured citizeness of the world who knows her Paris and London even as San Francisco knows its Burlingame. The sartorial incongruities of Berkeley pained her passion for "good form" and she determined to deal a summary blow to the hit or miss style of dressing—hence the musicales to which the elite of the college town received invitations. Only a clever and daring woman like Mrs. Freeman would have thought of this musical medium as a means of reform. On the invitations in clear, unmistakable type was the mandate, "Evening Dress."

The Burning Question

"Now what does that mean?" was the question that clattered over the teacups, and one curious woman put on her bonnet and went over and asked Mrs. Freeman herself. And the answer, "Decollete gowns for the women and conventional evening dress for the men," made a ripple in the surface of society that was evident even to the outsiders. "But I've never worn a low-neck gown in my life," protested a professor's wife who distinguished herself at one of Mrs. Hearst's dinners by appearing in a walking skirt and shirt-waist. And from dozens of other women went up the same wail. In spite of the string to the invitation every one wanted to go, for Mrs. Freeman is a hostess whose invitations are not to be ignored, and a merry howdy-do there was, slashing into gowns that had been originally built to chastely cover charms—or lack of them. For the first time in present-day history Berkeley elite appeared in conventional dress, with no jarring tailor-made and shirt-waist to rub ribbons with filmy evening gowns. Of a truth there were some rather queer looking costumes, that screeched from every seam that they had been perverted from informal gowns into evening dress, but on the whole the effect was conventionally correct. One vivacious woman raised a gale of amusement when she greeted her hostess by saying briskly, "If I catch my death of cold in this gown, Mrs. Freeman, you'll have to pay the doctor's bills." The few who refused to bare their shoulders wore transparent coverings that were not out of joint with the fiat which had gone forth for evening dress. Mrs. Hearst and Mrs. Wheeler have always set the example of full evening dress at functions that called for such apparel, but the Berkeley smart set, which is largely academic, did not take its cue. But now that they have had it rubbed in, the chances are that sartorial sins will be less frequent at formal affairs.

Berkeley's New Society

Those who believe that snobocracy has no place in a university are giving their hearty approval to a new dramatic organization which Professor Armes is fathering at the University of California. There are several societies of this sort at Berkeley but they all smack of snobbery. The Skull and Keys, which is composed of prominent men and which is interfraternity, gives a play every year, but the histrionic bent of the members is a minor consideration in the Skull and Keys. The Mask and Dagger, which is the co-eds' dramatic organization, is supposed to represent the theatrical talent of the college, but as a matter of fact it initiates only those who have some claim to social distinction at college. Most of the charter members were not sorority girls and it was confidently expected that the taint of snobbishness would not attack the Mask and Dagger. But the feminine slant is a peculiar one and behold! the charter members hastened to elect prominent sorority girls to the organization that the Mask and Dagger might achieve social distinction, forgetting that it was dramatic honor they were seeking. Several girls who have shown decided dramatic ability and have taken prominent parts in all the plays were not bid to the Mask and Dagger. One of the officers of the organization was questioned about the qualifications for membership and she said, "Oh, yes, it's too bad we couldn't take in Miss So-and-So. She certainly has talent, but you know, she dresses so tacky and you see, we're going to give a banquet every year at the Palace hotel, and we want the girls to look swell!"

After Ambitious Talent

The new organization, which has the faculty behind it, will not judge members by a dressmaker's standard, but will employ the best professional coach obtainable to separate the dramatic wheat from the chaff. The work of organizing is being rapidly pushed forward so that everything will be in readiness to give an ambitious production next semester. The fund which has been collected from previous plays given in the Greek Amphitheatre has been placed at the disposal of this organization. Membership in the Skull and Keys, Mask and Dagger, or any other dramatic organization will not disqualify students from joining the new dramatic society, which marks an artistic era in things histrionic at the University of California.

An Incentive to Social Activity

The John D. Spreckelses are taking very little interest in society of late, owing, it is thought, to the feeble health of both J. D. Spreckels and his father. Mrs. J. D. and Lily Spreckels returned from Europe a few days ago, bringing a large assortment of smart frocks, and the probability is that the family will soon emerge from seclusion. There is no joy in smart frocks that are not aired occasionally. Last year the Spreckels girls disappointed their friends by not giving their customary Mi-Careme ball, but those friends now have glad expectations.

Lots of New Cousins

By becoming the wife of William Thompson Huie, last Saturday, Lillie Reis finds herself connected with an immense clan of relatives, embracing the Thorntons, Judges, Thompsons, Brookes and Huies. She will have more cousins than the old woman in the shoe had children, all with pedigrees of prodigious length. One of her cousins by marriage is beautiful Mrs. "Jack" Reis, Belle Brooks that was, and another is Mrs. Abbott Kinney of Southern California. Mrs. Kinney was Marguerite Thornton.

The Voorhieses

The first Assembly dance is to come off on next Monday night. I hear that the invitational list was larger this year than ever before. Mrs. Malcolm Henry had much to do in making out the list and I hear she will be the real manager of the dances, although I believe her name does not appear as one of the patronesses. As Kate Voorhies Mrs. Henry was one of the most popular belles of La Jeunesse (the old Assemblies). She and her sister Marie were in those days mother's aides-de-camp and they made many of the introductions. I hear that Mrs. Henry has made the list of men outnumber that of the girls by some fifty or sixty, so that there will be no wall-flowers. The effort will be made to have the members of the club come early as the dances will only last until about two o'clock. The banquet will remain as it was last year, good but not elaborate. Miss Voorhies's marriage to Captain Young will take place the last day of the year. What with the management of the Assemblies and the Daughters of the Confederacy the Voorhies family have their hands about full.

Banker and Prince Reconciled

It is reported that when Mrs. Will Crocker was in Paris she effected a reconciliation between her husband and her brother-in-law, Prince Poniatowski, and now it is thought probable that the Poniatowskis will return to San Francisco. However, the reconciliation does not mean that Mr. Crocker must back any more of the financial schemes of his brother-in-law. The Prince is a daring operator, a man of brains and grit who conceives big schemes that promise vast returns, and he has a way of presenting them for capitalization purposes that is most alluring. Mr. Crocker, on the other hand, is a very conservative gentleman, who is satisfied with a reasonable interest on an investment secured against moths, thieves and market fluctuations. He is not a plunger. He has not the spirit of the frenzied financier. Loaning money on mortgages is the pawnbrokerage business that appeals to him. Nevertheless Prince Poniatowski brought him under his hypnotic spell, and held him for quite awhile. But when Mr. Crocker grew dizzy signing checks he threw up both hands and backed out of the Poniatowski presence long enough to recover control of himself. Then came the split. The Poniatowskis have taken an apartment in Paris for the winter.

The most innocent looking girl is not always the most unsophisticated.

The Going of The Shiels

Dr. and Mrs. George Franklin Shiels have been much feted on the eve of their departure for New York where they will reside henceforth. Dr. Shiels' decision to move far away from the city of his birth occasioned much surprise among his friends. The supposition is that his wife who is a very charming and intellectual woman, having been long accustomed to the gayer life of Gotham, could not content herself in the provinces.

Listen to the Croakers

Before President Byrne of the Pacific-Union Club started on his travels he was presented with loving cups and other tokens of the esteem in which he is held in the institution over which he presides. His friends in the club have been loud in their acclaim of his wonderful executive ability to which, it has been said, is due the prosperity of the club and many of its most pleasing features. But now President Byrne's ears are probably tingling, for there are croakers in the club who dissent from the panegyrists, and who vulgarly refer to their distinguished Executive as a "false alarm." Since moving into their new quarters they have found that there is little to evoke their enthusiasm and much to justify harsh criticism. Some of the croakers say that they were better housed in the old building which they surrendered to the Union League, and their disapprobation has been stimulated by the information that so great were the expenses incurred that it will be necessary to levy an assessment. There is a storm brewing in the sumptuous home of San Francisco's wealthiest citizens.

Joe Redding's Dinner

At the Bohemian Club dinner given by Mr. Redding last week a very unique and very British menu was enjoyed. There was a heavy soup, fish, a baron of beef and a Yorkshire pudding—and that was all. The dinner was a stag affair and a return compliment to many who have entertained Mr. Redding. The dinner wagon was used and the baron of beef rolled about the Red Room that each guest might choose his portion. The drink was ale and porter mixed. This week Mr. Redding gave a supper party in honor of Maxine Elliott.

"How do you know he married her for her money?"
"Because he couldn't have done so for anything else."

Hobart Loosening Up Again

Dr. Harry Tevis, Mr. and Mrs. Coleman and Mrs. Walter Hobart have returned from their trip to St. Louis. The Hobarts are again occupying their little cottage in San Mateo and they are superintending the construction of their new residence which is directly behind the place that they sold to the Clarks. It is of original and artistic design. The Hobart mine is again paying, and the young capitalist is once more spending his money freely, but not with the prodigal hand that won for him the sobriquet of Prince Fortunatus. He is once more taking an interest in horseflesh and is backing heavily a horse that he has entered in a race against an animal belonging to Lawrence McCreery.

The Bruguere Separation

The story of the separation of the Pedar Bruguieres has been floating through the news channels for several weeks. At the request of those interested, and feeling that probably the young people would kiss and make up, I refrained from giving it publicity. But one of the dailies got hold of it and served it up for popular consumption with trimmings. I believe that Mrs. Bruguere has some misguided friends who thought that a little publicity would do the gay and eccentric Pedar, who has been living in Post street, a world of good. As the young wife enjoys the friendship of her mother-in-law, the probability is that any differences that exist will be healed. The senior Mrs. Bruguere is a most indulgent mother whom it would be hard to convince of an error in the ways of one of her sons. Several months ago the young wife was urged by her mother-in-law to join her in Newport and she did so, and spent several months there with her babe, to whom the grandmother is deeply attached. This babe is an important factor in the domestic affairs of the Bruguieres, for the youngster is a male child, and is therefore qualified to perpetuate the family name. For that reason the senior Mrs. Bruguere is anxious for the restoration of domestic harmony. Bruguere's allowance from his mother is five hundred dollars a month, and half that sum has been going to his wife, who has been living alone with the servants in the big family residence at 1800 Franklin street.

Home From Paris

When Bessie Ames was in Paris, during the visit from which she has just returned, she took a few more lessons on the 'cello. She is a devotee of music, and if she were a poor girl would long since have become a famous concert artist. Wealth is a drawback sometimes, when a great talent is in question. Miss Ames is one of the few society girls who are born musicians. So long as she spurns fame, she confines her interest in her art to practice on her soulful instrument, and to encouraging the members of the Twentieth Century Club to pursue their studies in music. She is one of the most active members of that smart organization, and was in one of the warring factions that threatened to disintegrate the club a few months ago.

Concerning Bertha Runkle

From the December number of Sunset I glean considerable information about Bertha Runkle, author of "The Helmet of Navarre," who is now the wife of Captain Bash of the army, and who was entertained Tuesday evening by the Sequoia Club. She is the daughter of Lucia Gilbert Runkle who was once a leader-writer on the New York Tribune, and who for ten years was the literary adviser of Harper and Brothers. In 1893 she undertook, with Charles Dudley Warner, the enormous labor which is represented in the thirty volumes of "The World's Best Literature." Mrs. Runkle first learned that her daughter had literary talent by the discovery of a poem written by the latter which was at once ordered into "The World's Best Literature." Miss Runkle was a school girl when she wrote the poem which has given her rank among the people whose work is included in those thirty volumes. As I have never read the poem or sought for the world's best literature in those thirty volumes, I am unable to say whether Mrs. Bash's verse enhances the value of the enormous collection, or that its inclusion is prima facie evidence of its merit. By the way, there are many interesting things in the December Sunset. The magazine is redolent of the Christmas flavor and contains several good stories by Californian authors. Rufus M. Steele has written a

"The Runkles"

The Sequoia Club gave a very jolly reception to Bertha Runkle and her husband, Captain Bash, or as they are called, "The Runkles." I do not know whether Captain Bash will ever follow the example of Fritz Scheff's husband by changing his name to that of his wife, but it doesn't matter, for people have changed it for him. Such is the fate of the husband of the woman of fame. Foxy Ned Greenway said that one reason why he never called Fritz Scheff his own and only was that he was afraid to become known as Mr. Greenway-Scheff, for then he might be mistaken for a beer drummer instead of a champagne agent. But to return to the Sequoia: Mrs. Bash looked very pretty in a frock of white muslin and lace, and carried a large bouquet of American beauty roses. She is a most unliterary looking person, and is more like a society woman than a writer of best-sellers. The officers of the Sequoia wanted to make the reception a bohemian affair but some of the women appeared in their prettiest costumes. Miss Bell, the hostess of the evening, wore a handsome white frock; Miss Ednah Robinson was very stunning in a cream lace gown with black gloves and black hat; Georgie Spieker, one of the prettiest girls in the room, wore a pink embroidered frock with a large picture hat. After all had shaken hands with the Runkles they adjourned to the supper room, where a Dutch supper was served. Captain and Mrs. Bash are going to Manila next week, and she will soon publish another book. I hear that her publishers, who long advertised her as an infant prodigy, are sorry that she married, but perhaps it is for the best. Gertrude Atherton once said that a little matrimony is essential to literary success.

Foretell a Tragedy

A singularly interesting light has been thrown on the tragic death of Nellie Gore in Paris by the publication of the letters she wrote during the last months of her life. More than anything else, in the way of evidence offered to the various commissions that inquired into the cause of her death, they bear out the statement of her husband that "She was a woman of the very highest ideals, incapable of wrong-doing, passionately fond of her art and devoted to it." All Mrs. Gore's Alameda friends have steadfastly stood by this declaration ever since the world-wide publicity of her mysterious death was given to the papers. The letters tell in simple, direct fashion of her ambition in music, of her hopes and struggles and of her first meeting with the famous Russian baritone, de Redzewski, in whose rooms she was shot. In part they lead one almost up to the moment of that unhappy event.

Meeting with the Russian

Four years ago she left California for New York and Paris. Of the prospect she wrote to her aunt here: "I go to the land of strangers, and yet to the home of art. Dearest, it is destiny," and she goes on to tell of her long, hard struggles up to the meeting with de Redzewski, in August, 1902. Here is her story: "They got up a little concert last night in the parlor in celebration of my birthday. Mr. Redzewski, a Russian opera singer, sang some big arias in a wonderful way. He is a big artist, first baritone in the Imperial theatre of St. Petersburg, and has received medals and decorations from the Czar and Czarina. His art seems to be all his life. He takes a lesson every day with a great teacher here, and the other day he was kind enough to invite me to go with him to his lesson. He is to sing 'Damon,' a new opera with which they open the St. Petersburg season, two weeks from now. He left this morning." In a later letter she says: "I often hear from Mr. Redzewski. He is greatly pleased and excited because he has sung with great success before the Czar, and because the Government is going to give him money to travel and study for a year. He will be in Paris within a week. He is a big man, over six feet high, and is twenty-five years old. I believe some people are created with a talent for feeling, as others are given the gift of speech, or color, or sound. I know when I have heard him sing some of his big roles I have felt myself in the presence of a great spirit—a creature capable of unutterable feeling. I must be careful. Passionate men like that are dangerous. I do not mean that there is any danger of my losing my head over him or any one, but he might become desperate over me; for he seems to have fallen madly in love with me. I have received some very beautiful letters from him—always in French, as he knows nothing of English." In her next letter she says that de Redzewski has written to her and suggested that he take rooms in the same pension with her. She answered him that if he did it would be against her wishes and that if he insisted she would be put to the trouble of moving. Her last letter seems o'ercast with the great impending shadow of her life. "This week has been a very dark one for me. I am feeling horribly depressed—not personally, but for all mankind. All our efforts, all our strivings seems so petty and so vain. I have spent two days in a dreadful torment of doubt until I realized that my salvation lay in an absolute faith of our immortality."

De Redzewsky's Story

The letters disclose the fact that the Russian proposed marriage to her and that she refused him. Their comradeship, however, kept up to the last eventful day. De Redzewski fell sick in his apartments with throat troubles. She wrote to him inquiring about his health. A little later he sent a hurried telegram to her and kept calling the maid to inquire if there had been any response to his message. Some four hours later, Mrs. Gore, wearing a thick veil and muffled in furs, arrived. What happened thereafter no one but the Russian knows. Nearly an hour later there came the muffled report of a pistol and de Redzewski threw open the door and cried, "The poor girl has shot herself." Mrs. Gore was found lying on the foot of the bed, her furs, gloves and veil removed and a mortal wound immediately above her right eye. The Russian explained that Mrs. Gore was sitting on the foot of his bed when he reached over to a near by table to pick up some medicine. Accidentally he tipped off a revolver which fell to the floor and was discharged, the bullet striking Mrs. Gore. Consul-General Gowdy at an American commission investigated all the facts and came to the conclusion that Mrs. Gore's death was accidental. A grave was leased for her in the Bagneaux cemetery for five years, and there she lies buried. At her funeral there was no mourner, no pall-bearer, not even a strain of the music she loved so well. De Redzewski himself was absent. And now these letters are given to the world to show that the little Alameda girl, Nellie Stogdill, afterwards Nellie Gore, was far, far from being the kind of woman that de Redzewski implied.

The Reason Why

Very few understood why the Eells-Babcock wedding was solemnized in the afternoon, except the simple reason that afternoon weddings are the correct caper this season. But the real reason was that the sun shines very brightly and beautifully through Trinity's stained glass windows in the afternoon, and to any one who studies artistic effects it is the best time for a "picture" wedding. The Eells-Babcock marriage was a military affair, and so the bride decided that the afternoon was the best time for the sun to bring out artistic effects in gold lace and yellow gowns. The bridesmaids were well paired, too, the tall ones walking first, and the shorter ones following in the order of their height.

The marriage of Marie Voorhies and Captain Young will also be an afternoon function.

Pillsbury's Big Pull

Mr. E. S. Pillsbury, who is reputed to have the most lucrative law practice in San Francisco, is soon to have the most commodious law offices in this neck of the woods. I hear that he is to occupy the whole top floor of the Union Trust building. He will then have headquarters approximating in size the law offices of the big corporation attorneys of New York. He has a larger corporation practice than any other attorney in this city, and I believe that a great deal of it is derived through his connection with the Standard Oil Company, of which he is the legal representative on this coast. The supposition is that when a litigant hires a Standard Oil attorney he has availed himself of about all the pressure that intellect and cunning can bring to bear on the courts. Some months ago there arrived in this city, from New York, a young man intent upon instituting a big will contest. He knew nobody connected with the local bar, but before he left New York he was told to inquire for the Standard Oil lawyer and hire him. Mr. Pillsbury is now his representative.

The J. B. Schroeders will give a large tea this afternoon in honor of Miss Eugenie Hawes, at the Hotel Pleasanton, where they are located for the winter.

An Artistic Wedding

Laura Prather, the Oakland miniature painter whose marriage with Guy Waterbury of Sacramento was celebrated on Thanksgiving night, has lately made her home with her sister, Mrs. Harrison Clay. When the wedding date was set, the bride stipulated that the affair should be carried out to suit her own ideas. The artist made a setting of trellised walls and clambering vines, with drooping tendrils, as a background for her miniatures, from General Shafter to pretty Mrs. Miller, each portrait framed in a wreath of roses. The effect was charming. And the bride's gown was another artistic note, a French effect that might have been worn by a Marquise of Marie Antoinette's time.

Roberta in Honolulu

It is hinted that Roberta Clay may not return to Berkeley, unless for the purpose of preparing her trousseau. The rumor is wafted from faraway Honolulu that a young medico of Hawaii has won the heart and the promise of the hand of the Allen C. Clays' pretty daughter. Miss Clay is visiting her sister, Mrs. Eckert, and is having a delightful time. At a recent ball given by the Japanese consul, in honor of the Emperor's birthday, she is said to have been the most sought after young woman among the guests. The consul's wife was the only Japanese woman present who danced and the only one of her nation who was in European dress, wearing an elaborate French costume. The affair, at which Prince Fushimi was present, nearly led to trouble between the Japanese colony and the people of other nations, I hear. The Japanese, who number over sixty thousand in the territory, thought that this dance in honor of their Emperor and his son should have been confined to their own people and not have been made the occasion for a general jubilation. One of the ball's features was a "singing lancers," when every one sang "Old King Cole" and the rest of the nursery ditties.

Absorptionists of Oakland

There is a movement stirring in Oakland to create a Greater San Francisco. For a long time the people of Oakland have chafed under the burden of double taxation for the maintenance of city and county officials; they have long complained of the expense of building and repairing roads they never use; and they have frequently expressed the opinion that there was a manifest injustice in compelling them to assume all the expense of the municipality while property owners living within reach of all the advantages of a city's public utilities were exempt from a share of the tax. It is argued by these progressive citizens that if they were absorbed into San Francisco they would pay less for the joy of living and at the same time vastly enhance their civic dignity.

Greater San Francisco

This matter of civic dignity is a very important element in the calculations of the Absorptionists. They feel that they have outgrown their village small clothes. They yearn for the trousers of a metropolitan manhood. The very name "Oakland" is distasteful in the hearing of these citizens commuting to and fro between "the city" and their sleeping-places. "Oakland!" they mutter; "a place of oaks! The name of a hamlet! Besides, it is a misnomer, for there are no oaks." As a part of San Francisco they would share in the destiny of that rising young metropolis—they would contribute a population of nearly a hundred thousand to the half million of that city and they would thus assist "Greater San Francisco" to a high place in the roll of American cities. It is a noble ambition and it would be almost unanimous were it not for the small fry politicians and the petty office holders. These parasites on the body politic naturally oppose any plan for the betterment of civic conditions that involves the lessening of the tax rate upon which they feed, uttering ever the cry of the daughters of the horse leech, "Give! Give!"

They Long for Mills

The attendance at the First Unitarian church of Oakland has been falling off at an appalling rate, and as usual the pastor is blamed for the apathy of his flock. This is the church in which people were wont to hang on the words of "B. Fake" Mills, as the irreverent reporters dubbed him. He developed a keen appetite for sensationalism in his congregation. He left Oakland for a wider field, and was succeeded by Rev. William Jones, a conservative gentleman, who is deemed too prosaic by the admirers of Mills. They want more red blood and stage thunder in their sermons, and as Mr. Jones has been unable to thrill them they have been drifting away. Some of them have become Methodists, others have been finding diversion at the Episcopal church, while not a few have been devoting more time to the yellow journals which are reminiscent of Mills. They all long for Mills to return and pose in the pulpit once more, for they cannot stand unadulterated Unitarian doctrine. Those that have remained steadfast appreciate Mr. Jones for his sincerity.

The Inconsiderate Oakland Female

Any one happening along Eleventh street in Oakland on the Wednesday afternoons that Professor Henry Morse Stephens, of the University of California, delivers his brilliant lectures on the French Revolution, would think that there was a society function on at Chabot Observatory. Carriages, with liveried coachmen and footmen, are at the curb, proudly proclaiming to Oakland that the well-known owners of the equipages are "literary." But not even a Stephens lecture can hold the impatient female Oaklander in her seat after she has become satisfied that her literary pose has been remarked. The Oakland commuter is always constrained to get out and catch something; if it isn't a train or a boat it is a cold or a bit of gossip. Last Thursday it was a tea, and the lecture was not half over before the fashionable ones began climbing over one another. There were in all about twenty who left in this way for that afternoon tea, and each girl and young matron rustled her taffeta lined gown in the same disturbing way. Professor Stephens stopped, as the last one wended her way from the front row of seats to the back exit, and cast an ireful glance over his glasses. I hoped that he was going to say what he thought—but he did not. He showed himself a very patient man.

In Vindication of His Honor

Oakland has been taking more than a desultory interest in a salacious divorce case that was on trial several days, behind closed doors, during this and last week. The case attracted attention not only on account of the salacity of the testimony, which the Oakland dailies published despite the closed doors, but because of the prominence of the people involved. The plaintiff is Professor Ross H. Van Horn of Berkeley, who charged his wife with adultery, Adolph Knopf, a student at the State University, being named as co-respondent. Mrs. Van Horn is a woman about forty-five years of age, and she has a daughter attending the university. Professor Van Horn summoned a number of witnesses to vindicate his honor at the sacrifice of his family's fair name, and to the humiliation and shame of his innocent daughter. He testified to having hidden behind portieres in his house, where he witnessed a very passionate love scene between his wife and the student, and he produced two female hawkshaws who gave damaging evidence against the defendant. Superior Judge Bell of Seattle is the brother of Mrs. Van Horn and he appeared as her attorney. During the trial he said that a man who confessed that he saw and heard a man attempting to seduce his wife, and made no effort to protect her, should not be permitted to testify in any court in Christendom. Mrs. Van Horn flatly contradicted all the testimony given against her, and charged her husband with having agreed to withdraw the suit for money. I am at a loss to understand how Professor Van Horn expected to emerge from the case triumphantly.

I hear that Geraldine Bonner, finding herself unable to endure the Italian climate, is soon to return to California. In her own State, she succeeds best in absorbing "atmosphere" for her stories of Californian life, and now that "The Pioneer" is soon to be issued, she is to start on another novel.

The Tortoni Episode

The whole tenderloin was on a broad grin when it learned of the revocation of the Tortoni restaurant license, and read that Chief Wittman had long ago warned the French restaurant keepers to metamorphose their festive establishments into resorts for the pure and passionless. How unsophisticated those police officials are! They have absolute confidence in Chief Wittman, and they believe that Signor Constantini of the Maison Tortoni is the only French restaurant keeper who permits his head waiter to supply his patrons with company for dinner. Yet our French restaurants are famous even in Paris for their unconventional hospitality. It is known even in Oshkosh that there is nothing like them in the world beyond the county limits of San Francisco. This community has acquiesced in its French restaurants for nearly half a century. They are the repositories of the genuine, blown-in-the-bottle atmosphere of San Francisco. As irrevocably identified with the city as its hills and fog, they are more picturesque than the former and as great a tonic to the o'er-wrought system as the banks of damp that waft in from the ocean. They are the whispered boast of many of our leading, upright citizens who point to them with pride when reciting the exceptional features that invite the stranger to our hospitable metropolis. True, they do not foster a highly moral tone, but at any rate they take better care of vice than any other institution I know of, and they have demonstrated that reputation depends somewhat on altitude. But why draw the line at Tortoni's?

Club Feasts

Scarcely a day passes without a formal dinner or luncheon at the St. Francis, by some society leader or other, or a woman's club. Last Saturday the Mills College Alumnæ lunched there, Miss Vivian Haight acting as toast-mistress. The large gold and white dining-room presented an animated scene, with all the beautifully gowned women gathered about the chrysanthemum-decked table. Among the Alumnæ present were Miss Nutting, Miss Holbrook, Mrs. Searles, Miss Edwards, Mrs. McNear, Miss Gray, Miss Martin, Mrs. Taylor and Miss Wilson. On Monday the Amouret Club gave a dinner at the St. Francis, which was a very genial affair.

Why She Severed the Strings

A Los Angeles correspondent writes me that the Senatorial contest has been responsible for an awful fuss in the dignified and highly proper Ebell Club of that city. The club's building stock has been selling slowly, and it was suggested that prospective buyers were intimidated by the conditional deed to the property held by Mrs. Robert J. Burdette. At a recent meeting of the club Mrs. Burdette showed her magnanimity by tearing up the agreement and declaring that all strings on the property had been severed. According to the gossips of the club the incident grew out of Republican politics. The Rev. Mr. Burdette is a Bard supporter, and the mother of Frank Flint is an active member of Ebell, so factional strife has been warm.

They Traded Places

Major Con M. Perkins, U. S. Marine Corps, has so far recovered from his recent illness that he has been able to leave the Navy Hospital at Mare Island and go to his home in Berkeley. Major Perkins's early experience in the service was somewhat peculiar. He was graduated in the class of 1881, the first class to feel the weight of the iniquitous Robeson bill of 1882, reducing the number of officers in the navy. Perkins was a cadet-midshipman, but the peculiar workings of the bill placed him, not in the line, but in the engineer corps, and of marine engineering Perkins did not know any too much. A year later, Charles E. Rommel, who had been trained as a cadet-engineer, was graduated and placed, not in the engineer corps, but in the marine corps. He too was out of his element. Perkins got into correspondence with Rommel, and the two made joint representations to the Navy Department, with the result that a trade was made, Rommel being commissioned an assistant engineer and Perkins a second lieutenant of marines. While such trades have been not uncommon in the army, I believe this to have been the only one of the kind in the history of the navy.

Captain Robert McMillan Dutton, of the Marines, a well known native son of California, has been ordered up for examination for promotion to the grade of Major, which no one who knows the Captain has any doubt of his passing with credit, for he is one of the best officers in the service. He has recently been on duty at Mare Island, but obtained leave of absence and made a short trip abroad, from which he has just returned, and he is now living in Philadelphia, where the examination will take place.

A Belated Change of Opinion

After five years of experience, the Navy Department has come to the opinion, long held by many outside of the navy, that it cannot get along without engineer officers. When, in 1899, the long waged war between staff and line was compromised by the amalgamation of the line and the engineer corps, or rather, the absorption of the latter by the former, those whose minds were not prejudiced foresaw trouble, which has been experienced from the start. The line officers made poor engineers and the engineers, as a general thing, poor line officers. In most cases the machinery of our warships has been saved from serious deterioration only by the employment of warrant machinists, practical men, who stand the watches and look after things generally in the engine room. Engineer-in-Chief C. W. Rae has recommended the re-establishment of the engineer corps, and he is right. Rae himself has not the reputation of being an efficient engineer, but he has executive ability, and intelligence enough to discover and remedy faults, and to avail himself of the talents of others. It is related of him that his immaculate attire at all times seems incongruous to a friend of his, who could not reconcile such a Beau Brummel as Rae with the grime and grease of engine and fire-rooms. "You are too much of a swell to be an engineer," said this friend. "Oh, no," Rae is said to have answered, "I can tell the others what to do."

A new club is the Cooee, having for its object the uniting for social purposes of Australians and New Zealanders living in San Francisco. On Wednesday night of last week the Cooees were entertained by one of the members, Mrs. Isidore Myers, at her residence in Sutter street.

The Way It Happened

BY RICHARD VALENTINE.

When Meta married Alester Norris she knew she was by no means the first woman he had loved. Indeed, she would not have loved him so well had she not known him to be a master in the court of Cupid. She would never have believed him had he asseverated, as is the manner of men, that she, and she alone, was the only woman he had ever loved. He did not commit this mistake, for he knew the manner of woman with whom he had to deal. It was sufficient for Meta that he cared enough for her to ask her to marry him.

When her intimate friends warned her that she was about to commit her future happiness to a man who was celebrated throughout the length and breadth of his social set for his fickleness, Meta turned off their croaking admonitions with a laugh.

"If I am not attractive enough to keep my husband true to me," she said, "then I deserve to lose him."

Yet Meta was by no means without jealousy. No woman who really loves a man can be absolutely free from that. She would have to be formed of stone not to feel a pang of wounded feeling if the man she loves shows his preference for another woman before her eyes. There are different kinds of jealousy, that of noble, and of mean natures. Meta was not wholly noble, nor was she mean. She was a woman, that is all; an average woman of wide mind and warm heart. And she loved Alester Norris.

After they had toured the State, on their honeymoon trip, they settled down for the summer and autumn at their ranch in the southern part of California. Norris was a novelist, and usually turned out a "seller" about once a year. He had a small but comfortable income that insured him from the necessity of turning out "pot-boilers," and he confidently expected to become famous some day. He was a keen observer, and nobody could depict a love scene with quite the power, so said the critics, that Norris sketched his. The women of his social set said that he turned his own experiences into copy, but Norris was not such a cad as that. He may have gained inspiration from his own experiences, but everybody has a right to seek inspiration where he can best find it. The women who had enjoyed love affairs with Norris as the hero used to search through his stories for pictures of themselves, and were flattered when they found something they thought fitted their case.

When Norris was in town, he was lionized and as he was a genial chap, with nothing of the poseur about him, he was very popular. When he married, his popularity did not appear to have suffered thereby, but then perhaps that was because his women friends, those who fancied they were the inspiration of his exquisite love stories, were buoyed up by the hope that his truant fancy would not remain long moored to his fireside.

There was one woman, however, who felt much cut-up when Norris married. She was a rich girl, no longer in the twenties, who dabbled in literature and painting and music, without taking a very serious interest in any of the arts. She had a penchant for lions, especially writers like Alester Norris, and she had long nursed a platonic friendship for Norris. At one time he had been deeply epros with Miss Horton, but she would give him nothing to feed his ardor upon, and so their intercourse had lapsed into the merely friendly. Miss Horton was one of those women who like to talk freely of love and passion, but she did not care to investigate the subjects in a practical way. Nevertheless, when she heard that her platonic friend was to marry, she felt aggrieved. There was no reason why she should be aggrieved, but she was. She had the real dog-in-the-manger feeling about Alester Norris's marrying anybody but herself. She had not permitted him to make love to her, but she did not think it was right that anybody else should receive that love. He had always told her that he could not do without her, for she was his best critic, his best inspiration, and all the other nice things a man knows how to say to the woman who is interested in him and his work.

Miss Horton had grown to believe that Alester Norris would rather have her for a friend than any other woman for a sweet-heart and wife. She did not take into account the fact that Norris was not a stone like herself; there were red corpuscles in his veins, whatever there were in hers.

She sent the bride a conventional note of good wishes, and an expensive gift. Then she waited for Norris to come back to her. She felt sure he would. What man could be satisfied with a mere wife, when such a friend as herself was willing to forgive his momentary insanity and aberration, and still accord to him her mental inspiration?

However, Norris did not return to town. How could he, when he and Meta were so happy on the ranch, and he had a new book under way, the book he knew was to be his masterpiece? He might never have thought of Miss Horton again, had it not been for wicked old Uncle Sam. What a lot of sins old Sam has to answer for: what a deal of mischief he makes in this world! A letter came for the master of the ranch. He read it, and hastily crammed it into his coat-pocket. Meta and he were walking through the orchard when the China-boy brought the mail. Now had he not put the letter away so quickly, Meta would not have given it another thought. But the act savored of a desire for secrecy, at least so she thought. She said nothing, but she meditated a great deal.

When they returned to the house, and Alester discarded his coat for a light jacket, and went to work on his new novel, Meta did a dreadful deed. It seemed worse to her because she had never done such a thing before. She would not have done it now had she not felt herself impelled to the act by the desire to regain peace of mind. She held the coat in her hands for several minutes before she could bring herself to extract the letter from the pocket. A burning blush suffused her cheeks as she finally nerved herself to the deed. She seized the letter, and throwing the coat back upon the chair where its owner had tossed it, she hastened to her room.

Now Miss Horton was emotional — on paper — though at other times she held her emotions so well in check that no man had ever dared, or perhaps cared, to kiss more than her hand. In her epistolary efforts she was all she was not at other times. The letter that Meta Norris read, with bated breath and tears very near the surface, was a masterpiece in its way. Miss Horton knew to whom she was writing, and brought to bear on her epistle all the brilliancy of her well-trained mind, and what little warmth there was in her well-schooled heart. To Meta, in that mass of epigrams and its evidence of culture, she herself seemed to fade away into insignificance. To be sure, she had known that her husband was the friend of many women more brilliant than the one he had chosen for his wife. She remembered what she had said when her intimates warned her against marrying him. But at this moment all she could grasp was the fact of the letter in which Miss Horton, the rich, clever Miss Horton, mentioned the "old days," and jargoned about "mental telepathy" and their "mutual mentalities."

She put the letter back in the coat-pocket, but she could not put away the thoughts with which it had encumbered her mind. All through dinner, and the evening when Alester read and she was also supposed to be reading, she was thinking of what she had deprived her husband in taking from him that soul-friend. The next day, on an impulse dictated by her love for Alester, she wrote a letter to Miss Horton. After it was posted, she felt better, and was her old gay self for the rest of the day. As with her husband she prepared for an afternoon drive, she said, with an effort to make the remark fall naturally:

"I have sent to ask a woman to visit us next week."

"So soon?" asked Alester, in surprise. "Why, darling, are you lonely already?"

"I thought you might be," she answered. "You know I am not very clever, and you are used to having people about you who can give you inspiration for your books."

"You know better," he returned, giving her a kiss, though the trap was at hand, and the stable-boy an interested looker-on, "but if you want some one to keep you company when I am busy at my desk, bring her down, by all means."

Meta could not summon courage to tell him then who the coming guest was, but she resolved to do so as soon as the wire should arrive from Miss Horton. What a lovely surprise I am preparing for Alester, she thought—and there was a tinge of gratified pride in the thought that she was such a self-sacrificing wife. What other woman would bring a former rival to her home, before the honeymoon was well over?

A day or so later the message came. Miss Horton would be delighted, and would be down as fast as train could fetch her. Miss Horton, by the way, of course believed the invitation instigated by Norris himself. How could she fancy otherwise? Her heart glowed with pleasure as she packed her trunk, and mused on the delight of mental inspiration in store for her.

"She's coming in two days," announced Meta, when the wire arrived.

"All right," answered Alester, "and now I suppose you'll have a great time talking town gossip, and fall styles. Who is she, by the way? You forgot to tell me, didn't you?"

"It is Miss Horton," replied his wife, calmly, but searching his face for evidence of emotion.

The emotion showed, but not the kind Meta expected.

"The deuce it is," he said, with a touch of wrath in his natural surprise, "and what is she coming down here for?"

"I thought you missed her inspiring ideas," responded Meta, "and so I wrote her to come and pay us a visit—short, if she likes, or long, if she enjoys country life."

Now when Norris received Miss Horton's letter, at first he had felt a pang of regret that their platonic intercourse could not be renewed. He really missed her sometimes, for no other woman had ever quite so well understood him as she did. She had given him many good ideas for his novels, and her friendship had spurred him to do many things that he might otherwise never have felt sufficient ambition to accomplish. But he had given her up when he married. He did not care to have her again a part of his life. Meta, if not so clever, was more satisfying. She inspired him by her love and trust alone to do well what he had in hand. He resented the coming of what he felt would be a discordant element into his household.

He was a man of action. There was only one way to deal with the situation. The morning of the day that Miss Horton was to arrive, Alester rose early, packed a small grip, and slipped from his room and the house without waking a soul.

When Meta awoke the sun was high. Her heart was not in a singing mood, for she was conscious that her experiment was, to say the least, risky. It might mean the end of her life's happiness. However, it was her own plan, and its results would be upon her own head.

As she prepared to brush out her long dark hair, a little note, pinned to the pin-cushion, caught her eye.

Her heart gave a frightened flutter. All sorts of forebodings filled her breast. She tore the note from the cushion, and opened it. It was in Alester's handwriting.

"My dear little wife," he wrote, "I can't prevent your inviting your friends to invade our paradise, since it is yours as well as mine. But I must refuse to have my work disturbed—you know I am now at work on my Opus. Since you feel the need of Miss Horton's companionship, why, darling, enjoy it as long as you like. But I am going to town for awhile. Let me know when your guest finds the country monotonous and goes away.—Alester."

In Financial Circles

The week's business on the Stock and Bond Exchange may be called highly satisfactory. Transactions in Bonds show an increase of 200 per cent, aggregating $448,000; in shares 15,110, as follows: 950 Lighting, 725 Spring Valley Water, 1,040 Miscellaneous, and 12,395 Sugars. In the Miscellaneous group there were improvements throughout, Gas and Electric advancing about 2 1-2 points, Alaska Packers' Association about 3 points. The Lighting situation remains unchanged. The much talked of Eastern opposition to the old company has not advanced beyond the "paper" state. Alaska Packers' Association showed a little more strength. The Advisory Committee has evolved a plan to relieve the financial stress of the company, which has been accepted by the banks, and the company ought to be in fair shape now to prosecute its heretofore highly successful business. Transactions in Sugars bore out all my previous predictions. Hawaiian Commercial, while not fully maintaining its highest figures, showed considerable activity. Makaweli came in for a good deal of attention; all offers to sell were readily taken up. Onomea advanced to $33 on a rumor of an increased dividend. Pauhau scored another advance to $19.3-4. Hutchinson and Honokaa were strong and active. I can only reaffirm my former opinion on the Sugar stocks.

"Double Harness," Anthony Hope's brilliant and absorbing novel of "married Londoners," which has been appearing serially in Munsey's Magazine, runs through its second installment in the Sunday Call Magazine tomorrow. This novel, which is the strongest work yet done by the author of "The Prisoner of Zenda" and "Rupert of Hentzau," will be published complete in four installments. Another feature of interest will be the publication of the second fifty-dollar prize story, "The Clutch of Talons," written by Mark Roy Daniels, a senior at the University of California. The second lesson in the Sunday Call's free music lessons will appear. These lessons are the invention of W. Scott Grove of Scranton, Pa., and have been received throughout the East as a thoroughly practical and remarkable short cut to proficiency on the piano. Other features of interest will be "Jottings of Old Lim Junkin," by Opie Read; "On and Off the Bread Wagon," by Charles Dryden; "The Ways of a Man With a Maid," by Kate Thyson Marr; "What Women Want to Know," by Madge Moore; the book page, by Robert W. Ritchie; the puzzle page, and many short stories.

John Strange Winter (Mrs. Stannard) is the latest literary recruit to the cult of Christian Science. There is no accounting for vagaries.

Literary Californians and ex-Californians promise to be very much in evidence in the near future. There is not one of any prominence who has not a book either in press or well on towards completion, while the preliminary announcement of contributors to the Century Magazine for 1905 includes Jack London, Kate Wiggin, Miriam Michelson, Mary Hallock Foote, E. W. Townsend, Philip V. Mighels, Bailey Millard, and others less well known.

As Beauty Does

Whatever else may be thought of Clyde Fitch, it must be admitted that he is wonderfully felicitous in fitting a play to a personality. He has a genius for that sort of thing. The composer who suits his music to his theme, nor the tailor who drapes with an artistic sense of the imperfections of a figure, is more adept in his art than the playwright who supplies dramas for the expression of the individuality of histrionic stars. "Her Own Way," the play which has introduced Maxine Elliott to us as a star, is, in a measure, a dramatization of the beautiful lady herself. It imposes on her no great effort. She is merely called upon to be herself, and she does that very well. Hers is a pleasing personality and its exploitation is an entertaining diversion. Her art is expressed in the portrayal of all the emotions of the woman with a passion, who loves, suffers and rejoices. And Maxine Elliott does portray those emotions with exquisite art. Her performance has blitheness, tenderness, coquetry and a deep human note. It is only in that scene in the third act when she is overwhelmed with mental torture, as a result of the revelations of the brother to whom she is devoted, that she fails to rise to the demands of a situation. In that scene her affectation of emotion is far from realistic. It is positively tame. The actress seems to lack the temperament for intense emotionalism, but in no other respect does the play test her capacity for artistic expression. Her physical charms have in them a delight that would compensate for more imperfections than could be charged against her acting, and unlike other beauties of the stage, she never betrays self-consciousness. On Tuesday night she was made up as though it were her purpose to render her beauty as inconspicuous as possible. She was altogether too florid and was not seen at her best. And, by the way, there is one bit of business in the play that might lead to the impression that the beautiful Maxine desired to convince people that nature had not been so kind to her as they imagined. I refer to the letting down of her tresses, and the disclosing of the fact that they were somewhat scant. In "Her Own Way" Mr. Fitch has done something better than usual. Many of Fitch's plays have proved to be gold-bricks. He doesn't husband his resources, and there are too many of his plays, good, bad and indifferent, dribbling from his pen to the stage. I have seen him at his worst and at his best, and I consider "Her Own Way" a happy medium. It tells a good story, somewhat far-fetched, but it holds your interest and raises an occasional frog in your throat. The intentional humor of it, emanating from the lady hairdresser, effectively played by Georgie Lawrence, is of a better quality than Fitch usually gives us. The hairdresser is a fine characterization, and her lines are daintily satirical. But there is a comic note in the play that is decidedly discordant. I refer to the awful agony of the Carley family over the fearful prospect of a struggle for bread on a measly capital of half a million dollars. Sensible as I am of the fact that modern fortunes that do not run into eight figures are sneered at by the plutocracy, still I cannot sympathize with people who have only five hundred thousand with which to defy the wolf. However we must not take Fitch seriously. His be the task to lampoon the plutocracy, and so long as he gives us atmosphere and a few amusing characterizations, let us not quibble over the material he employs. I can even forgive him for his introduction of four children that talk like phonographs. I could probably reconcile myself to the minor shortcomings more readily if the play were in better hands. When I heard Mr. R. C. Herz in the role of Steven Carley exclaim, "I am rotten! I am rotten," I wondered whether Manager Dillingham had deliberately suited the actor to the lines.

Theodore Bonnet..

"The Taming of Helen"

When I saw "The Taming of Helen" at the Columbia, I had some doubts as to how it would act in other hands than those of Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin. It is such a light comedy, with all its sympathetic embroidery woven about the character of the large-hearted young actress, that only actors of suitable temperament could be trusted to play its many roles. But the production of the Davis comedy at the Majestic compares very favorably with the performance by the players from New York, and most of the scenery is identical with that used at the Columbia. While Miss Block is not gifted with the lightness of touch that characterized Miss Anglin's portrayal of Marion Cavendish, nevertheless she manages to infuse into the role much sympathetic feeling. Gould is admirable as Philip and Miss Esmond's

Helen is one of the best things in the production. Gilmour as the theatrical manager, Mestayer as Reginald Herbert, and Miss Gordon as Mrs. Evian, all bring out the best points in their parts. There is a very long cast, and Claudia Rogers appears as one of the actresses at the Imperial theatre, a part one step above a thinking role. George Woodward, as the doorkeeper at the Imperial, deserves a word of praise all to himself, for his excellent acting. The production as a whole is enjoyable, its only fault being a lack of finish, which is pardonable in a stock company making a change of bill every week. I notice a very good rule appended to the Majestic's programs. It is a reflection on our breeding, perhaps, that the rule should be thus printed—but alas! it was necessary:

"Out of consideration for those sitting behind them, ladies will kindly refrain from putting on their hats or arising in their seats until the final fall of the curtain."

Irene Outtrim

Irene Outtrim, the Tivoli's new soubrette, is an Australian singer, said to be a real English beauty of graceful figure and magnetism. Her American debut will be made as Annette in "King Dodo." Miss Outtrim on her native heath, I am told, was counted one of the most talented actresses and singers in Victoria. A native of Bright, she was brought up in an atmosphere that partook but slightly of the stage, but at the age of fifteen made her debut as "Morgiana" in the English pantomime "The Forty Thieves." Four years ago she appeared in Melbourne at Her Majesty's theatre as Seibel in "Faust," and was then engaged as a principal by Williams & Musgrove, the theatrical magnates of Australia.

The Alameda Lustspiel Ensemble will give its first German performance this season at the Columbia on Sunday night, in the new Blumenthal Kadelburg comedy, "Grossstadtluft." The cast will be one of the best possible.

Arthur Dunne first came into prominence as an eccentric comedian in Dave Henderson's spectacular production of "Sinbad." I remember seeing him at the Baldwin. He was the Old Man of the Sea, and carried away a large part of the honors of the piece from Eddie Foy, who was supposed to be the leading funny man.

Burton Holmes, the traveler, will lecture before the Tuesday Club of Sacramento and the Home Club of Oakland. His series in this city will be given at Lyric hall commencing Tuesday, January tenth.

Conflicting reports have been received on the local Rialto concerning Tim Frawley, the strenuous actor-manager. He was last heard from in South Africa where, it is said, he is in financial straits, longing for a ticket home. According to another report he is doing well and expects to be home in March.

MARGUERITE LE ROY.

The coloratura prima donna soprano, late of the French Opera Company at New Orleans, who will make her first appearance in this city at the Orpheum tomorrow afternoon, assisted by S. G. Ricci, the distinguished violin virtuoso.

Great interest attaches to the sixth annual benefit under the auspices of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco in aid of their charity fund for the sick and needy, to take place at the Orpheum, Friday afternoon, December ninth, at one o'clock sharp. Since the organization of the association, five years ago, untold good has been accomplished. During this period the sick have been tenderly cared for and nursed back to health, the hungry and destitute have been fed and clothed and the dead have been reverently buried. Whenever any appeal for charity or any worthy cause is made, the theatrical managers are always the first to respond, and now that their relief fund is low, they feel confident that the public will answer readily and that the house will be packed.

Next Week's Bills

Maxine Elliott in "Her Own Way" remains at the Columbia for another week. "A Chinese Honeymoon" and "The Billionaire" are early Columbia attractions. The latter will have Thomas Q. Seabrooke in the star part.

The musical tomfoolery, "The Show Girl," has scored a brilliant success at the Grand, and will stay another week. Sunday matinee, December fourth, Williams and Walker, who now style themselves the "Royal Comedians," will begin an engagement in the new "In Dahomey." Williams and Walker have just returned from London, where they packed the fashionable Shaftesbury theatre for two successive seasons, and had the honor of appearing before the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace.

At the Majestic, the bill will be Augustus Thomas's "In Mizzoura," with Howard Gould, J. H. Gilmour and Adele Block in the cast. The play will be given without any abridgement scenically or mechanically and the full cast will be presented as required by the author's own script.

Tomorrow night will be a gala night at the Tivoli, for "King Dodo," one of the biggest comic opera successes of recent years, will have its first performance there. If indications count for anything "King Dodo" will regale the Tivoli patrons for many weeks to come. Another event of interest in connection with the first performance of the opera will be the American debut of Irene Outtrim in the role of principal soubrette. Miss Outtrim is an Australian who comes with a fine reputation. Edith Mason returns as "principal boy" of the piece. Dora De Fillippe, Bessie Tannehill, Teddy Webb, Edward Clarke, William Schuster, Ben Dillon and other talented members of the company have congenial roles.

Sam Elton, "the man who made the Shah laugh," will make his first appearance in America at the Orpheum. Those who have seen him in London pronounce his work inimitable. Marguerite LeRoy, late prima donna soprano of the French Opera Company of New Orleans, will be heard for the first time in San Francisco, assisted by Sig. G. Ricci, violin virtuoso. The Josselin trio, Cleofus, Rosa and Dora, aerialists, will also be new. Clement de Lion, a European billiard ball manipulator, is another Orpheum importation. Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew, for their second and last week will present their bright skit, "A Model Young Man."

At the Chutes the new people will be the Clarence sisters, known as the "Australian nuggets," singing and dancing comedienues; Ted E. Box, eccentric comedian and whistler, and Rance Smith, "the man who gets up steam," and an eminent monologist.

ELIZABETH WOODSON, of the Alcazar Stock Company

Where did you lose your Grip? Anyway to get a fresh one go to the Tourist Outfitting Co., 227 Montgomery St.

THE BIRTHDAY SUPPER,
in "Her Own Way," at the Columbia.

We have had many Glory Quayles and many John Storms in San Francisco, for "The Christian" has been given here by various companies. Now the Alcazar will produce it again, with a new Glory and a new John—Miss Lawrence and Mr. Craig. "The Professor's Love Story," J. M. Barrie's charming comedy in which Willard was so successful, will soon have its first stock presentation at the Alcazar.

The Central will have a strong attraction in "The Little Church Around the Corner," with the scenes laid in New York. Some of the scenic features in this powerful melodrama will be the Chimes of Trinity, Madison Square Garden, an insane asylum and a tower in which a sensational battle will be fought. The next Central attraction will be "The Suburban."

The Drews are Good

Though there are many people who do not consider Sidney Drew so clever as his brother John, or as the rest of his clever relatives, the youngest Drew certainly manages to retain his place as a headliner in vaudeville. He is a little chap, with none of the grand air of society's pet John, but in his small proportions he holds a lot of real comedy talent. He is amusing without being silly, a nice distinction not always appreciated by a vaudeville audience. His wife, who was Gladys Rankin, is a beautiful young woman, rather majestic of build but graceful in carriage and gracious in manner. She fits delightfully into the little sketch in which Sidney and she are appearing at the Orpheum. "When Two Hearts are Won" is no flippant trifle, but a clever comedietta with bright lines and situations. Another good turn on the Orpheum bill is that called "The Awakening of Toys" by De Witt, Burns and Torrance. The Misses Tyce and Jermon have an interesting act.

The Village Postmaster

Rural dramas are much the same. The names differ, and the scenes are laid in different spots of the earth, but the plot and characters are about as usual in them all. Ade's "County Chairman" differed from the others in that it was impregnated with the spirit of satirical wit, and scintillated with clever dialogue. "The Village Postmaster," at the Alcazar, may have proved a potent rival to "Way Down East" in the East; its press agent says so. But it is by no means so good as the Grismer play. Nevertheless, it has succeeded in pleasing large audiences, and is a palatable offering for Thanksgiving week. One of its pleasing features is the quartet trained by Homer Henley.

Mayall as a Hawkshaw

Mayall has the role of a Sherlock Holmes in "Queen of the White Slaves" at the Central. I don't know whether Charley Ulrich had anything to do with the building of this melodrama, but in spots it is suggestive of a Celestial drama the ex-news-paper man wrote once upon a time. It is very thrilling, dealing with the doings of a Terrible Nine who export white women to China against their will. Miss Clifton is the heroine whom the Terrible Nine pursue as did the villain in Leonard Grover's famous old play. Mayall as the sleuth has to do all sorts of brave deeds, and falls in and out of danger with equal ease. It takes an artist to do this sort of thing well. The gallery soon finds out when a melodramatic hero is not equal to his part. And the Central gallery adores Mayall; he gets a round of cheers in his final rescue from a miserable death in Hongkong, by some American sailors.

"The Star of Bethlehem"

At Lyric hall next Monday night and every night during the week, with matinees at half past three on Wednesday and Friday and at three on Saturday, the Ben Greet Company of Players will present the miracle play, "The Star of Bethlehem," reproduced from the old English cycles by Professor Charles Mills Gayley of the State University. The production will be a notable one and a special feature will be the music by a splendid choir, a boy soprano and harp. The costuming is correct and where needed beautiful, and lovers of the highest in dramatic art and literature are promised a rare treat. The clergy are taking a great interest in these performances. While "The Star of Bethlehem" is a companion picture to "Everyman," it is cheerful and joyous in character. Quite a force of supernumeraries will be used and a perfect performance is promised in every way. The seats are now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Americans in London

A San Franciscan now in London writes me that every word of the cable despatches about Alice Neilsen's success over there is true. "She 'made good' at once," writes my correspondent, "in grand opera, duplicating her previous concert successes. Miss Neilsen has been under the tuition of Henry Russell for three or four years, and no other could have helped her on so well. The plucky little American has won everybody's admiration, and that of the critics above all. Two weeks ago she appeared as Mimi in La Boheme with the famous Caruso as Rodolfo, and her performance was highly praised. Another American girl, Margaret Huston, was lately given a hearing by Mr. Russell. She had been in London a year, and in spite of a glorious voice and magnetic personality, this was her first opportunity to sing before an Authority. The impresario liked her voice, and promised her he would give her a trial at Covent Garden next spring. The biggest theatrical hit of the year is Eleanor Robson in 'Merely Mary Ann.' Four of the most popular men in London are Denis O'Sullivan, Holbrook Blinn, Lawrence Rhea and 'Billy' Burke, all Americans, and the first two, Californians. Fanny Rice does not think much of the salaries paid by the London vaudeville managers. Her American contracts call for seven hundred and fifty dollars a week, but in London the largest salary is about two hundred dollars—and this calls for a big reputation. What the smaller fry get is a conundrum. One ex-San Francisco girl, I hear, was engaged for a music-hall, but after attending a 'try-out' rehearsal, she decided that all the King's army could not compel her to go on the London vaudeville stage.

"Mrs. T. P. O'Connor, the wife of the editor of M. A. P., had Miss Clara Alexander, the darkey dialect reader, as a guest during the greater part of the 'dull' season in town, at the O'Connors' lovely home by the sea, at Brighton. Denis O'Sullivan has a place near by, and runs over frequently for golf. Mrs. O'Connor is a very pretty, sweet and clever woman. She has written several plays, one of which was successfully produced. One that has not yet been staged is based upon the life and love story of Charles Stuart Parnell, and those who have seen the manuscript say that it is a powerful tragedy and would be well received in America and Ireland. Mrs. O'Connor wrote a bright recitation for Miss Alexander, about a horse race, to be recited at the Duchess of Beaufort's entertainment. Liza Lehmann, the composer, also composed a setting for one of the darkey poems the ex-Californian girl recites. Mrs. O'Connor is, like her husband, an editor, her organ being titled Chic, which describes its contents."

JUST READ THIS — YOU'LL BE GLAD

This is written to remind you that every man or woman needs at intervals a change of scene and climate in order to feel well and to do one's best. It's to remind you, too, that just after the early rains the California country, and particularly the region about Hotel del Monte, "field and tree, and sky and sea," is most alluring:

"Then, if ever, come perfect days."

This is to tell you, also, that by reason of remarkable natural conditions, this present fall and winter season of 1904-05 is far advanced, so that the months of October, November, December and January are sure to be like Spring, with Summer peeping around the corner. The golf links sweeping over the hillsides that slope from blue Monterey bay were never greener, meadow larks carol among the live-oaks, palms and pines send forth young buds and branches, flaming dahlias wave in the breeze. This isn't the season for midsummer gaiety, but it's just the time and the best time for you to take a week or so of idling rest, cheerfully mingled with sport on the golf links, on horseback, climbing the mountains that rise to the eastward, or angling for the game fish of the bay.

Remember this, that Hotel del Monte offers more natural attractions and more comforts and luxuries than any other resort in the world. Remember, too, that the climate here is delightful every day in the year, and should the warm rains keep you indoors, there's bowling for exercise, and miles of corridors and glass-enclosed porches. Remember, too, that this hotel is fashionable only because it offers the best; that it is popular because every one can here have a good time, any time, every time. Remember, too, that it's a home place, where the children can be happy, and families can enjoy themselves for months without disturbing household cares.

Why not plan to spend a week or two here? Get out your golf sticks and woo Mother Nature and good health on the luring links. Write for terms, or run down any Saturday or Sunday and see for yourself. Special Saturday-Monday rate from San Francisco, including railway fare and two days' board at the hotel, only ten dollars. Leave Third and Townsend-street depot at three o'clock (parlor car), reaching the hotel at six forty-eight.

GEORGE P. SNELL, MANAGER, Del Monte, California.

The Normani Concert

A fair audience was present at the concert given by Miss Agathe Normani for the benefit of the Christian Endeavorers' hospital. Miss Normani is a pupil of Signor La Villa, and her voice shows the effect of careful cultivation. Her best number was her opening one, the cavatina from "La Traviata." Her floriture is good, her runs and trills being beautifully light and even. In the Mattei ballad, "Bianca," she was not so successful, her style lacking warmth and body. In the duets and trios with Messrs. Walsh and Williams her voice did not blend well. Miss Normani is essentially a lyric soprano, and of course is most at home in compositions where there is much vocal embroidery. Herbert Williams has a most pleasing tenor, and S. P. Walsh a baritone of unusually fine timbre. He sang the "Toreador" song without bellowing, which can be said of very few who essay this selection. Mr. Williams sang Professor La Villa's song, "Dear Life of Mine," with violin obligato by Miss Valesca Schorcht, the composer at the piano; a very charming composition. Messrs. Walsh and Williams and Miss Normani sang a trio from Verdi's "Attila," and later Miss Normani and Mr. Williams rendered Arditi's "Night in Venice." It is a pity that Miss Schorcht does not appear oftener in public. She has had the advantage of several years of Europe, where she studied under Joachim. Her playing has freedom and sureness, and she is able to draw a round full tune out of her instrument. Her solo number was Musin's "First Caprice de Concert." Professor Martinez accompanied the vocalists on the piano.

The Tolmie Pupil Recital

At the pupils' recital given by Robert Tolmie last week at his studio the entire program was played by Miss Enid Williams, who opened her performance with the splendid G minor Fantasia and Fugue. Compositions by Scarlatti and Haydn followed and in Chopin's well known Polonaise in C minor Miss Williams showed a remarkable understanding of the value of tone and of its many gradations, and a very fresh and original but thoroughly orthodox interpretation of this old favorite was given. A Chopin nocturne followed and this also was played with a thoughtfulness, breadth and precision that approached very nearly to the standard of the professional artist. The last number and the piece de resistance was Rubinstein's D minor concerto, a colossal undertaking for any but the experienced virtuoso. Notwithstanding these great technical difficulties, Miss Williams played it in good tempo, with great precision, with adequate power in its robust passages (which are many), and with noticeable feeling and delicacy in the andante movement. The orchestral part of this number was played in a thoroughly satisfactory manner by Miss Edith Kelly at the second piano. At times there was a trifling lack of co-ordination between the players, resulting in some want of precision, which was, however, not noticeable save to one seeking for faults.

Last Thursday evening Miss Bertha Altenberg's piano pupils gave an interesting recital, the participants being Rose Goldman, Hazel O'Neil, Leah Hill, Edna Gille, Ida Bernard, Helen Harkins, Stella Crosthwaite, Bessie Crystal, Lena Wing, Edna Ryan, Irene Johnson, Olga Nicholson, Victoria Steinbock, Henrietta Rosenblum, Anna Shain and William Nicholson. George H. Irving assisted with several baritone solos that were well received.

Hother Wismer will give a concert on Thursday evening, December eighth, at Steinway hall. He will be assisted by Mrs. M. E. Blanchard, W. H. Thorley and Fred Maurer. Among the numbers will be Beethoven's violin concerto (Cadenzas by Joachim) and a sonata for violin and piano by Richard Strauss.

Lillian Slinkey, the soprano, who went to San Rafael for the summer, after returning from her Mexican trip, has decided to remain in the Marin county-seat, and has opened a studio at 427 Fifth avenue.

The first mandolin musicale, second season, by Samuel Adelstein and pupils, will be given on Monday evening in Native Sons' hall. Miss Helen Heath, soprano, and Amon Cain, baritone, will

Mary Pasmore's Recital

Last Thursday evening Mary Broeck Pasmore, violinist, gave a recital, assisted by Miss Lillian Spink, violin, Dorothy Pasmore, cello, Charles Trowbridge, tenor, John Ray Lewis, viola, Miss Ada Clement and H. B. Pasmore, accompanists. The program opened with Sarasate's transcription of Chopin's Nocturne op. 27, No. 2, which was rendered by Miss Pasmore in fine style. The young artist shows much self-possession and handles the bow with the confidence and skill of one to whom it has been familiar from childhood. Her initial effort was received with much applause. She then played the Corrente and Sarabande from the Sonata in D minor by Bach, bringing out all the sweetness and pathos of the number. Mr. Trowbridge sang the recitative "Thy rebuke has broken his heart," and the aria "Behold and see," from Handel's "Messiah." His voice is clear and pure and sweet, with decidedly a baritone timbre. He was heard to advantage in several songs from the "Dichterliebe" of Schumann, singing particularly well "Ich grolle nicht." Miss Pasmore played the concerto in the form of a vocal scena from Spohr. After each of her numbers she was warmly and persistently applauded, but though recalled to the stage several times, did not respond to the demand for an encore. In this her good taste is to be commended. A few encore fiends can spoil the harmony of a concert program and often destroy the pleasure of an entire evening. The program closed with the Quartet op. 18, No. 4, of Beethoven, in which Miss Pasmore was assisted by the other artists.

A Californian Singer in Paris

Mrs. Alvina Heuer Willson is very pleasantly located at 6 rue Fromentin, Paris, and intends taking vocal lessons this winter. She writes me that she attended a performance of the opera "Salambo," in which Mademoiselle Brevai had the title role and acted magnificently, with exquisite vocalization. M. Rousseliere, the tenor who sang Matho, was superb vocally and dramatically. Mrs. Willson recently had a letter from her former instructor, Madame Julie Rosewald, who is in Stuttgart, and very much improved in health.

Next Tuesday evening a violin and piano recital will be given in Steinway hall by Blanche Coonan, a pupil of Nathan Landsberger, and Josephine Coonan, pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt. The program will consist of compositions by Grieg, Mozart, Liszt, Liebling, Poldini, Lefort, Sauret, Schumann, Elkus, Sinding and Leonard. Blanche Coonan, who is only sixteen years of age, has been studying for a number of years under Landsberger's tuition. She hopes to go to Chicago later on, to continue her work under Emile Sauret, under whom Landsberger studied.

At Miss Joan Baldwin's recital before the Saturday Club of Sacramento last week, the following program was rendered: Robert Schumann's Novellette, B minor, op. 99, No. 9, Romance, F sharp, op. 28, No. 2, Presto passionato, G minor, op. posth.; Albert I Elkus's Rosamond, from suite "Dream of Fair Women," Bagatelle, E major, Lady of Shalott, Cleopatra, from suite "Dream of Fair Women"; Chopin's Etude, C sharp minor, op. 25, No. 7, Prelude, B flat minor, op. 28, No. 16, Prelude, C sharp minor, op. 45, Etude, A minor, op. 25, No. 11; Liszt's Chant Polonais, No. 5, Au bord d'une source, Rhapsodie hongroise, No. 9, Carnaval de Pesth. Miss Baldwin is a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt.

"Lucia" at the Tivoli

Madame Francisca made a much more delightful impression in "Lucia" than at any of her concert appearances. Russo's Edgardo was the best thing he has done in a long time. Wanrell's Raymond was one of those admirable characterizations that show what a fine voice and long operatic experience can do, when called into requisition on short notice. Signor Wanrell has one of the best basso cantantes hereabouts. When Mascagni directed the "Ave Maria" production at the Alhambra during his visit here, Wanrell was called upon to fill the bass role, and made one of the strongest successes of the program. He is always in practice, it appears. Borghese, also, did well in the "Lucia" production, and Zarala was an acceptable Arthur.

A memorial service will be held at Trinity church on Sunday evening, at eight o'clock, in memory of the late Dr. Church, who for many years was identified with the work of Trinity parish. Rev. Dr. Clappett will officiate. Several anthems, favorites of Dr. Church, will be sung by the choir. All seats will be free ex-

A New Contralto

At Laura Kinze von Kisielnicka's concert Tuesday evening she revealed herself as the possessor of a carefully trained contralto, and her singing shows the finish of the artist. Her voice has not only range and power, but feeling and expression. Her program was well selected, and on the whole she made a very favorable impression. Her enunciation in her German songs was really delightful. The only thing I did not like was the "Evening Star" selection from "Tannhauser." One is so accustomed to hearing it sung by a male voice that a feminine interpretation must needs sound unnatural. Schumann's "Lotusblume," which is seldom well rendered, was a particularly good number. Brahms' "Feldeinsamkeit" was charmingly done, no fine shade of expression being lost, while on the other hand her voice and method were large and dramatic enough for the "Samson and Delilah" aria. Miss von Kisielnicka's program embraced selections from many composers, including Mozart, Schumann, Brahms, Giordani, Draeske, Hildach, Wagner, Wolf, Massenet, Schubert and Chamade, and in nothing was she less than good. For an encore she gave Boehm's "Still wie die Nacht," which proved to be one of her best efforts. It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Alice Bacon Washington once more. She has lost nothing of her old skill, and was masterly in her part of the Spohr Concerto in G minor, in the Sinding suite, and in her accompaniments to Miss von Kisielnicka. Hother Wismer was at his best in the violin parts of the concerto and the suite, and also in the obligato to "Caro mio ben," and that is saying a great deal. Distinction is never absent from his playing. Miss Hulda Anderson is a pianiste of dash and freedom, and her group of two Scarlatti numbers and a Leschetitzky Mazurka was all too short.

Gadski is meeting with great success on her transcontinental concert tour. She sings here during the first week of the new year.

De Pachmann, the famous interpreter of Chopin, has created a sensation on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His touch is said to be finer and more pleasing than that of any living pianist.

Alfred A. Farland, undoubtedly the greatest banjoist the world has ever known, will give a single recital in this city at Steinway hall, Tuesday evening, December thirteenth. Those who heard him play on his former visits to San Francisco for the first time realized the possibilities of his chosen instrument.

A pupil of Signor G. S. Wanrell, Mrs. Molera, made a most favorable impression recently in a concert at Merced. Mrs. Molera's voice is a soprano, rich in volume, and shows the effect of fine and careful training.

In Steinway hall on December fifth an operatic and song recital will be given by G. S. Wanrell, the basso cantante, assisted by Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano, Miss Mignon Judson, contralto, Rafael Meany, solo pianist, and Prof. La Villa, accompanist.

—The Music Critic

Will she marry him, and if she won't, whom will she marry? is the burning question asked of tantalizing Mrs. Hugh Baxter-Tevis regarding her latest devoted swain, Mr. McKee. The story of the way he is trailing after her over the continent is told in tomorrow's Bulletin. So is the pathetic narrative unfolded by the last letters of poor Nellie Gore, whose tragic death in Paris shed gloom over the hopes of her Alameda friends. "On Cupid's Mourners' Bench" is an account of the ingenious prank played by four unsuccessful swains on the girl who refused them. In the same issue is a good description of the new Babist faith that has interested some Californians to such an extent that they have traveled to the Orient to inquire into it; the way in which the life of the big oil districts of California has just been saved by the use of a little aniline dye, and Hoffman's great short story, "Gambler's Luck." Madame Bavarde has a page of her crisp society chat and other writers contribute their best in fashions, beauty talks and literature.

The Western Motor Car Company of Los Angeles, one of the largest automobile concerns in the country, controlling ten of the leading agencies in Los Angeles and several for the coast, has opened a branch house in San Francisco. Frank E. Hartigan, who has been identified with the automobile business in San Francisco since its beginning, has been appointed manager for Northern California. The temporary quarters of the Western Motor Car Company will be at No. 53 City hall avenue. It is the plan of the company to push the 40 horse-power, 4-cylinder, side entrance Thomas touring car in the San Francisco field. Mr. Hartigan, manager of the company, sold, last week, a 40 horse-power 4 cylinder, side entrance touring car to C. F. Horner of Centerville, Supervisor of Alameda county. This will be the largest American built automobile to come to the coast thus far. Supervisor Horner will use his Thomas in inspecting the roads under his supervision. Few automobilists know that they are indebted to Supervisor Horner for the excellent condition of the roads which they enjoy so much across the bay.

The first one of the 40 horse-power 4 cylinder side entrance Thomas touring cars will reach San Francisco about December fifteenth. In this car Mr. Thomas has harmonized the discordant conditions which existed heretofore in the automobile business—high price and low power. The selling price of the Thomas in San Francisco will be $3,150. Forty horse-power will carry the car loaded over any road on high speed. While it is large and roomy, it weighs only about 2,400 pounds. Tests made show that it is capable of 60 miles an hour in touring condition.

The Boston Sunday Post of recent issue gives an interesting account of the trip of a White steam touring car into the very heart of that vast game region of Maine known as the Bangor and Aroostook. North of Grindstone, where the Penobscot was crossed, the White steamer was a curiosity. Nothing like it had ever been seen before in that vicinity. When the country folk were told that it had been driven all the way from Boston they could hardly believe their ears. The fifteen miles from Patten to the camp on the shore of Shinn Pond was the longest that any of the party had ever experienced, but thanks to the assistance of several woodsmen it was made within four hours, by hard toiling. Bridges had to be built, fallen logs had to be removed, wide detours had to be made to avoid boulders and all sorts of obstructions in the path. Yet the car made the trip all the way under its own power and over all obstructions.

The new 1905 sizes of Gre-Solvent have been received by the Geo. P. Moore Co., and are being viewed by the dealers, etc., with much satisfaction. Gre-Solvent removes grease, ink and stains of all kinds from the hands, and contains positively no acids, sand or other ingredients harmful to the skin; consequently, it can be used without fear of roughening or otherwise marring the skin. The 1905 size cans contain much more for the money, and there is a five-cent size which will prove very popular with those who wish to carry a small can in the pocket when touring. The sizes are five cents, ten cents, twenty-five cents, fifty cents and one dollar.

In the awarding of automobiles at the St. Louis Exposition, the White car was not placed in a class by itself, and no distinction was made as to its being a steam car. Obviously an award in a steam class means nothing, as the White is practically the only steam car being built. The White has received the highest award in the official list of awards, and there are very few other American cars upon which this distinction is bestowed. The awards were made regardless of what is the motive power of the various automobiles and are based on the essentials: Excellence of mechanical workmanship and design, finish, excellence of body workmanship and design, finish of body, general appearance, general considerations.

John D. Spreckels was seen piloting a 1905 White car through the Park and Presidio on Sunday last. Mr. Spreckels is one of the most proficient and enthusiastic operators anywhere to be found, and always may be seen driving his own machine. Charles D. Blaney of San Jose received one of the first 1905 model E Whites, and for its initial trip drove it to his home in San Jose from this city. Mr. Blaney's car is finished in a rich brewster green, and is the very latest product of the White factory. Will S. Tevis is the owner of the first 1905 White touring car that was shipped to the Pacific coast. The car shows all the very latest improvements in automobile construction, is very large and roomy, and rides like a Pullman palace car. It makes a striking appearance, as the car is painted a pure white, with its elaborate brass trimmings. Its mechanism is perfectly noiseless and reminds one of an enormous white bird as it glides over the road. Mr. Tevis will use it to make the run from Burlingame to San Francisco for the present, and will at the first opportunity run the car over the road to Kern county.

William W. Westover has just received his 1905 White touring car, and may be seen spinning around his home in Alameda. The car is finished in a rich coach blue.

F. A. Lathe of the Pioneer Automobile Company has just returned from a trip to Tonopah and Goldfield, Nevada, where the Winton Quad, recently sold to Mr. L. L. Patrick of Tonopah, is now being used to convey passengers and baggage from Tonopah to Goldfield, a distance of thirty-two miles. Mr. Lathe reports that the Quad is fully demonstrating its superiority, as nothing short of a Winton or a burro could go over the desert. There are no roads to speak of and machines are navigated by the compass as much as anything else.

W. F. Hunt and family made a trip to San Jose in an Oldsmobile light tonneau touring car on Sunday last.

Jacob Ravn is now the possessor of a new Winton touring car, which he last week purchased from the Pioneer Automobile Company.

R. J. Mier and family made a trip to Niles and return on Sunday last, in Mr. Mier's Winton.

The West Coast Motor Car Company has received the following letter from the Autocar Company of Ardmore: "With the opening of the new agency year we make the following short announcement regarding the product and prices so that our dealers may have official information thereon. We are building for immediate and future sale Type X runabout, $1,050. The specifications of this car are those of the present model. Type VIII four passenger car, $1,550. The specifications of this car are those of the present model. The new price, taking effect November 1, $1,550, has been fixed so as to bear a proper commercial relation to the prices of the runabout ($1,050) and of Type XI ($2,150). We shall also build (deliveries January 15, 1905, sample cars earlier), Type XI double side entrance car, $2,150. This car has a four-cylinder vertical motor of 16-20 h. p., three speeds forward, wheel steer, right control with side hand levers for gear shift and emergency brake, Hyatt roller bearings. The ample power in this car makes gear shifting almost unnecessary, hill climbing as well as level running being done on the direct drive. For instance, the car climbs tested 12 per cent grades at about 25 miles per hour and maintains a speed on the level of 40 to 45 miles per hour. We do not ask any of our dealers to take our word for any statements regarding the new car, but when convenient to come to the factory, examine and ride in the car. Every dealer and customer so far, after such examination and test, has become enthusiastic."

L. Hammersmith enjoyed a ride Sunday through the Presidio in an Autocar. Emilie Abadie, former crack sprinter of the University of California, recently took to motoring and is thoroughly enthused over the sport. Last Sunday he was seen at the steering gear of an Autocar with a party of friends enjoying an exhilarating spin out to the beach. Attorney McCutcheon and his wife made a successful run to San Jose last Saturday in their handsome Autocar.

Billy Powers drove the 40 horse power Columbia touring car around the bay last Sunday and the big and speedy auto literally flew over the roads both ways. Powers was accompanied by Miss Bella Zellerbach, her sisters and Arthur Zellerbach.

CHRISTMAS SUNSET MAGAZINE.

The Yuletide spirit is in the December number of Sunset, which has just been placed on sale at all news stands. The cover depicts "Santa Claus Off the Range," and there are good Christmas stories by Mabel Craft Deering and Ednah Robinson. The leading article is a notable one on "How San Francisco Grows," by Rufus M. Steele, and is illustrated with some new photographs of the city by H. C. Tibbitts. There are a dozen well written articles in this number, besides six good short stories and the usual amount of verse and miscellany.

Armer Brothers' coffee has only been on the market a comparatively short time, but its popularity is such that very few households are satisfied to be without it. The Armers' "Very Best" fills all the requirements of good coffee—it is palatable, nutritious and delicious.

"Los Puritanos"

This is one of those excellent foreign books issued by William R. Jenkins of New York. It is a collection of four tales from the Spanish of Valdes, one of the foremost of contemporary novelists of Spain. He is favorably known in this country by some of his longer works, notably "Marta y Maria" and "La Hermana San Sulpicio." The stories in the present volume are taken from "Aguas Fuertes." They are not too difficult for first year students, while at the same time they have a literary value, and will lead the student on to a further acquaintance with their author. In addition they are so well selected that they are adapted for class use in schools and colleges. "El Pajaro en la Nieve" is a pathetic tale of a blind musician dying of cold and hunger in the streets of Madrid, and dreaming as he dies of a reunion with the brother, Santiago, who was one day to come back from America and make all things right. In the "Confession of a Crime" Ascuncion, aged twelve, is too shame-faced to offer her little novio an umbrella. He gets wet, catches cold, and dies—hence the confession. "Los Puritanos," the longest story, takes its title from the opera, better known to us by its Italian title "I Puritani." In his early years Don Ramon has had an innocent little love adventure, and the music of the opera is bound up with recollections of Teresa, who makes love in Spanish fashion from a balcony, drops unpunctuated little notes to her admirer, and finally steals away from her cousin's party to meet him. The text of the stories offers but few difficulties to distract the beginner and mar his enjoyment in the tales themselves. The notes and introduction are by W. T. Faulkner of the Columbian University, Washington.

Unfinished Books

Another old gentleman has been making complaint on the subject of "unfinished books," by which he means the modern fashion of binding a book with the leaves uncut. To him it has the appearance of slipshodness and untidiness and he inquires whether time is so precious, or whether it is indifference to appearance, which leads the publisher to put his products on the market in an incomplete condition. It is difficult for any one to see wherein the advantage of uncut edges resides. Theoretically, the idea is that if margins are untrimmed the pages are left with a wider margin, and when purchasers rebind their books according to their individual taste, a better appearance is secured than if a portion of the page, however small, were removed, both by the publisher in the original binding and by the owner in the second. But how many people, nowadays, do have their books bound, and how many modern books are worth the trouble? If any one really does care to go to the expense and trouble, it is a simple matter to communicate with the publisher of any desired book and secure a copy in sheets. The rough edges look unsightly, in spite of the decree of fashion, and they collect the dust and become discolored. In addition, few people enjoy the privilege of cutting the pages of a new book and fewer still can succeed without gashing. Some time ago the English librarians passed a resolution declaring against books with uncut leaves and some people go so far as to say that there are few modern books worth the trouble. Most of the magazine publishers issue their periodicals both cut and uncut, so that subscribers or purchasers may take their choice. The purchaser of an occasional number usually prefers the trimmed margin, so as to be able to proceed with his perusal without interruption, while those who preserve copies for binding can secure as much margin as possible. Of course, among book collectors "uncut" gives a volume a special value, even greater than "untrimmed," but book collectors do not purchase books to read them. It is the rarity of the edition or some minute variation or some accident or omission which makes the value, not the contents of the pages. It is a fine bit of irony which adds importance to a book because there is intrinsic evidence that no one has ever turned its pages, much less perused them.

Elizabeth C. Yeats, sister of the poet, is interesting herself in artistic printing. Most of the books in press or in immediate contemplation are those connected with the Celtic revival. All the work is to be done by hand, the hand of women.

It is reported that the Czarina has written a novel which she has had printed for private circulation. If there is any truth in the story at all, the next thing we know it will be in all the book stores, for even apart from the glamor of royalty, and the inevitable curiosity, the story of the book written in the leisure moments of busy lawyers and between the acts by theatrical stars, and discovered accidentally by rummaging friends who urge publication, have become so common that they are like the stolen diamonds of the vaudeville meteors, accepted at their face value as advance advertisement.

The Critic's Lounger has some caustic remarks on the subject of the author's press agent, and the danger lest the writers, like some actors, come to believe in time that all the praise and puffery is founded on fact, until they become so insufferably conceited that an antidote in the shape of derogatory paragraphing is administered to bring them to their senses. Something else as salutatory has already been hit upon by the jaded public. Between the undeserved laudation of the press agent, alias the publisher, and the conceit engendered in those authors who were boosted to a position they could not hold by their own merits, but who were confident that they could do as they pleased and that the dear readers would never suspect, being hypnotized by the magic of their names, people have begun to discover that what they read in every paper and periodical has no bearing at all on the facts. They read one book which is fairly good, and accept it on its merits. They read another which is cried to the stars and find it heavy as lead, and they pass over the third altogether. In a sentence, they have been pretty well educated to do their own thinking. We have passed through the stage of fooling all the people some of the time. There are always some who can be fooled all of the time, but the number is growing visibly small by degrees and beautifully less.

The Metropolitan Magazine's short story contest has been decided and the winners prove to be again all people whose names are well known to the reading world, evidence, if it were needed, that the amateur stands very little chance when pitted against the professional. In this case the five prize winners are Finley Peter Dunne (Mr. Dooley), W. A. Frazer, George Gibbs, Alfred Henry Lewis and Guy Wetmore Caryl. If we were favored with a list of the "also-rans" in the order of merit of their respective productions, the chances are that the first twenty-five would be those which appear regularly in the indexes of the monthly magazines.

Department No. 3. No. 92728.

MAY HARVEY ELY, Plaintiff.
vs.
FRANCIS H. B. ELY, Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said County in the office of the Clerk of the said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:
FRANCIS H. B. ELY, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, upon the ground of Defendant's willful desertion of Plaintiff for the period of more than one year continuously, next immediately preceding the date of the commencement of this action, and also upon the ground of Defendant's failure to provide for Plaintiff the common necessities of life he having the ability so to do, for the period of more than one year continuously next preceding the date of the commencement of this action; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 7th day of October in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four.

THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, Plaintiff.

vs.

JOHN V. VREDENBERGH, HENRY H. HULL and JOHN DOE ARNAIZ, also all other persons unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint, adverse to the Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto, Defendants.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

GOODFELLOW & BELLS, Attorneys for Plaintiff.

The People of the State of California send greeting to:

JOHN V. VREDENBERGH, HENRY H. HULL and JOHN DOE ARNAIZ, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint, adverse to the Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto, Defendants.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in the action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff, in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after service upon you of this summons, if served within said City and County; if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to so appear and answer, the Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Said action is brought to quiet Plaintiff's title and to determine all adverse claims of any of the defendants in and to that certain parcel of land situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which is bounded and described as follows, to-wit:—

Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Greenwich street distant therefrom 272.265 feet easterly from the easterly line of Gough street and running thence easterly and along said southerly line of Greenwich street to a point distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet and six (6) inches westerly from the westerly line of Franklin street; thence at a right angle southerly, parallel with said westerly line of Franklin street, to the intersection of the northeasterly line of the northwest quarter (¼) of Lot No. Four (4) of the Laguna Survey; thence northwesterly along said line of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4) to the northerly corner of the northwest quarter (¼) of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4); thence northeasterly to the point of commencement.

Other People's Ideas

From "Susan Clegg and Her Friend Mrs. Lathrop," by Anne Warner:

One man can lead a horse to water, but a thousand can't get him to stick his nose in 'f he don't want to, 'n' I thank my stars 't I ain't got nothin' 'n' me as craves to marry a man 's appears ded-set agin the idea.

In my opinion a man as 'd be fool enough to marry a woman's ain't got nothin' but herself to give him 's likely to be happier bein' her fool 'n he ever would be bein' mine.

No woman as 's goin' to fall in love ever ought to begin by marryin' another man first. It mixes things all up.

As far 's my experience goes a woman afore she marries a man always admires him full 's much or maybe even more 'n his own mother can, so it's breath wasted to try 'n' tell either of 'em a plain truth about him.

I never was one as believed over much in woman's rights. My idea is to let the men have the rights, 'n' then they're satisfied to let you do as you please.

What do folks ever toss up for? To decide. Tossin' up always shows you jus' how much you did n't want what you get. The good o' me tossin' up is I c'n always take either side o' the nickel after I've tossed. I ain't nobody's fool —'n' I never was —'n' I never will be.

There ain't no possible good 's c'n come o' lendin' money to them 's ain't able to pay it back.

'S far 's my observation 's 'xtended no one don't ask for advice 'nless they've pretty well made up their mind not to take it.

'S far 's my observation 's extended, it's always folks a long ways off's it's wisest to lay all faults to.

To my order o' thinkin', our minister ain't really ever in need o' rest; 'f he needs a change, my say would be, "Set him to work."

VALUABLE RELICS.

The vaults of an old established London bank contain the materials for some romantic stories, in the shape of a considerable number of chests, some of which were placed there for safe keeping during the days of the French Revolution and which have never since been claimed. Presumably their owners brought them to England and were then so indiscreet as to return to their own country. These chests have never been opened and their contents are therefore unknown.

REVERSED THEIR H'S

Sir Daniel Grooch used to pay the closest attention to all details of railroad management. It is told of him that finding a porter at Acton in calling the name of the station prefixed an aspirate while a porter at Hanwell omitted it, he ordered that the men should be transposed, with the result that the ears of a critical people were not again offended.

The only sin which we never forgive in each other is a difference of opinion.

The Masters of Wall Street

Though Tom Lawson says that he was prompted to expose the viciousness of the Standard Oil financial system by a desire to render a valuable public service, he does not pretend to have been uninfluenced by motives of revenge. And from what he told Arthur McEwen in an interview last week it appears that he has a pretty deep-seated grievance against the magnates of the great Trust. He says that they once persuaded him to spare one of their number from exposure by representing that he would injure innocent people if he produced proofs of the man's infamy. Then it was represented that he had withdrawn his charges in consideration of one million dollars' worth of bonds, which, to give vraisemblance to the slander, he was employed to sell. It was not until years after that he learned that he had been held up to obloquy as a blackmailer. That was a pretty low down piece of villainy, and it is shocking to think that the men by whom it was perpetrated are now distinguished figures in the polite society of this country; that they control the finances and industries of the nation, hobnob with our statesmen and dictate the policy of powerful newspapers that influence public opinion. Mr. Lawson is indeed performing a great public service in tearing off the masks that conceal the hideous features in which are mirrored the sin-stained souls of human monsters.

A Vicious Traffic

The dastardly trick that was played on Lawson is of a species familiar to men in public life. Men are frequently "sold" without their knowledge. The unsophisticated legislator who tells a lobbyist how he is going to vote on a certain measure may become the victim of precisely the same trick through which Lawson became known in Boston as a blackmailer. There are unscrupulous men who thrive off the practice of anticipating the action of public servants in legislative, judicial and executive offices. The sagacious statesman is always on his guard against being "sold," and even judges have had to exercise great caution to protect themselves from unscrupulous lawyers who would not hesitate to include in their expense account a charge for bribery. It has come to such a pass that it is no longer wise to grant a favor through an intermediary unless you have absolute confidence in his integrity, for the person in whose interest it is granted may be taxed without your knowledge and thereafter regard you as a sordid wretch. Journalists, more frequently than men in any other sphere, are the victims of the grafter who collects for favors that cost him nothing.

A Picturesque Poseur

Tolstoy has once more informed us that he is "completely out of patience with modern literary taste." But that is not strange since modern literary critics have long been out of patience with Count Tolstoy. Taken as a whole his novels are immensely powerful and inordinately dull. It requires great patience to journey through "War and Peace," and one learns from its perusal nothing more valuable than a great lesson in patience. Tolstoy is a great word-painter who lacks the art of composition. He is also a great faker. An axiom which he has never taken to heart is that cleanliness is next to godliness. Such sublunary matters as soap and water do not engage his attention. But that he is given to dirt and untidiness is no great virtue, and it is not to be accepted as evidence of genius. Genius appears eccentric because it scorns the beaten track, and in its courageous pursuit of truth it often falls into error, but not into filth for the love of it. Tolstoy is seemingly insincere in all of his professions, and his life is in direct contradiction to his published theories. He has gained a reputation for philanthropy and reform purely on the strength of what he has published. He poses as a vegetarian but eats meat. He talks very engagingly of brotherly love and mutual help, but in times of distress he expresses his charity in sympathetic words and impractical advice. He has the lowest possible opinion of poor humanity, and depends on a sneer to keep himself in the stage-centre.

The London Reputation

The habit of returning home to San Francisco with a London reputation is becoming quite familiar. The cultured of this provincial burg are invariably awed by a London reputation. The lion worshipers accept it as the hall-mark of genius, and if it be attested by a few press clippings, they are accepted as though they were of divine inspiration. Those of the cultured whose culture is a little more than skin deep feel the courage of their convictions oozing out in the presence of a London reputation, and proceed to alter their standard of criticism. Few ever reflect that there are more charlatans to the square foot in London than in San Francisco, the British metropolis being possessed of a much larger population. Neither does it occur to them that there is considerable fake culture in London society, or that newspaper puffery is more easily to be had in London than in San Francisco. The few honest British critics admit that log-rolling is a common practice throughout art circles, and that the immoderate praise of a hopelessly ignorant public bestowed on actors and singers has caused the loss of a real standard of excellence. They complain that the musical academies continue to produce their mediocrities, sending forth their hordes of foolish girls and fatuous boys, who believe that six months' training with a charlatan is enough to fit them for a place of distinction on the concert platform or the stage. Moreover there is not much opportunity to learn the art of singing by listening to great singing, for there are few really great singers to be heard in London. As for press puffery, nothing is easier in London. The British journalists are amiable chaps who go in for society, and they give flattering notices to every young person they meet at tea or reception. Let us take the London reputation seriously, and restrain our enthusiasm over the mediocrities that return to us from abroad freighted with press clippings. We have charlatans of our own, and if the girls with voices and afflicted with the musical craze, devoid of temperament and magnetism, insist on getting a feeble knowledge of the technique, let us encourage home industry.

The Spectacular Funeral Fad

A dilettante sociologist has evolved a new pension scheme, or what practically amounts to one. He thinks the State should assume the necessary expenses of birth and burial, since they bear so heavily on the poor and are circumstances not easily within control of those affected. He argues that children are public assets and that what is done for them is so much toward public welfare. As to burials, they are expensive occasions at best and it is bad enough for a family to be deprived of mother or father without still further depleting their resources, depriving the living of what they need in order to do what is essential for the dead. There is a certain degree of reason in the suggestion, but the idea of the writer is not to make these benefits universal but to apply them only in such cases as circumstances seem to make imperative. It would be very difficult to draw the line between what is imperative and what is only very desirable. Again, it is a fact demonstrated over and over by experience that once people learn that they can obtain anything for nothing they straightway demand as a right what at best is but a concession. As soon as it becomes known that free service of any kind may be had at any sacrifice of personal dignity there is a class ready to take advantage of it. Once let it be known that birth and burial expenses are provided at State expense and immediately all efforts to meet such demands by forethought or economy would cease. First the lowest strata would be affected but gradually the heaven would work upward until, like the civil and military pension lists, the idea of necessity would be lost sight of in the desire to get. Funerals among the poor are absurdly extravagant displays. One can find no fault with the desire to do all things decently and in order, but many a poor man has been buried in a finer suit of clothes than he ever wore in his lifetime, while the express wagon full of floral tributes from the family and the half-dozen carriages supplied to swell the cortege, to say nothing of other needless display, are disheartening to those who know that food and shelter are problematic in the immediate future. Burial Reform Associations have been established in various parts of the country, but they draw their recruits from the rich and the well-to-do. Very seldom do they appeal to the poor, who, like Janey Brierly find something cheerful in "a bit o' black" and take comfort in new gloves and beads in their bonnets. To have the longest cortege is a distinction and to gain the reputation of being "a good funeral woman" is the ambition of many. It is undoubtedly true that in times of trouble the demands made upon the poor are heavy; doctors and druggists and undertakers must be paid somehow, but in practice it rarely happens that they are unduly importunate. On the contrary they often wait for years and in the end forego a considerable portion of their bills. On the other hand, the State does already provide for the absolutely necessary expenses since there are public hospitals and pauper burials for those who have no other resources. It is not for the uplifting of mankind that free institutions are multiplied. On the contrary the more people are encouraged to do for themselves, even at the expense of self-sacrifice in other directions, the better.

Frank J. Moffitt

It is usually the business of the obituary writer to gloze the faults of the deceased or ignore them altogether, and expatiate on the noble qualities which his friends generally attributed to him. But no such amiable task devolved on those newspaper writers who knew Frank J. Moffitt and who were called on to discuss him for publication last week. The salient characteristic of Frank J. Moffitt was hatred of cant and hypocrisy. It would have pained him to know that his death would provoke extravagant panegyric. He had his imperfections of character, as all men have, but he differed from most men in that he scorned to pretend to be what he was not. Yet he did not lack pride, but he preferred the approval of his conscience to the good opinion of the mob, for he was something of a cynic, and knowing that good opinion is often undeserved he valued it not. In his philosophy the good opinion of others is not essential to happiness. He felt that it merely flatters vanity, and makes man the slave of what other people are pleased to think. Other people's consciousness was a matter of indifference to him, and yet Frank Moffitt was not an unmoral man. It is the fear of what other people might think that deters many from vice, and it is therefore the concern for reputation that safeguards society against a great deal of immorality. That a man can be indifferent to the opinion of others, and yet live a noble life, radiating cheer and happiness, is proof that he has his passions in check and that his virtues predominate over his vices. Such a man was Frank J. Moffitt, whose strength of character and tenderness of heart were being constantly expressed in deeds that secured for him the friendship of men whose esteem was not to be won by unworth. Influenced by environment, he never affected the spirit of the Pharisee, but acquiesced in a measure in the sophistries of his associates. As a consequence he was at times the victim of harsh criticism, and as he was a man of intense prejudices, he made enemies who were bitter in their denunciation, but it was to be noted that those whose disfavor he incurred were men whose approval was far from being a guarantee of merit. He was an excellent judge of men, and hating sham and hypocrisy with a fervor equaled only by his admiration for nobility of character, he fairly reveled in the enmity of those for whom he had contempt. He loved contention and rejoiced in the swatting of an enemy, but the number of those who suffered from his prejudices were few when compared with the number to whom his generosity and his loyalty were a source of succor and gratification. The principles that moved him at times in the affairs of life may have indicated lack of respect for some of the idealities, but it must be remembered that he was a cynic and not a reformer. Those who knew him most intimately admired him for his noble impulses, for his deep sympathies with the misfortunes of others and his quickness to forgive a stricken foe. His friendships were not frail attachments, easily weakened or dissolved. He inspired by his benefactions not gratitude but affection. He had in him many of the elements of greatness. He was a man of wonderful mental activity, and possessed almost a weird foresight and keenness of discernment. In the late years of his life he prospered, and after amassing a comfortable fortune, he devoted himself to the joy of living in a manner bespeaking a refinement of taste and an appreciation of the higher aims of existence. But at no time did his own pleasures engross his attention to the exclusion from consideration of his less fortunate friends. He was always on the alert for some scheme by which others might profit. There was poignant grief in the breasts of many when Frank Moffitt went to his grave.

Portland's Exposition

The citizens of this State are gradually awakening to the importance of the Lewis and Clark Centennial which is to be celebrated in Portland next year. Our commercial bodies have come to the conclusion that the Exposition will be of great benefit to this State since the probability is that nearly all Eastern visitors will include in their itinerary a trip through California. California should get as much advertising as Oregon out of the affair, and the Oregonians are willing that we should, but they expect us to assist in making it a success. There is a growing sentiment in both California and Oregon that there should be a merging of interests, and an honest co-operation for the development of the coast. An appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars was made by the legislature for a California exhibit at St. Louis, and now it is suggested that a quarter of a million should be appropriated for the Portland Exposition. As Governor Pardee is said to favor the proposition it will in all likelihood carry. Many members of the Legislature have already expressed themselves in favor of a large appropriation, the importance of the Exposition having been impressed upon them by people interested in advertising the industries and resources of the State. It is to be hoped that Governor Pardee will not make any mistake in the selection of the commission to represent the State.

Concerning Kleptomania

The increase of kleptomania is a subject which seems to be agitating social circles east and west. It is definitely concluded that something must be done to put a stop to the misappropriation of goods, but the question is, what, and how is it to be managed without hurting feelings? If the "disease" affected any but the highest coteries, the question would be easy of solution. The purloining habit would be dignified by no euphemistic title and the matter of feelings would not be entered into at all. Kleptomania is believed to be an irresistible desire to appropriate articles without reference to their value, but it is worth noting that those who are rich enough to afford the affliction are irresistibly impelled only when the article has intrinsic value. A sable muff, a piece of valuable lace, diamonds, feather boas, silk umbrellas, and other light commodities, easy to appropriate and conceal and representing considerable value in proportion to bulk, are the things which attract the kleptomaniac. Small articles of cut glass and fine porcelain disappear from the shelves and counters where coarse crockery is unmolested, and between a mangy, shabby piece of fur and a new article there seems to be no hesitation or doubt. Manifestations of this disease have been frequent in colleges and seminaries of late, but it is noteworthy that though text books, rulers, pens, ink and such commodities are within the reach of all, it is the gold watches and jeweled rings and pins and the hard coin which disappear, and the jewelry is frequently recovered from a pawnshop at a considerable distance from the place in which the theft was committed. A poor scrub woman will be hustled into a patrol wagon and carted off to the city prison on mere suspicion of appropriating an article of nominal value, and an honest workingman must needs move on lest his eye linger longingly, yet the lady who is an eligible member of the Bridge Club may help herself to what she fancies, and the college student indulge in a "prank" which leaves him in possession of some other person's property, and in one case it is a pitiable affliction and in the other, a great joke. It is only those in circumstances to indulge in kleptomania who may collect souvenirs. If the cook or one of the waiters in a fashionable hotel or restaurant were to be found in possession of spoons or napkins there would be a cell awaiting his occupancy, but if some one from the upper circles takes possession it is quite another matter, and even were restoration demanded it would be done so quietly and deferentially that no suspicion would be aroused. In fact, the only difference between plain theft and kleptomania is that of social position. It is not everyone who can afford to be a kleptomaniac or to move in kleptomaniac circles. It is a sort of hall-mark of aristocracy, and though it is, doubtless, annoying at times to lose one's valuables, there is some degree of satisfaction in knowing that it has been done by some one who could afford to follow impulse. It is like being kicked by a prince of the blood, something to be proud of rather than to resent.

Historical Sketches

(Heroes of the past and present, over whose performances have been diffused that coloring and suggestion which stimulate the mind of the sagacious reader to a determination of what should be rejected and what be received.)

BY THEODORE BONNET.

Edward VII of England was in no way related to his predecessor, Edward the Confessor. The race of Cerdic and Alfred the Great expired with the childless King, and over his silent clay was written defunctus est in the Abbey of Westminster. It might have been written in the national tongue, but then everybody would have understood it, and some cynic of the common herd would probably have been curious to know the wherefore of the obvious. Some ignorant people imagine that every unnecessary declaratory sentence is cryptic and calls for solution. As a matter of fact Edward VII is known to fame as Edward the Unconfessor, a title justly earned and without ostentation, in the heat of a divorce suit when he elevated perjury to the dignity of the fine arts with one stroke of his tongue. The inscription on his tombstone is vive la bagatelle.

Washington Dodge is an illustrious historical exemplification of the fact that a public servant may be a Paragon of Virtue under difficulties and not without justification in his own eyes. Those who dissented from popular esteem were considered as unholy, regardless of the fact that their dissent might have been founded on personal experience, which is quite frequently more reliable as a basis for appraisal than negative testimony. However, Washington Dodge was the idol of the people, but it may not be amiss to assert that he was not able to wield a hatchet before his christening, but that he tried to live up to his whole name. History, it has been said, is philosophy teaching by examples. It is presumed that Washington Dodge never read the history of his era, for if he had he would have appreciated the philosophy of the vivid example to be found in the political career of that pathetic figure, Henry T. Gage, a good man, of noble parts, worthy of high esteem, who in an evil moment plunged headlong into a libel suit.

The two most conspicuous figures in the dawn of the twentieth century were Theodore Roosevelt, President of the American Republic (expanded) and William Hohenzollern, War Lord of the German Empire. If we consider the age in which they lived, the versatility of their talents, the strenuousness of their activities and the character of their conquests, and then ask ourselves which was the greater genius, we shall feel constrained to equivocate.

On the other hand, if we consider who Napoleon and Wellington were, the strength of their respective armies, and the opportunities they enjoyed, and then ask ourselves which displayed the greater generalship at Waterloo, we shall be obliged to reply in the affirmative.

As to Jimphelan, the great civic patriot, there is much to be said, but what's the use? The moral that a study of his career points is obvious. He flourished at the close of the nineteenth century and went into decay in the dawn of the twentieth. His memory is perpetuated in bronze, erected at his own expense, for he was a great philanthropist, giving his sympathies ever to him who needed them most. If we consider who Jimphelan and Geneschmitz were, the age in which they lived, and the evil example given by the people in the worshiping of Mammon in whatsoever guise the monster appeared, and then ask ourselves if the American Nero was as bad as he was painted by his contemporaries, we are constrained to reply that, as he had the opportunity to observe the deification of his rival, and ponder the lesson thereof, the temptation to attain the end regardless of the means was almost irresistible. History not only repeats itself, but reiterates and tautologizes, until redundancy bores.

As between Hamilton and Burr there is much to be said. Each was a man of character, and both possessed traits without either being a traitor to himself. But to sum them up briefly we must consider Gertrude Atherton's viewpoint, and Gertrude is now delving effeminately into Aaron Burr's past. Let us hope that she is not fickle.

Taking a retrospective glance into the remote and immediate past, and giving Washington the precedence as to time, place, circumstance and achievement, we can scarcely justify the conclusion that he was a plagiarist when he wrote that famous letter so dear to the hearts of his countrymen. There is not a scintilla of evidence tending to show that he had ever been presented with the eighty-seven volumes of the works of Theodore Roosevelt. Moreover, Washington enjoyed the distinction of being the first President suspected of imperialism. And yet it would hardly be fair to say that when Theodore rejected a second term before opening his first he stole Washington's thunder.

Though as early as the fifteenth century one Columbus, a sailor, promulgated the theory that the earth could be circumnavigated, and pointed the way, it was not until five centuries later that a very densely populated country was discovered in the Far East. It appears that the country was known long before the Christian era, but in the rush and bustle of subsequent civilization it was lost. The credit of the discovery is due to a Russian Admiral who had been cruising near Port Arthur. It is recorded that he was very much surprised.

The history of the American Republic is a long story. And throughout, fiction and fact are so beautifully blended that it is difficult to separate one from the other without spoiling the symmetry of the whole. The Republic became a World Power by easy stages, all of which it justified on high moral grounds. To give vraisemblance to the conceit, it was often found necessary to color the facts. The people abhorred consistency, and, therefore, though they once adopted "Remember the Maine!" as their slogan, they most diligently applied themselves to the effacement of the memory of the Maine after the phrase had become slightly shopworn. It should be explained in a footnote that the Maine was an American vessel which was sunk in the harbor of Cuba by an emissary of the King of Spain for the express purpose of provoking the Republic to a declaration of hostilities. At that time Spain had an antiquated navy, and the King wanted it blown out of the water so that he might induce the legislature to make an appropriation for a new one. The ruse was successful, and thereafter the Americans refrained from raising the Maine out of respect to the King's feelings.

Open Letters to Men of Mark. No. 3.

ADDRESSED TO HIS MAJESTY KWANG-SU, SON OF HEAVEN AND EMPEROR OF CHINA, IN RELATION TO THE PROPER DISPOSITION OF HIS DOWAGER AUNT AND THE REGULATION OF HIS FINANCES.

BY DEMOCRITUS.

My Dear Emperor,

I have delayed writing to you in the hope that I might have the opportunity of congratulating you on the passing of your amiable aunt. You will remember that our last conversation was almost wholly concerned with a discussion of her majesty's good health and the expression of our mutual regret that you have been so long denied the pleasure of worshiping her tablet in the temple of your ancestors. We both agreed, you will recall, that Tsi An had lagged superfluous far too long on the Chinese stage, and that an overdose of something rough on dowagers would make for the permanent good of the Empire. It appears, however, that you have failed in the courage of your convictions, and that the old lady still lives. It is your own fault. If your uncle's widow persists much longer the conspiracy against the Manchus will gather such head that you will be unable to head it off and the chances are that you will lose your own head. Pardon the seeming levity of my prediction; but as Mencius has expounded in his wise precepts: "When Princes hesitate they jest with destiny." No one knows better than you do that as long as Aunt Tsi sits on the dragon throne the Son of Heaven must remain in eclipse. If this is treason, let the old woman make the most of it. I write to you as a personal friend and from a safe distance.

I hear that the palaces of the Forbidden City are to be wired for electricity. If you could manage to let it be known to the Board of Rites, or whatever department has charge of this contract, that there is more money in a concession for a gas plant, I think your aunt would soon require the tablet of which we were speaking. As you know, she is strenuously opposed to all things Western and modern. Her conservatism would undoubtedly induce her to ignore the mechanical devices for the regulation of the gas supply. Unquestionably she would insist upon the primitive and established method of extinguishing light, and if she blows out the gas she will sleep with her ancestors and you will reverence her as one of yours. I know an experienced gas man who has assisted in asphyxiating a large number of estimable citizens with an especially deadly kind of monoxide. I am sure that he would willingly accept the palace concession, and I can recommend a plumber who knows his business. What you need and what China needs, at this crisis, is a gas man and a plumber.

During one of our audiences you asked me to investigate and inform you concerning the great American science of graft, with a view to comparison with the Chinese process of squeeze. Since my return to America I find that a certain mandarin of Boston, Thomas W. Lawson, has undertaken to explain the methods of the larger graft of this country. I send you a pamphlet containing the expose of the financial mandarin. You can have it translated by some of the literati of the Han-lin.

You will find, I think, that the American system of graft is very similar, in its results at any rate, to the Chinese squeeze. The difference is mainly in the fundamental terms. In your country these are embraced in the comprehensive designation "cumshaw." In my country we refer to the same thing as a "rake-off." The word "cumshaw" is defined in the Chinese lexicons as a derivative of "kan seay," grateful thanks, but other authorities declare that it is pidgin-English corruption of the word "commission." Our compound "rake-off" is an idiom probably originally used by the owners of gambling hells to indicate their share of bets on the games—a legitimate profit to the house because the amount was absolutely fixed and published for the information of all players.

In the vernacular of squeeze and graft the terms "cumshaw" and "rake-off" are synonymous in that they are both descriptive of a profit additional to the legitimate profit of the game. In China squeeze is levied with a forthright brutality, as the Bedouins of Arabia levy their bakshish or as the bandits of Sicily and Algiers demand ransom. In my country the "rake-off" of the grafters is levied none the less brutally, but it is dependent upon the necessities of the people. It is necessary that the people should have coal and beef and oil and ten-penny nails. The big grafters have therefore combined and organized all the coal, beef, oil and steel industries into what we call trusts. As the trusts control the output of these necessities the people are compelled to pay trust prices. Competition is impossible. The "rake-off" is something terrific. It is said that one mandarin of the Oil Trust, John D. Rockefeller, is richer than your own subject Li Hung Chang, and you have a faint idea how rich he was, chiefly from the profits and "cumshaw" of the pawnbroker shop trust of the Middle Kingdom.

In America, as in China, the producer pays the freight. In China, when the producer has yielded to the squeeze of the mandarin or the magistrate, there's an end on it—the tax for that particular occasion is checked off and the taxpayer is permitted to accumulate another fund to meet the next tax. In America the producer sells his product to the Trust for what the Trust is willing to give, and the consumer pays the price charged by the Trust. The price paid by the Trust is frequently less than sufficient to pay interest on the mortgage and the price charged by the Trust is often equivalent to a notice of foreclosure.

In the expressive and flexible language of our homes and firesides this process is called "playing both ends against the middle," and the specific term for this graft is "the double cross." I doubt if these expressions can be accurately translated into Chinese. You might try them, however, on the literati of the Han-lin.

Our official graft is very like the Chinese official squeeze. In China the taotai or the Governor merely levies a tax and after he has subtracted his "cumshaw" passes it on to the official next higher in authority. Still there is a difference between the Chinese and the American method. In America the tax is levied by the Government; this tax is placed in the public treasury to be used for the benefit of the general community; the benefit is usually in the form of some public improvement; the public improvement is undertaken by what we call a "contractor"; if the contractor is a wise grafter he "cumshaws" the official who lets the contract by "letting him in on the ground floor," that is to say, he shares with him the profit of the work on the understanding that the price charged shall be greater than would have been paid if the contractor had competed with other bidders. These other bidders usually "stand in" and are remunerated for their complaisance. The resultant profit to all concerned is what we call the "rake-off."

You have always expressed a desire to learn our ways. You are progressive and ambitious. Western civilization has always appealed to you, and if you could get rid of your obstructive aunt I have no doubt you would reform your country along American lines. I have suggested how you can dispose of Tsi An without trouble or unreasonable expense. I would further advise that you place yourself under the tutelage of a competent and experienced American grafter. There are a number of these among my acquaintance whom I can recommend and who would gladly serve for a salary about equal to the "cumshaw" of a Salt Commissioner or a mandarin in charge of the rice tribute for the province of Kiang-si. I would strongly advise that you stipulate the amount of the salary and keep the grafter in a cage—otherwise your knowledge may cost you more than a monarch's ransom. I am convinced that you stand in the same relation to the squeeze pidgin of China that the taxpayer of an American city holds in relation to the professional grafter. You never get anything like what is coming to you. Your pipes leak from reservoir to faucet. Your waiters demand a tip for every course. Your system is too general and sporadic—what you need in China is a concrete graft like the American squeeze. Even your estimable but supererogatory aunt isn't quite onto the possibilities of the occasion. That is because she is so conservative. If she had gone in for Western reform on an American basis she would have accumulated much wealth from the profits of her golden opportunities.

I wouldn't advise the encouragement of the American grafter in China—I don't want to turn you out of palace and throne or send you over the pike to the poor house. After you have learned our financial methods, operate the system with your own financial agents. Keep the motor bar under your own hands. Regulate the movement of your market—let the other fellow worry at the ticker. Organize your own caucus and programme your own cinch bills. It's easy enough when you know how and have the power. You're the chauffeur, it's a clear road, the machine is built for speed, nothing can stop you once you're started. Let her out, Kwang, and woe to the clumsy old Peking cart that crawls across your track—be it green, blue or black!

Thanks for the imperial brocade and the diamonds—I have named the solitaire the Dragon's Eye. The sables are priceless. I wish your leg were longer. Pardon me, your majesty, I lapsed into my native vernacular unintentionally. However, on second thought, let it go. It is another playful phrase in the terminology of the science of graft. Perhaps some of your literati of the Han-lin can translate it for you. It is figurative and metaphorical and is the same as if I had desired that the royal leg were of rubber and tensile to my purpose.

Keep me informed regarding your affairs and forward regular bulletins of the dear dowager's health.

The Problem of Satiety

BY HARRY COWELL.

There are times in the life of every thinker when the only theory of our creation that seems at all compatible with the observed facts is this: that the gods being bored by bliss and the prospect of immortality made man to amuse themselves withal. Before the admixture of the fatal fire, no infinity of wants troubled the insensate clay which now stands aghast to find itself between the devil of desire and the deep sea of satiety.

As often happens, what was thus begun in jest is now assuming a serious aspect: there is a whispering of the wind that they who have all knowledge do not quite know what to do with us. Who made us for their pastime are against us, but now and then we playthings get the best of them, and feel the pride of Satan, are filled with holy glee. Here on earth, however, laughter is never long. Man still continues to afford the ennuye immortals their cruel fun, and his ambition completely to turn the tables upon his tormentors may be but part of the joke.

For a moment imagine yourself a god looking down from a safe distance on our absurd little oblate spheroid, in right jovial frame of mind, after your nectar and ambrosia. "Tis done." Well, now, from your present exalted point of view, do you not find the spectacle rather amusing? "Not in the least." Too bad; but then just what was to be expected: no god was ever half so hard to entertain as is the modern reader. Read on, however, and yet your pleasure, as is your wont, by thinking yourself more difficult than the immortals, to say nothing of unsophisticated country folk like myself, and letting the thing be known among your friends.

The gods then smile complaisantly, I painfully, you not at all, at such human comedy as this: One has sharp hunger and food is far to seek, and another sits midmost of plenty but lacks the "best sauce." Ten thousand things are good until you get them. To be hungry for what you have—that were indeed happiness; but they who made us to mock us have ordained it otherwise. Even to the keenest appetite, the rarest fruit grown in earthly paradises savors somewhat of the dead sea. Satiety is Love's bete noire, more insufferable than unsatisfied desire. Knowing this only too well, dreading the coldness of second kisses, a wise woman is never won.

You all have read and read again Theophile Gautier's "golden book of beauty," that "divine chant of the flesh" — and of the spirit, too, if George Moore will but pardon my marring in the interest of truth his well known happy phrase; and you remember what befell the sweet maid, Madeline de Maupin, adventuring life in the guise of a man, seeing men as men see them, as God sees; and how one matchless night she kissed once and once only and while it was yet dream time, even before the dawning, fled the coldness to come. The great Frenchman, the master colorist, the latchets of whose shoes Lafcadio Hearn alone among English writers was worthy to unloose, he who has been called "the smile of a century," in his sad knowledge, makes Madeline thus terribly wise.

But was she really wise, think you? Answer me, maids in blissful ignorance who have never masqueraded into unhappy knowledge of man; answer me, wives who have kissed any time these twenty years. Or is there greater wisdom still—the wisdom of kissing not once nor twice, but not at all; the wisdom of kissing in spirit only the love you have failed to win in the flesh?

"In dreams she grows not older
The land of dreams among;
Though all the world wax colder,
Though all the songs be sung,
In dreams may he behold her Forever fair and young."

I quote from memory, in fear and trembling, for from the wall a few feet away Andrew Lang is looking down upon me with those solemn eyes of his—in reproof, as it seems.

Were I a Gautier, I would make you a sad colorful tale of a pair of lovers I once heard of who in their surpassing wisdom determined to go Mademoiselle de Maupin one better, to borrow for the occasion the expressive slang of the day. I cannot for the life of me make my own of it. Both had aforesaid killed Love—or what, looking back, seemed but his semblance—with kisses, and buried him deep in the pit of satiety, and now the mortal immortal in new form was once more causing his divine madness in their hearts. They were artists both, lovers of literature and all manner of beauty, dreamers, idealists; and had read, marked and inwardly digested the French chant of the flesh and the English song of the spirit; and thought the former wise but the latter wiser. Here is their logic: If to kiss once is better than to kiss twice, not to kiss at all is best. I give it for what it is worth. Men and women have reasoned worse. Accordingly, they decided to live uniquely: to marry but never to kiss, not even to touch hands, and so keep Love alive until what time the angel of the inverted torch should chance their way. With inimitable fortitude they abided by their strange decision, and for years and years looked into one another's eyes and longed with an intensity never before, nor since felt by lovers—save only by me who writes and by you who read. Their secret they kept to themselves and the all-knowing ones. The cynic saw the miracle and marveled; to the unworldly wise the thing was equally a wonder; the curious fact that the flame burned with undiminished heat and brightness was admitted on all sides; not without envy, they went their novel way, though now and then a philoprogenitive friend would pity the woman because she was childless. For years and years, as I have said, this unprecedented state of things lasted; the gods, however, were but biding their time. One day—whether in old age or yet in youth, I have been unable to discover—they looked into each other's eyes, according to their sweet wont, and knew, each at the same instant, that desire was dead. And they had never kissed. Within a week the angel of the inverted torch came their way, curiously smiling; and there was laughter in heaven for the space of one hour. The diary of the woman fell into my impious hands. Sweet shade, forgive me for telling—not however without tears—how bravely and how vainly you and your comrade in arms fought the omnipotent, and how you died, bowed down under the fardels of Fate.

"The gods, the gods are stronger; time
Falls down before them, all men's knees
Bow, all men's prayers and sorrows climb
Like incense toward them; yea, for these Are gods, Felise."

But there are of mortals who have kissed and kissed and yet kept the fire burning bright unto the end. These are the fortunate few who—chance aiding—get the best of those who are "Too great to appease, too high to appall, Too far to call." And the gods, who always laugh the last, laugh no better than do they.

Regeneration

BY MABEL PORTER PITTS.

I know not when it died, this love of mine,
 Its life slipped out so quietly at last
 When all its fevered suffering was past
 And fate, full gently, cut the fretted thread.
 My grief was hushed as though by touch divine,
 And I could scarce believe that love was dead.

Such pain it has endured and yet lived on!
 It seemed that censure from unbridled will Full with contempt had lost the power to kill
 So long the pulse-throb beat with steady stroke.
 New crosses crushed the heart that tried anon
 To lift the weight and, in the effort, broke.

Now love is dead what shall we do, my heart;
 Kneel down within the shadow of our grief
 And beg of heaven encompassing relief?
 Thus be it then—our joy was dearly bought.
 From this dead life we'll let a new life start,
 Grown wiser by the lesson we are taught.

The SauntererWhy Does She Weep?

The good that men do lives after them; but the good men themselves are soon forgotten. How long, do you imagine, will it be remembered that James Phelan, John McNaught, Reuben Lloyd and Mayor Schmitz "officiated" at the "unveiling" of that monumental, allegorical statue erected to the memory of William McKinley? Even at this moment I have forgotten the part that each of these good men took in that memorable function—and I am of the average. All I remember is that they had their entrances and their exits and that each spoke his piece after the manner of such occasion. The fervid speeches of the orators are scarcely cold in the minds of the hearers ere we begin to ask, "What is it all about?" If we of the instant are so indifferent, how will it be with the children even unto the third and fourth generation? I can almost hear the unborn stranger from Lowell, Mass., or the pre-natal visitor from Bridgeport, Conn., asking the native: "What is this figure in bronze?" And my future self notes the reply: "It is symbolic of Columbia weeping for McKinley." "I suppose you mean McKinley who was once President of the late United States?" the tourist inquires, adding with reverence, in fear of lese majesty, "Long live the Empire!" When the subject of the province of California has confirmed his friend's surmise concerning the identity of the statue, the man from the East asks: "Why does the lady weep?" And the answer is to the purpose: "Because McKinley was assassinated." "Then this monument is not erected to commemorate a man," the stranger retorts; "it is to perpetuate the recollection of an assassination."

The Eternal Feminine

Personally, I have but one objection to the statue: Her poise, attitude, expression, all suggest a mute appeal—a silent inquiry to every feminine critic upgazing from the base of her pedestal—seeming to ask: "Is my head on straight?" And vanity, even in a bronze image, is a serious defect.

Lake's County Chairman

There came to this city, last week, a citizen of the State who is perhaps destined to play a conspicuous part in Californian politics and in the development of the commonwealth, but who, until recently, was scarcely known beyond the borders of the county in which he resides. I refer to Mr. C. M. Hammond, vineyardist of Lake county. Mr. Hammond is now a Presidential Elector, elected by the people of this State, but less than one-tenth of the people who voted for him a few weeks ago had any knowledge of his existence prior to the opening of the polls. Mr. Hammond has been living in Lake county several years, and he has a beautiful vineyard there on which he lives the life of a prosperous country gentleman nine months in the year. He spends the other three in the East with friends, conspicuous among whom is President Roosevelt. The friendship between them arose through marriage, Mrs. Hammond and the first Mrs. Roosevelt being sisters. Mrs. Hammond is therefore the aunt of that strenuous young lady, Miss Alice Roosevelt. Mr. Hammond took an active part in politics this year, for the first time in his life, having been inspired by his strong friendship for Mr. Roosevelt, and as he is extremely popular in Lake county, the Republicans made him the county chairman. So he took charge of the campaign, and was exceedingly active. Mrs. Hammond took a hand in the game, too, and both liked it so well that Mr. Hammond is resolved to devote much time to it in the future.

Pippy Wants More Honor

And he will not have any difficulty in breaking into the higher councils of his party, judging from the impression he made last week, on leading Republican statesmen whom he met in this city. Hammond is a Harvard man of Herculean proportions, and twenty years ago he was the star athlete of the university. He has retained the bonhomie of the enthusiastic lover of out-door pastimes and he is a man of rare magnetism. He is now en route to Washington with Mrs. Hammond, where they will be guests of the Roosevelts. Mr. Hammond is desirous of serving the State in the capacity of messenger to the Electoral College with the Presidential vote, but unfortunately that gallant hero, lifelong Republican and indefatigable Native Son, Mr. George Pippy, covets the same honor. Mr. Pippy is a prosperous dairyman, who has made many sacrifices for the Republican party, and the Republican party has long been waiting for an opportunity to crowd honors upon him. It was very nice of the Republican party to make a Presidential Elector of him, but he became a candidate only for the purpose of qualifying himself for the distinction of carrying the vote to Washington and achieving personal contact with the President. Hence he is not inclined to resign in favor of Mr. Hammond. There are some envious people who scoff at Mr. Pippy's ambition, and say that he had honor enough for a lifetime when he was tolerated as toastmaster of the banquet given to the Vice-President of Mexico. They pretend to fear that if sent to Washington he would don his military regalia, and have himself escorted to the White House with a brass band.

The Old Feud

Last week Phil Walsh of Alameda was the program candidate for Speaker of the Assembly, but he has been turned down at the request of Governor Pardee, made in deference to the protest of Henry Dalton, the County Assessor across the bay. What a lot of bright, broad-gauged statesmen there are in Oakland! Henry Dalton is an old-time associate of Governor Pardee in Oakland politics. He has twice run against Republicans for office, and it was when he was a candidate against Metcalf for Congress that the long, bitter feud between the Governor and the present Cabinet officer was started. Pardee stumped the county for Dalton but Metcalf was elected. Some time ago the hatchet was buried but another weapon was substituted. Each of the financial leaders now carries a stiletto on his person. That the cessation of hostilities was only a bluff is evident from the turning down of Walsh. The machine has no great love for Pardee but it is expedient to nurse him, and it would be unwise to fall out over the Speakership.

Pardee Proposes Peace

It has become obvious to the sagacious ones of the political arena that Governor Pardee, unmindful of the fate of Henry T. Gage, has resolved to secure renomination. It is plain that he is mending his fences and making connections with that object in view, but he has a very complicated problem on his hands. Justice Henshaw of the Supreme Court will in all probability come before the next State Convention for renomination, and with two men from Alameda county, which already has a United States Senator and a Cabinet officer, not to speak of numerous lesser job-holders, seeking the two highest honors in the gift of the party, a roar of dissent would in all likelihood be heard. Justice Henshaw is a very popular man, and he has been very active in the interest of his friends during his term on the bench. He has retained his leadership of the Metcalf faction in Alameda county, and if a fight occurred between him and Pardee, betting men would give long odds on the brilliant young jurist. Henshaw has always been a winner, and he has never failed to outmanoeuvre the doctor. But within the last few days I have heard that the Governor has made overtures of peace to Justice Henshaw with a view of selecting a delegation favorable to both of them, and representing that with a divided delegation both would lose. In the event of the fusion of the two factions it would be interesting to watch the sparring for control of the Committee on Order of Business in the convention.

Borrowed Laurels

Comparisons are odious and imitation is the sincerest flattery. I observe that the publishers who are booming the most recent exponents of cowboy literature have selected Bret Harte as the basis of their comparison, and in the case of our own Jimmy Hopper it is asserted, in pica type, that he is "doing for the Philippines what Jack London did for the Klondike." It is the old game. I am ancient enough to remember when Dickens was the model of all the magazine ephemera, and I have read in biographical dictionaries that Poe was once the exemplar of "a morbid school of writers." No doubt it was the same when Aristophanes joked and Sophocles roared; I am sure that Shakespeare had his parasites and that Ben Jonson was a Gamaliel to a crowd of satellites. It is a dishonest practice and the publisher who indulges it is, figuratively, a pick-pocket plying his nefarious trade in the throng of genius. Its result is belittling to the subject of the advertisement. It is always an acknowledgment on the part of the publisher that the author whom he is attempting to boom is inferior to the author with whom the comparison is made. In after years our own Jimmy Hopper will be sorry that his publisher advertised him as "doing for the Philippines" what our own Jack London "has done for the Klondike," just as Jack is sorry that his publisher once said that he was "doing for the Klondike what Rudyard Kipling has done for India."

In the Limelight

Of course these second-rate Bret Hartes and these inferior Jack Londons will eventually perish from the pages of periodical literature as the second-rate Poes and the inferior Dickens faded from the ephemeral literature of the nineteenth century. There is no permanent place in letters for anything except originality and a strongly marked individuality. It is possible that writers whom the publishers persist in conjugating in the comparative degree may outlive and live down the odious allusion; they may even rise to a place where they will themselves be the standard and supply the publishers with material from which to create their lesser folk. In the meantime the new writers must endure the humiliation of seeing themselves designated as the shadows of greater men—simulacra of the Real Thing—hollow echoes in the Hall of Fame.

It Is "Sure" Bad an' No Mistake

Owen Wister and Eugene Hough are the originators of the cowboy school of magazine literature. These writers knew something of what they wrote. They had lived in the Southwest and had breathed the atmosphere of the ranch and the range. Their successors and imitators for the greater part have probably only traversed that vast section in observation cars, extending their travels as far as Albuquerque or possibly as far as Tucson. There is internal evidence in their work that they have drawn largely on imagination for their characters, and the language they put in the mouths of their puppets and mannikins is made up from words and phrases invented by Alfred Henry Lewis. It is a weird dialect that never was on land or sea—a vernacular that smells of the oil with which the literary machine was lubricated or the grease of the pot in which the stuff was boiled. "He was sure set to marry the gal." That's a mild example of this awful language quoted from an unpleasant memory. This use of the adjective "sure" in the sense of an adverb is supposed to lend "color" to the conversation of a magazine cowboy or plainsman. "He sure was," "It sure did look that way"—oh, Alfred Henry, why did you teach these little fellows the misuse of that word? Imagine Charles Lummis writing anything like that! And Charles Lummis knows more about the habits, customs, manners and idiosyncrasies of the Southwest than a whole caboodle of magazine empirics and pretenders. In my humble opinion a frank and unblushing confession of their debt to Lewis by these imitators would help them mightily in the estimation of those who know, even if it did not wholly please the publishers of the magazines. It is some comfort, however, to reflect that Gustave Aimard and Mayne Reid will still ride the range when these tenderfeet of the modern magazine cowboy story are forgotten in the frontier camps where they were "sure never known to abide."

The Cad and His Boast

The Chaperon of the Examiner tells us that, not long ago, she heard a man "boast that he had witnessed all the good performances at the theatres, and that they hadn't cost him a penny." He was invited by his girl friends. And the Chaperon asks us if we do not consider him an unmitigated cad "for making a boast like that." Oh, I don't know. I should prefer to consider him a cad irrespective of the boast. A man who permits his girl friends to pay his way into all the shows that come to town fills not only my conception of a cad but also that of the dictionary authorities. His boast merely accentuates the fact that he is so unencumbered by the instincts of a gentleman that he does not appreciate his own shame. But what about the girls who are so pleased with his society as to justify the boast? Are they not cadesses? If they were not vulgar and ill-bred, would not the companionship of such a man be repugnant to them? After all, isn't it a case of birds of a feather, and if so, why concern ourselves about the cad's boast? However, I am a bit curious to know whether he is the same social luminary who kindly vouchsafes our female quality the privilege of paying the waiter.

Result of a Conspiracy

Poor Mrs. Eleanor Martin! She was actually coerced into giving the big ball to which society was invited this week. Two years ago the Chroniclers of the Quality entered into a conspiracy to coax a ball out of the indefatigable dowager. She had not the remotest intention of giving a ball. But the purveyors of social news, who devote their pens to the stimulation of social gayety by appealing to the vanity of our pretentious aristocracy, began throwing out hints that a Martin ball was in the chrysalis state. When asked about it Mrs. Martin said "Nonsense!" But the scribblers insisted. Whenever they were short of news they wrote that everybody was waiting for dear, old Mrs. Martin to pull off her big dance, and they predicted that it would be a great affair. At length all her friends began discussing the ball and wondering when the date would be set. So Mrs. Martin was virtually hounded into giving the dance. She hates to disappoint people.

Why Not?

That Oakland society women sign themselves "Mrs." is not surprising. It is not so long ago that San Francisco society women did the same thing, and it takes quite a while for new wrinkles to cross the water and penetrate to the heart of Darkest Oakland. Anyway, why should people bind themselves by convention in such unimportant a matter as the subscribing of a name? The purpose is to fix your identity in the mind of the reader, and the prefix "Mrs." or "Mr." implies no conceit or arrogation of importance. The one merely suggests status and the other, sex. Mister is a contraction of master, but it is no longer used in that sense. Both prefixes are used on visiting cards, which are not always presented by the butler, but quite frequently in the first person. Men and women who scorn solecisms do not hesitate, when questioned over the telephone as to their identity, to use the prefix. Then why should the line be drawn in the epistolary subscription if the lady prefers modestly to merge her identity into that of her better half? It is all a matter of taste. I am inclined to approve that breezy Western indifference to punctilio which obtained in the era of the leadership of Mrs. Hager, who with charming naivete subscribed herself, "Yours truly, Mrs. Judge Hager."

Women are more grateful for compliments they know they do not deserve than for those they merit.

Honor To Tyranny

A statue of Frederick II of Prussia, surnamed "the Great," was "unveiled" the other day in New York with pomp, ceremony and solemnity befitting a better cause. There are many reasons why this gift from the Emperor of Germany to the United States is singularly inappropriate and strongly suggestive of bad taste on the part of him who gave and we who received. Whenever an American contemplates the statue of Frederick the Great he will recall three incidents in his career that are directly in antagonism to every American principle and every American tradition. The invasion of Silesia by Frederick in 1740 was a barefaced robbery; his share of the partition of Poland in 1772 made him particeps criminis in one of the blackest deeds ever perpetrated by the tyranny of kings in the exercise of their "divine right"; and the pressure which he brought to bear on the Elector of Hesse-Cassel whereby twenty-two thousand Hessian troops were levied for Great Britain to be used in crushing the American Republic in its incipency, won for him the execration of every American patriot. Of all statues offered by war lords for reverence by free American republicans and American democrats none could be more incongruous than this one given by our most dangerous enemy among all European nations secretly and openly in opposition to the "menace of the American Republic" and its "arrogant Monroe doctrine." The only redeeming quality discernible in the character of Frederick the Great was his friendship for Voltaire—that was as near as he ever came to association with anything bearing the attribute of liberty, and there are those who will argue that even this friendship for the famous apostle of Deism was not to his credit. Frederick the Great is worthy to be revered by the German nation because he laid the foundation of its greatness; otherwise he was nothing more than a royal bandit whose mailed fist was against all weaker peoples and whose diplomatic alliances were in the interest of absolute tyranny.

Furthermore he was related by marriage to the house of Hanover and received ample subsidies for his unjust wars from the coffers of all the Georges, including our own lunatic oppressor. Genuine Americans will not lift their hats to this effigy of tyranny.

"Munching" Coppers

The policemen of Oakland accused of stealing hams, umbrellas, corsets, fire-proof paint, turkeys and other unconsidered trifles deemed necessary to facilitate the pursuit of happiness on the other side of the bay, are naturally surprised that so much fuss should be made over so small a graft. They recite the time-worn comparison between the big thief and the little thief. It is the little thief who is made to suffer; the big thief generally manages to buy himself off. Moreover, these policemen were merely "munching" at unseemly hours in the absence of the people whose property was "munched." It is an Oakland policeman's privilege to munch. There is not a candy store, a grocery, or a liquor house in Oakland where a policeman may not make himself perfectly at home, partaking of the small hospitalities of the establishment—a fist full of crackers in the grocery, and a free drink in the saloon. This sort of thing is an immemorial custom in Oakland, as inalienable as the right of a policeman to ride free on the street cars. A policeman's right to munch in Oakland has never been questioned heretofore.

An Immemorial Prerogative

It would seem, however, that the police code of morals as it is written in Oakland, makes a distinction between daylight munching and midnight munching—the munch in the presence of the munched and the munch that happens like a thief in the night or a pestilence walking in darkness. Some other policemen, who only munch when the owner is looking, observed these surreptitious munchers at work and reported them to the Chief of Police, who promptly procured their discharge from the police force, declaring, however, that the evidence was not sufficient to convict them of a felony. Policemen have the right to enter houses at any hour of the day or night; therefore these policemen were not guilty of burglary; they are also permitted by long established custom to munch on the eatables and drinkables of the trading community; therefore they were not guilty of larceny. The Chief of Police of Oakland is endowed with the average horse sense necessary to the proper discharge of his duties. It is feared, however, that a death blow has been dealt at the munching prerogative of the Oakland police department.

Bruguiere and His Baroness

Poor Emile Bruguiere! While expressing my deep sympathy for his misfortunes I blush at the thought that I am particeps criminis, for I have an overwhelming suspicion that I goaded him into the exposure of the nakedness of his muse to the vulgar scoffers of Gotham. I can only plead in extenuation that those sycophantic, fawning social scribblers impelled me to the deed. For several years they have been heralding Mr. Bruguiere as a composer, a musical genius, and lying to the public about his numerous operas for which hungry managers were boisterously bidding. I scoffed and Mr. Bruguiere resolved to compel the hiding of my diminished head. He hired the Casino, organized a company and, elated over the impending production of his opus, he wired me the glad news through his enthusiastic press agent that he was about to arrive. I replied that when he did, he would receive from me no impudent nod of recognition but a genuine obeisance. I eagerly awaited news of his success. Meanwhile his puffers of the press chorused the praises of his "Baroness Fiddlesticks," of which they knew absolutely nothing. Well, it was produced last week, and New York has been laughing ever since, not at the humor of the piece, for which George de Long was responsible, but at the absurdity of the two Californians for having had confidence in their puerile hodge-podge. The company has been disintegrating and the show promises to go to smash. To the credit of Mr. Bruguiere be it said, his music is not as bad as de Long's libretto.

Baird's Pleasing Delusion

From a correspondent I learn that Emile Bruguiere is not the only backer of the "Baroness Fiddlesticks." More money has been spent on the company than Bruguiere could afford to put up. It has been hinted that E. R. Thomas, a multi-millionaire, was the "angel," for it is known that he takes a deep interest in Anna Fitzhugh, who graduated from the show-girl ranks and was put forth as a star in the "Baroness Fiddlesticks" much to the chagrin of the baroness. Miss Fitzhugh, says my correspondent, is one of the most beautiful women of the stage, but she combines lack of experience with boundless ambition. That she has some backer who appreciates her talent is evident from her wealth of jewels, some of which she reported stolen several weeks ago. "Jack" Baird took more than a brotherly interest in some of the show-girls, and the circumstance caused a report to be circulated that he was the "angel." Then Baird was most cordially greeted by the members of the company. He had never before been the object of so much deference, and so one day he said to his friends Bruguiere and de Long, "Boys, I think I shall stay with you wherever you go with the company. I was never so popular in my life. Everybody seems to be stuck on me." Then he was told the reason; that he was thought to be the angel. His chin dropped, and he sadly remarked, "And I was thinking I was being loved on the square."

The Eccentric Marquise

Marquise de Monstiers, whose renunciation of the Catholic faith was regarded as a sensation because she had given six hundred thousand dollars to the Church, is a woman of many peculiar traits. The supposition of her friends is that she recanted because she was not received with the same deference at the Vatican under the present administration as was accorded her during the pontificate of Pope Leo. As Miss Caldwell she was one of the beauties of Louisville and was once engaged to be married to Isaac Palmer Caldwell. Though their surnames were the same there was no blood relationship. The engagement was broken off through family interference, and the young heirless became furious. Soon after Caldwell was a candidate for the State Legislature. His opponent was Henry Clay, a grandson of the renowned Henry. Caldwell expected a walkover, but his opponent was provided with a campaign fund of extraordinary proportions and won easily. It was generally believed that Miss Caldwell provided the sinews of war.

Is Her Mind Shattered

The Marquise, by the way, has been a very sick woman for over a year, the result of nervous prostration, and her friends believe that her mind has been wrecked by her sufferings. They are therefore surprised that anybody should seek to magnify the importance of her renunciation. They regard as suspicious the statement, "At last my honest Protestant blood has asserted itself," for her father was a Catholic, and her mother became a Catholic before her first child was born. Her grandfather, James Caldwell, was also a Catholic. He was manager of the old St. Charles Theatre in New Orleans, and reference to him is frequently to be found in the reminiscences of famous actors. His son married a Breckenridge of Kentucky, and for years no child blessed the union. As they were very wealthy, their desire for an heir was keen, and they journeyed to a shrine in Italy where the aid of religion was invoked. Presently a child was born, a daughter, now known as the Marquise des Minstiers Merinville, who is quoted as saying that her Protestant blood "has asserted itself." She was once engaged to Prince Murat, grandson of Napoleon's sister, Caroline, but he wanted her to settle her fortune on him and she refused.

The Guests Failed to Appear

It has been suggested to me that there are more serious defects in the personnel of the battleship Ohio than in the armor of that vessel. I have always been pleased to testify to the good breeding of the officers of Uncle Sam's war vessels, and it was probably by reason of my laudation that my attention has been called to an instance of boorish disregard of polite conventions shown by representatives of the Ohio. Some days ago several prominent members of the Navy League, an organization of civilians devoted to the betterment of the navy, and a number of other gentlemen connected with the press and representative of other professions, invited the ward-room officers of the Ohio to a dinner. The invitation was accepted in writing, and the date of the dinner was mentioned in the letter of acceptance. At the appointed hour the hosts were on hand, but not a single naval officer put in an appearance. The only representative of the service who appeared was a marine officer, a gentleman who had a schoolmate among the hosts. After the dinner one of the staff officers appeared on the scene with apologies for himself, but the other officers have not yet offered a single apology or explanation. Of course the gentlemen who gave the dinner are indignant, and they do not mince matters in expressing their opinion of the ill breeding that was responsible for the boulder-like conduct of their ungracious guests. The executive officer of the Ohio is Lieutenant-Commander W. W. Buchanan and the responsibility is said to lie between him and Lieutenant-Commander J. D. McDonald, the next in rank. It would be interesting to learn what explanation they have to make of what appears to have been a positive rudeness, reflecting discredit on the navy.

The Army Shocked

When William H. Taft became Secretary of War many officers of the army smiled. They had observed his conduct in the Philippines, and they were not so sure of his fitness for the job as many of his civilian friends seemed to be. He made his first bad break in the case of Lieutenant-Colonel Pitcher when he was induced by a foolish young woman to besmirch a gallant officer. And once more he has astonished and shocked the army by his action in the case of Lieutenant John McE. Pruyn of the Fourteenth Infantry, who was tried for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman. The penalty for this offense is dismissal. The details of the case were shocking and Pruyn was found guilty. It was not his first offense, but he is a member of an influential New York family and his pull saved him. Secretary Taft recommended that the sentence of dismissal be revoked, and in doing so used this remarkable language: "The record of Pruyn by no means encourages the hope that he will be a valuable officer, but possibly the sentence, if mitigated, will startle him into a change of life." But even with the possibility that the officer will again fall, the secretary does not think it just that, for the offense as shown in the record and proven, he should be finally separated from the Army. Yet Pruyn was found guilty of gross immorality. To preclude a recurrence he should of course experience a change of life, but it is unreasonable to expect him to be startled into it.

Merely Inaccurate

Alfred Henry Lewis, free lance journalist, pet of the Newport aristocracy, and government job-holder by grace of his friend "Ollie" Belmont, is presumed to be familiar with the family connections of New York society matrons. But obviously he is not infallible authority. In the December Metropolitan he is guilty of four errors in six lines. He wrote: "Among the society matrons who have been entertaining this fall is Mrs. Elliot, the handsome wife of Mr. Duncan Elliot of New York. Mrs. Elliot was a Miss Hargous before she married Mr. George de Forest, her first husband." It happens that Mrs. Sallie Hargous Elliot has been living in retirement this fall; that she is not the wife of Duncan Elliot, never married George de Forest and he was consequently not her first husband. Mr. Lewis referred to Sallie Hargous Elliot's sister.

Greenway's Luck

The divinity that shapes our ends has in all probability decreed that Mr. Edward M. Greenway shall close his distinguished career in no sensational or tragic manner. A peaceful wind-up (in the remote future, let us hope), is probably reserved for him, in the quietude of his bachelor chamber behind the silken draperies of his couch. The reflection was impelled by the story which has just leaked out in club circles that Mr. Greenway had a narrow escape from sudden death in Los Angeles a few weeks ago. The gay Edward, as everybody knows, takes a dilettante interest in the uplifting of the stage, and a fatherly interest in the divinities of the footlights. He gives them the social recognition which he feels is an encouragement to their art, and he prefers the society of a soubrette to that of a debutante. The glamour of the stage has a strong hold on the Czar of the social push. When "San Toy" was here, Mr. Greenway extended to Margaret McKinney the same hospitality that won him the high regard of Fritz Scheff, and when the company went to Los Angeles, Edward timed his business itinerary with a view to a meeting in the citrus belt. He was supping with her the night that Humphrey Praed took Mina Rudolph for the automobile trip that ended with the death of that young man. He met Mr. Praed and Miss Rudolph in the restaurant and they asked him to accompany them. Greenway was inclined to accept the invitation and would have done so if it were not for an early morning business engagement. He has been grateful to Providence ever since. By the way, I have heard that Mr. Praed was engaged to a very charming young woman of Riverside.

The Chaperones Played Bridge

The Assembly dance last Monday night was a huge success. Huge describes it pretty well, for there never was a greater crush on the Palace ball-room floor. It was what some of the exclusives would have described as a painfully mixed affair. There was a goodly representation of the smart set, especially of the younger element, and there were those present who depend entirely on the Assemblies for their glimpses of high life. There has always been an air of informality about the Assemblies, probably because of the absence of the grand, gloomy and peculiar dowagers whose presence at the Greenway dances seems to act like a wet sheet on the enthusiasm of the average young person. The chaperones deserted the ball-room Monday night, and gathered at the bridge tables, where they had some most exciting games. Four vigilant old duennas who have been doing the chaperoning stunt almost since the waters of the bay came up to Montgomery street, got so interested in bridge that they forgot all about the ball. They were at the game at two o'clock when all the dancers had departed, and a waiter told them of the hour. They rushed to the deserted ball-room, and then out to the carriages where the girls were about deciding to go home without them.

Mrs. Malcolm Henry, whose efforts to make the Assembly and charity ball a success proved a serious strain, is taking the rest cure, and was missed on Monday night. A great many people thought they were dreaming when they saw the Stuart Rawlings at the ball, for the bavardes of the dailies have been writing about their riding mules in Mexico. Among the prominent buds at the ball were Miss Carol Moore, Miss Margaret Hyde-Smith, Miss Edna Davis and Miss Maizie Langhorne.

A Sacramento Girl

Alice Dray, who was one of the prettiest girls who danced at the first Assembly, only lately returned from a trip to Europe with her brother Arthur. She formerly lived in Sacramento, where her brother Bruce, who married Grove L. Johnson's daughter Mabel, still resides. One of her sisters is Mrs. Culver of Mount Vernon, N. Y., and another is Mrs. George Perry of Alameda. After her husband's death Mrs. Dray decided to come to San Francisco to live, and is now settled in a home on Broadway, with her youngest daughter and her sons Arthur and Dr. Frank R. Dray.

The Older Girls Rebel

The Gaiety Club, whose first dance, last week, was hostessed by Newell Drown, only admitted a few new members this year. Among them are the debutantes, Dorothy Eells, Margaret Hyde-Smith and Carmen Selby. A few other debutantes, I am told, made a strenuous effort to squeeze in, but were told that the list was full. A few of the older girls, who were not asked to attend the Gaieties, are talking of organizing another club. They think the debutantes are running things with too much abandon, and consider it behooves them to keep from being placed too far back on the social shelf.

"Everybody" Will Not Be There

The Coleman dance next week is to be a very exclusive affair, for the Colemans do not number any of the "new" people on their calling list. Their circle includes chiefly the old families like the Parrotts and de Guignes, and the Southern element. Lucie Coleman is one of the prettiest girls in society. Her elder sister, Sophia, goes out very little for she does not care for San Francisco society. But she likes New York and Newport, and is always made much of by her friends when she visits the East.

She Writes Poetry

Maud Newton Woods intends to do some extensive entertaining this season. Miss Woods has been absent from the swim almost continuously since she made her debut a few years ago, for she is fond of traveling and has spent much time in the East and abroad. She is a very clever girl and writes charming verse.

Mrs. "Sammy" Newhouse

Mrs. Newhouse, of London, New York and Salt Lake, now of the St. Francis, where she is living with her dear friend Maxine Elliott, is a very unusual woman. Though a wooden spoon was not to be despised at her birth, she is now privileged to throw little grains of the yellow metal to the birds, and yet she is as democratic as of yore. Therefore, I say, she is unusual, for that sort of woman does not happen every day. Some women born to the purple are pompous and snobbish; rarely does one retain her democratic spirit after having risen to affluence from poverty. She is amused at the attention the newspapers give her wherever she goes, and once, when she read in a London paper that she was good looking, she thought it a great joke and said so. She always entertains her Salt Lake and Leadville friends in London, as sumptuously as though they were of the nobility. Though fond of society and on terms of intimacy with the fashionable herd, she never affects an air of exclusiveness. That she has the courage of her convictions was demonstrated some years ago when interviewed on the subject of the Duchess of Marlborough. "She is rather nice, but she hasn't quite recovered her balance," said Mrs. Newhouse. "She will be a little better poised in a few years." Mrs. Newhouse is a Gentile but her husband is a Jew and is known throughout the West as "Sammy." He is now building a palace in Salt Lake but his wife prefers to live in London.

That Vlasto-Culver Suit

The suit of the wife of the picturesque Vlasto, the Greek adventurer, against Mrs. Everett Culver, for heavy damages for alienating her husband's affections, has been dropped in New York. Mrs. Culver is the sister of Mr. Charles Clark of San Mateo. It will be remembered that when the suit was brought it caused a big sensation owing to the prominence of Mrs. Culver and her father, Senator Clark. Mrs. Culver denounced the suit as a blackmail proceeding, which it probably was, and therefore it is unfortunate that she did not insist on an early trial not only to vindicate herself, which no doubt she could have done, but also to expose her persecutor in a manner that might serve as a warning to people who engage in such practices. The suit having been hushed up, one of the New York journals took occasion to suggest that it would be interesting to know how much Senator Clark had to pay.

He Helped Found the Stock Board

W. H. Clary, who passed away in Stockton on Sunday night, was one of the founders of the first stock board in San Francisco. With the late Andrew J. Moulder and other capitalists and mining men who saw the necessity of such a board, he helped make it a possibility, forty years ago. He was also instrumental in exporting the first copper from a Californian mine, in 1861, with Hiram Hughes, Frank Treat and J. Benjamin. He constructed the first mining ditch in California, and was the associate in mining ventures with J. B. Haggin and George Hearst. His daughters, Ethel and Mabel, the latter now Mrs. Charlton Barrette of Charleston, N. C., are well known in San Francisco society, having been chaperoned during several social seasons by Mrs. Voorhies, who was a schoolmate of Mrs. Clary in the South.

A Joke and Its Critic

An Englishman's idea of what constitutes a joke and the receptive capacity of the Chronicle's editorial intelligence may be gauged by the same time stop on the lens of their mental cameras. Sir Edward Clarke, who is vaguely described as "an eminent British publicist," objected to the designation of "American Ambassadors" on the ground that the adjective inferred "dominion over the entire continent of North America," an arrogant assumption in view of the circumstance that the British dependency of Canada was a more important geographical subdivision than the United States. It is plain to the acute perception of the actual American that Sir Edward was trying to jest at our expense; but the editor of the Chronicle takes the "eminent British publicist" seriously and laboriously explains that we call ourselves "Americans" because Secretary Hay desires to "remove a verbal difficulty growing out of the impossibility of forming a workable adjective out of the official name of this glorious land of freedom." However, these slow-witted people have their uses in this solemn environment—they promote the gayety of those who are endeavoring to overcome the solemnity.

I hear that the Rudolph Spreckelses have not decided whether they will rebuild their country home, which was ruined by fire, or buy a new place near Burlingame. Mrs. Spreckels bought some handsome tapestries during her trip abroad which will be hung in her town-house.

A Brilliant Match

Miss Jay, who married millionaire Iselin this week, is a niece of Hermann Oelrichs. It was a very swell wedding. All the bridesmaids were of the ultra-fashionable Newport set, and none of the sporty ones figured among those present. The Jays have no money, and so the match is regarded as a brilliant one by the bride's friends. It is generally believed that the Jays are of the old Knickerbocker aristocracy but they are not. The family was founded by Chief Justice Jay, the son of a job printer.

Adeline Knapp, whose book "Upland Pastures" has just been published, has taken the Bruce Porter house at Mill Valley for the winter, and is hard at work on some new stories.

"Kurnel" Kowalsky And The King

Colonel Henry I. Kowalsky's intimacy with the King of Belgium turns out to be no figment of the imagination, and scoffers and skeptics may no longer smile, for Kowalsky is now on the King's payroll as "attorney and counselor in matters touching His Majesty's possessions abroad." What percentage of the royal revenues is being diverted into the San Franciscan heavyweight's pocket has not been divulged, but it may be taken for granted that the amount is not little, Leopold being as willing to give as Kowalsky is to receive. The King has been informed that Kowalsky's practice in this city brought him large sums of money, and when Leopold inquired what recompense Henry would consider adequate for giving up his very profitable business here for a time and devoting his attention to the Congo Free State matter at Washington, the San Francisco practitioner mentioned a high price for his services. He had a variety of reasons for doing this, one being that the wealthiest ruler in the world can afford to pay well, and another being that if his financial figure, unlike his military figure, were small, Leopold the Second might begin to have doubts as to the size of Kowalsky's regular professional income. Kowalsky was aware of the sovereign's liberality, but even he was astonished when Leopold immediately doubled the sum suggested by the Colonel. His remuneration is so big that Kowalsky hesitates to tell just what it is, lest too much envy be aroused. He is to keep expensive offices and apartments in Washington and New York and to entertain Congressmen and other officials to whom the details of the Congo affair will have to be explained from the Belgian standpoint during the coming session. The English agent of the men who are bent on making trouble for Leopold with regard to his African possessions is established in Washington, and has a sufficiency of funds, but Kowalsky will probably be able to checkmate him, for, as the chief waiters at the principal rotisseries know, the San Franciscan has a nicely cultivated gastronomic talent and understands how to keep Government representatives in good humor. Besides, he is "quite solid"—no reference to his weight being intended—at the White House, and to strengthen his influence he made speeches for Roosevelt in Connecticut after returning from Belgium. The military title which Kowalsky won as a member of a former Governor's staff is his now without any nullifying quotation marks, for in the royal decree, given at Laeken on October fourth, 1904, he is addressed as Colonel Henry I. Kowalsky. Sir Henry Heyman's nominal embellishment, conferred by King Kalakaua, and the other titular gifts which have come to San Franciscans from crowned personages, fade into insignificance in comparison with Leopold's acknowledgment.

Peculiarities of His Royal Highness

The King of Belgium may pay a visit to the United States, Kowalsky says, and when he does the Colonel will do what he can to persuade His Majesty to visit California. The King has a noticeable turn for humor, according to his new attorney and counselor, and whenever California is mentioned he extends his arms so as to make as large a circle as possible to indicate the size of the fruits grown in this State. He grins significantly while doing this, for Kowalsky has not been able to make him believe that the products of California are as immense as they are pictured. He thinks that the photographs of the Big Trees, particularly that showing a team driving through the opening in the trunk of one of these huge specimens, were taken from paintings, prepared on purpose to bamboozle foreigners. "Ah! This is so American," he remarked sportively when these pictures were shown him. At the breakfast table all sorts of fruit were set before Kowalsky, who has frequently been the King's guest, the monarch observing with a smile that he wanted in his own poor way to make the Colonel feel at home. Listening to Kowalsky, it is easy to believe that Leopold is a royal good fellow. The Colonel says that the King walks through Brussels, almost unattended, doffs his hat to the humblest, stops in the flower markets and praises the blooms shown there until the women who own the baskets are overcome with delight, and in many other ways so wins the affections of his people that no monarch is better loved. Most of his vast wealth is to go not to his successor but to his people when he dies. He is now seventy, but still so vigorous that he rises at five in the morning and keeps busy until ten at night. He likes Americans, and at his receptions when persons from this country are present he shows that he prefers the American handshake to the very low bows which his courtly subjects make as he passes down the line. Americans often violate the automobile regulations in Europe and are arrested in consequence, and Leopold has ordered that when they are taken into custody in his dominion for this offense they shall not be haled to prison and put to inconvenience, like other automobilists, but shall be taken to the American Consulate, where the Consul may deal with them.

Abraham in the Pulpit

It is not often that the Oakland people have an opportunity of hearing a real English M. P. talk, and even though he did most of his talking in Welsh, the Honorable William Abraham, who is in this country as a delegate to the American Federation of Labor convention, was listened to very attentively by a crowded house in the Welsh Presbyterian church, on Sunday night. He astonished his audience by stopping, in the tide of Welsh eloquence, to say in sonorous English, "Those who are coming in now would better come right up to the front; it may save the later arrivals from being more publicly shamed." He led the singing, too. He has a splendid, great big voice, and beat time as he sang. Once when the singing did not please him he recalled the people to their feet, saying, "Don't be in a hurry, my friends; you can do better than that. Now, sing!" And they did. In discussing the sisters of Lazarus he said: "I don't agree with the ordinary clergyman as to the character of those two ladies. It has been customary to praise Mary to the skies. I think that she must have been slow in household matters. If I wanted a wife for a son of mine today I'd take Martha. She knew how to cook and keep house and those are the things that go to the making of happy homes and to the practice of all virtues. I may differ from most people in my estimate of the ladies but I cannot help it. While I admire Mary's esthetic spirit, if I were looking for a wife give me Martha."

Ebell's Big Celebration

Something a little out of the common is to be attempted by the fashionable Ebell Club of Oakland, which will celebrate the twenty-eighth anniversary of its founding on December thirteenth. The Ebell is prouder of its age than any single woman of the association is of her own years, and there is to be a great celebration and the biggest reception ever held by a club, with the charter members receiving. By the way, if they carry out their plan, there will not be room for even a slender guest after the ones in office and those who have been in office are drawn up in line. There is hardly a woman of any prominence in Oakland who is not or has not been an officer or a member of the Board of Directors or on some of the numerous committees of the swellest women's club across the bay.

Gossip From Los Angeles

One of the wealthiest bachelors in Los Angeles society has caused a flutter by selecting for a wife one who was not of the fashionable herd. I refer to Homer Laughlin Jr., at whose home President McKinley was a guest. He is engaged to marry Miss Ada Day Edwards, a teacher in a private school. She is a sister of the wife of Professor R. L. Green of Stanford, and the marriage ceremony is to be performed in the Stanford Memorial chapel. The Laughlin home is one of the show places of Southern California. It was built by the founder of the Keeley Cure Institute.

Mitchell the Idol

A few women of wealth and social position, having exhausted their enthusiasm over art, music and literature, are now taking an interest in the serious problems of the day. They read books about socialism, and chatter learnedly on the pros and cons of capital and labor. Maude Younger was one of those who had the privilege of entertaining Mr. Mitchell, of Pennsylvania, and he permitted himself to be introduced to many of our society girls, who forthwith began to rave over him. The labor leader must have been surprised to find himself ranking with Kelcey, Faversham, Miller, Sothern and Bellew as a matinee favorite, but that is the position he occupied during the convention of labor. Mr. Gompers, who lacks good looks, had no such experiences as befell the handsome, melancholy Mitchell.

Society Artists

Louise Schussler, who has decided talent for drawing and painting, and has long been a member of the Sketch Club, has set up a studio of her own, where she works every day. The Schussler sisters, Louise and Alice, are both girls of rare intelligence and character. The Schusslers' home is full of fine art treasures and their library contains many manuscripts of historical value. The family expected to winter in Europe, but owing to a suit against the Spring Valley Water Company, for which their father is engineer, they may not be able to go abroad until spring.

Maye Colburn is another society girl who goes in for serious art study, and has developed quite a talent for painting. She never misses any of the art exhibitions, and is a clever critic of pictures.

From Art to Automobiling

Mrs. Norris King Davis and her sister, Ella Morgan, were both at one time intense devotees of art, and took painting lessons. But since her marriage Mrs. Davis finds housekeeping and automobiling more absorbing pleasures. Norris Davis is a very strenuous young man, bent on making his mark in the world. His wife encourages his ambition and even, I hear, rises at the unholy hour of six in the morning to breakfast with her husband before he starts for his office.

Cured by Kuroki

My friend Shokai Nakamura, war correspondent for Nichi-Nichi, one of the moderate "yellows" of Tokio, writes me from the extreme front of Liaoyang concerning the foreign correspondents with the Japanese army. The humor of his letter is delicious because it is unconscious, after the manner of the Oriental anywhere between Colombo and Hakedate; and because it is so serious and scornful. He tells me that the gentlemen representing the great newspapers of the boundless West were very angry with General Oku because that mighty commander would not permit them to approach the firing line nearer than twelve li, Japanese measurement. Some of them, notably Richard Harding Davis and John Fox, Jr., emphasized their protest by going home. The others, including our esteemed fellow townsman, Grant Wallace, lingered a while on the far outskirts of the fray and finally gave it up in despair, and like the fabled Boojum, gradually vanished away. "On the other hand," says Shokai in his quaint English vernacular, "General Kuroki adopted a different policy. When a similar application by foreign journalists was made to him he granted it, and they went to the firing line. When, however, the bullets began to fall like hail about them, the journalists quivered in terror and drew back! After this, none of the correspondents with General Kuroki took advantage of the invitations of Japanese officers in charge to take them to the firing line, and no further complaints were made by them about their treatment."

Tired Journalists

My brave little friend of Nichi-Nichi is quite impartial in his criticism of the courage of the correspondents. He does not attempt to gloss the shortcomings of his own countrymen. "The Japanese journalists," he continues, "have been packing up to go home during the past few days. They declare that the fighting will be concluded for the present by the fall of Liaoyang, and when Port Arthur falls, which is expected before long, there may be no fighting worthy of the name, and their presence in the field will therefore be no longer required. What easy-going people they are! They must know very well that another great battle is expected at Mukden or Tieling, and that there will be a second and third Liaoyang."

Their Feet are Cold

Whereupon this fiery samurai waxes bitter in his scorn of these coffee coolers, these skulkers of the trenches, these lily-livered skates afflicted with nostalgia for the dancing geishas of Shimbashi and the fatted wrestlers of Kudan. "I cannot help feeling indignant," he cries, "when hearing people who claim to be the public ears and eyes preparing for going home at this juncture. Is it not their duty to inform the public of the hardships of the Japanese soldiers struggling with the bitter cold for the first time in their experience, so far away from home? This action on the part of the journalists shows how the Japanese lack the spirit of steady perseverance!" But lion-hearted little Shokai is not of these curled darlings, these sapping quitters, these feather-bed campaigners. Not on the life of a samurai whose lineage reaches back to the daimios of Koshu fighting under the banner of fierce and unconquerable Takeda Shingen! "I will continue to report the hardships of our soldiers," he declares with energy. "I will stay with the colors to tell the people of Japan how their brave soldiers are struggling in the piercing cold, some thirty-five degrees below the freezing point, and the other correspondents may go home." Banzai! Shokai. May you survive all the perils of war and weather and finally escape through the imminent deadly breach to return with honor and glory to Nippon, there to rear a progeny of samurai who shall learn at the knee of their brave sire the lessons of duty and the precepts of one who would not desert his post, even when the piercing cold was "some thirty-five degrees below the freezing point."

It is to Fence

If you don't know how to fence, you aren't the correct thing over the bay. Oakland and Berkeley women have gone wild over the exercise, and Professor Walter Magee's classes are crowded. Now that the Chevalier Enrice Gargiulo of Rome has been secured by the university, fencing will be more popular than ever.

Smart-Country Club in Oakland

An effort will be made to have the opening day of the Country Club at Claremont, Oakland, take on the semblance of a fashionable horse show in New York. The clubhouse is superb and the grounds unequaled anywhere on this coast. "Rockridge Park," as it was called by the Livermores, whose home it was, is laid out with wonderful adherence to nature's scheme, the rock formations are accentuated instead of blasted out, and the trees are very valuable both in an artistic and a financial sense. Immense sums of money have been put into the Country Club. The Golf Club, whose home was at Adams Point, has been absorbed in this larger organization, although golf will be a very small part of the possibilities. It has been claimed that there is sure to be stiffness among the members, for green eyes are not wanting in the two clubs. Out at Adams Point in the old days there was much jolly companionship, but as time went on and the club membership increased, ear-muffs and artic overshoes were called into requisition. No fire could be warmed in the veins of the aristocratic members sufficient to change the atmosphere to the glow of a California summer.

Her Father's Droll Stories

The subject of judicial ethics is once more a question in controversy among the casuists of Oakland. The Athenian sophists and the subtle Greeks are always arguing on matters of this sort. Like Hudibras, they are profoundly skilled in Analytic; they distinguish and divide a hair 'twixt south and southwest side; on either side they can dispute, confute, change hands and still confute. Judge Ogden is the storm centre in this instance, and the circumstance that he permitted a young girl to tell obscene stories on the witness stand is the incentive for the debate now raging among the moralists and rhetors. A divorce suit was on trial before Judge Ogden recently and one of the witnesses was a young woman, the daughter of the parties to the suit. She was called to testify on behalf of her mother, who is the plaintiff in the action. The object of this testimony was to make plain the degeneracy of the defendant father. By direction of the court, or at least with the acquiescence thereof, the witness was required to repeat risque stories related by her father in her presence and to speak of another told to her by a woman friend of her father. When Judge Ogden was asked if it was not unusual to require a girl to give this sort of testimony he is reported to have answered: "Nothing is unusual in a divorce suit," and then refused to discuss the matter further. Some of the Greeks think Judge Ogden was wise in refraining from attempting to defend his complaisance. The girl witness was only eighteen years of age, but a number of Judge Ogden's critics are protesting that a woman's lips may be as pure at eighteen as at any other age and that it is an atrocious exercise of judicial prerogative to compel a woman, young or old, to pollute her tongue with vulgar tales. Moreover it is urged that there was no necessity for minute particulars. The witness could have testified as to the character of the stories related by her father and that should have been sufficient. No doubt Judge Ogden could easily confound his critics if he would unbend to their level, but the dignity of the Athenian bench must be preserved and no jurist is as stickling for court dignity as is Judge Ogden.

An Enterprising Advertiser

A rather clever scheme to advertise its wares has been evolved by a Chicago silver firm. I have seen three letters sent by the firm to persons in San Francisco, and no doubt others have been likewise favored. The letter is in type-writer form, with the name of the recipient so cleverly inserted that it appears to be in the same type as the body of the circular, which reads:

Dear Sir,

Doubtless you will be very much surprised and pleased to learn that at last the list has been completed of the fortunate persons who are to get a magnificent four-piece case of silverware and that you are one of them. This silverware is full size for family use and is a magnificent Christmas present. We hold this case subject to your order and it will be forwarded to you immediately upon receipt of 98 cents, a charge which includes packing and prepaying of all charges (we send goods for less than one-half the amount by prepaying), and boxing (owing to having to get a special box to withstand damages in transit to you and guaranteeing safe delivery and against breakage). There is absolutely no other payment of any description or any work to perform, 98 cents will bring the silverware prepaid to your door. On account of the Christmas rush we positively cannot send this case C. O. D. charges, for we would have to pay Express Co. 15 to 25c for returning the 98c to us, but we will enclose a guarantee with every case that if some one in Chicago call for it and present this letter signed by you we will deliver same to them without any charges for prepaying, boxing, etc., as detailed above. In sending 98 cents do so in 2 cent stamps, or express money order. When we deliver silverware to your representative we do not guarantee safe delivery as when we make a charge for it. Kindly fill out blank below carefully to avoid mistakes in directions:

Full Name..... Express Office .....
Express Company ..... State. ....

In order to guarantee prompt delivery owing to the very large Christmas business it is necessary that you let us hear from you within two weeks or we will not hold silverware for you.

Respectfully yours,

The Secret Divulged

Enclosed in the letter is the name of the person addressed, and strange to say, in his own handwriting, on a slip of paper. Now, I happen to know how these slips were obtained. There is an "astrologer" in Bridgeport, Connecticut, who for a postage stamp, sent with a name and address and birth date, will send a horoscope to anyone who wants to seek the secrets of his future. The three name slips enclosed in this Chicago firm's letters were cut from the notes sent to the Bridgeport "astrologer." This seems to prove that there is a traffic in names and addresses carried on somewhere in the East by clever gold-brick artists.

Los Angeles society is complaining that too many bachelors go to San Francisco for their brides. The latest to bring home a San Francisco bride is Dr. W. Le Moyne Wills who married Miss Susie G. Never in the history of San Francisco have art exhibits been so frequent as of late. And the exhibition to be held by the Guild of Arts and Crafts during the first three days of December promises to be one of the most important of the year. The Guild has engaged the Red Room of the Hotel St. Francis and here they will exhibit furniture, book-binding, jewelry, paintings, porcelain and many objects of use and beauty that come within the scope of the artist craftsman's work.

An Eminent Scholar's Birthday

The seventieth birthday of that eminent scholar, Professor George Holmes Howison, head of the Department of Philosophy at the State University, was celebrated by a big banquet. Professor Howison is one of the country's best known philosophers. He has held the chair of philosophy at the university ever since its endowment by D. O. Mills. He boasts that his department has graduated more world-noted men than any other department in the university. It was Professor Howison, by the way, who remarked that "reporters are lost souls," an assertion that was more widely quoted than any other utterance of the Berkeley sage.

Obadiah's Funeral

John Galen Howard, the Berkeley architect, is the father of some cute youngsters, who treated the college set to a funny spectacle on Thanksgiving. On that day of universal rejoicing the Howard children chose to hold funeral services over the body of a pet cat. The funeral cortege was imposing as it moved along Ridge Road, and the headstone, borne in a wagon drawn by a dog, was a feature of the procession. The obituary was written by seven-year-old Miss Howard and was cut on the small headstone by a local tombstone man who could not resist the cajollery of the tiny maiden. It read:

"Here lies the body of Obadiah Galen Howard, Aged about one year. He had fits.

"He who struggled in life
But is peaceful in death."

"N. B. This is what Mr. Gayley calls a 'couplet' because it has two lines."

The funeral services were rather lengthy and one small visitor, becoming weary, tried to steal away through the back gate. But the principal mourner pounced upon her in much the same way as the defunct, whom they were laying away, would have darted upon a mouse, and shook her in sudden wrath.

"When I asked you to my funeral," she said, "I expected you to stay until it was over, and you've got to, that's all."

Armes on Gayley

From Ashton Stevens' criticism of Professor Gayley's play, "The Star of Bethlehem," I judged that the drama was in the nature of a bore, but the critic's viewpoint was that of the unacademic theatregoer. He did not consider that Professor Gayley's aim was to produce dramatic "literature." Mr. Stevens lacks the perceptive faculty of William Dallam Armes, who is an associate of Gayley over in Berkeley. Mr. Armes has written an appreciation of the play in the current Sunset, and he tells us that it is a clever hodge-podge of several miracle plays that deal with incidents preceding the birth of Christ and relating thereto. After reciting the incidents Professor Armes says, "As will be seen from this outline, the play possesses more variety than might be inferred from its title and general subject," and he adds that it is a play "that has interest apart from its antiquarian character, the production of which is an opportunity to be missed by no student of the drama."

You have a very great variety to choose from. Our goods are carefully chosen, are artistic and are very reasonable. Russian Bazaar, 428 Sutter street, near Powell.

"Out of the beaten path." Tom Dillon's Hats, opp. Palace Hotel.

Professor Armes is not convincing. His criticism is schoolmastery without being illuminative. I fancy that his pen was under restraint and that he used it deftly to conceal his thoughts. Perhaps he was laughing at Professor Gayley.

From Daphne to Juno

Those who admire plumpness are much pleased in the metamorphosis of many of last season's buds, who have taken on avoirdupois at a two-forty gait during the rest between winters. The sylphlike beauties of last year have in many cases assumed almost matronly proportions. Miss Hyde-Smith is one of the buds of last year who has changed the most. Last year she was of the svelte type, but this year she is a veritable Juno, and the change is vastly becoming.

A Fortunate Bud

One of the season's debutantes who is being largely entertained is Ursula Stone. Miss Stone is a pretty girl of the piquant type, and her people belong to the old-time families of California. Her grandfather was the famous old Dr. Stone, pastor of the First Congregational church. Miss Stone's sister married Thomas Benton Darragh. Her aunt, Mrs. L. L. Baker, gave a luncheon for her last week and will give a house dance for her in January.

Arrivals at Hotel del Monte for the week ending November twenty-seventh included Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Darling, Washington, D. C.; Joseph D. Redding, New York; Mr. and Mrs. K. D. Bishop, Cleveland; Dr. Philip Marvel, Atlantic City; Mr. and Mrs. C. Frederick Kohl, Miss Carroll, Miss Frances Carroll, Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Harron, Tracy Harron, W. R. Maylan, San Francisco; E. W. Griffith, Sydney; Mrs. L. W. Godey, Washington; Mrs. C. T. Mills, Miss Mary B. Henderson, Mills College; Mr. and Mrs. Churchill, Miss Dorothy Churchill, Napa; Mr. and Mrs. P. W. Clement, Miss Clement, Miss C. H. Clement, Vermont.

Features of the Sunday Call Magazine tomorrow will be the third installment of Anthony Hope's powerful novel, "Double Harness," which began on November twentieth; "The Adoption of Little Bell," by Len Low of Sacramento, the story to win the $50 prize for the third week of the fiction contest; the third installment of the Call's free music lessons; "On and Off the Bread Wagon," by Charles Dryden; "Jottings of Old Lim Jucklin," by Opie Read, in which the pithy philosopher discourses on the subject of books; a story of the logging camps by Stewart Edward White, entitled "The Riverman," told with all the virility which have made this writer's stories of the lumbermen classics; a page by Madge Moore on "Wrinkles and Their Cause," and the regular weekly literary review by Robert W. Ritchie.

The most entertaining round-up held in California during the past decade took place last week, when thirty picked vaqueros from the Miller & Lux and other big ranches near Bakersfield tried to corral the band of three hundred elk that rove in that vicinity. How the elks ran amuck through the country-side and turned the whole place topsy-turvy, and what bold feats were performed, is told in tomorrow's Bulletin. So is the pathetic story of the Princess Massalska, who "dared to step in the Czar's shadow." Other diverting stories are: Strange Ways in Which Air Ships will Revolutionize our Every-Day Life, The Woman Who Received $20,000 for Proving Her Love by a Basket of Old Love Letters. Besides, there is Madame Bavarde's society chat, Frances Joliffe's Talk on Theatrical Doings, pages on Paris Fashions and Contributions from Dorothy Dix, Grant Wallace, Lowell Otus Reese and other notable writers.

Gayley's Miracle Play

Reluctant am I to introduce a dissonant note in the tuneful acclaim of Professor Gayley's miracle play of the Nativity. But, candidly, I cannot enthuse over "The Star of Bethlehem" or the manner of its presentation by Ben Greet's players. I am told by one critic that the performance beats "saccharine musical comedy"; and that it is a peculiar gratification to those who find their pleasures within the wide domain of the intellect. Strong though the temptation be to vindicate one's intellectuality at the feet of Gayley and in the effulgence of Greet, "The Star of Bethlehem" gives us pause. Frankly, the play bores, and it is not unworthy of the players. As a piece of literature designed to convey an adequate notion of the limitations of the early Christian dramatists, it is not without merit. To the student it may be good reading, but to the playgoer it is tiresome. It abounds in all the imperfections that are now avoided in the art of the modern playwright. I must confess myself one of the vast horde of the benighted to whom the miracle play is poppy and mandrake, and I am pleased to know that there is in the community a little culture to save us vicariously from literary perdition. Tuesday night there were as many as one hundred people at Lyric hall who sat through the performance without betraying the slightest uneasiness. They seemed in reverential awe during the serious moments, and laughed at the humor despite its solemnity. For Professor Gayley it should be said that "The Star of Bethlehem" is not his story of the Nativity. It is an arrangement of thirty odd plays and liturgical fragments, and its purpose was no doubt to illuminate the drama of the mediæval period without loss of atmosphere or spirit. He achieved his purpose, and he has given us a play of disconnected episodes and slightly connected pictures. It was designed to touch with its religious undertone, and refresh by its contrast with the drama of commerce, but it is depressing, devoid of a single bright touch and revealing not the slightest grasp of the technique of the dramatist's art. Its poetic texture does not compensate for its lack of dramatic symmetry. As for the performance, there is little to commend and much to condemn. Constance Crawley is not a reader of great ability. Her reading is monotonous and strained. Several of the actors gulp their words and are afflicted with a throaty method of voice production that is painful. But there is no doubt of the genius of Ben Greet, that amiable dramatic apostle who seeks to penetrate the grime and fog of the decadent drama with the sunlight of the Elizabethan period. He has convinced many people of his sincerity, and has persuaded them that sceneless Shakespeare is a rare intellectual treat, and that as he is an exponent of the intellectual drama his players and their interpretation are intellectual and flawless. It requires genius to accomplish so much in this skeptical year of our Lord.

The Tivoli's Latest

"King Dodo," the brightest and most tuneful of American musical comedies, is on for a long run at the Tivoli. As a production it signalizes another raise of the Tivoli standard. The management has been more generous than usual in costuming the chorus and principals, and the result is quite pleasing. The long runs of recent productions at this house have warranted the management in going to greater expense for the embellishment of stage pictures, and there is now more of the metropolitan air in the stage appointments and dressing of the performers. Pictorially "King Dodo" is a notable Tivoli achievement, and the illusion is sustained admirably. The performance is breezy and refreshing, a consummation not to be attributed, however, to any distinct individual triumphs, but rather to successful and harmonious co-operation. The ensembles are the most pleasing features. Willard Simms is no Hitchcock, Irene Outtrim, the new soubrette, is far from soubrettish, and Edith Mason is not a rollicking Piola, but they all contribute to the gayety of the performance. Probably the most alluring feature is to be found in the lower half of Aimee Leicester's personality, which is exploited to fine advantage. Judging from the length of recent Tivoli runs "King Dodo" should prove a record-breaker.

The musical public is taking great interest in the single recital to be given by Alfred A. Farland, the world's recognized expo-ment of the banjo, at Steinway hall, Tuesday evening, December thirteenth. His program will include such numbers as Beethoven's eighth violin sonata, a cradle song by Hauser, Paderewski's minuet, a nocturne of Chopin, the second Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt and the allegro molto vivace from Mendelssohn's Concerto, op. 64, as well as less classical selections. Seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s next Saturday.

In The Limelight

May Irwin is making New Yorkers laugh with a song called, "I Love to Two-step With My Man." Sounds like May, doesn't it?

Florence Roberts is to sever her connection with the Belasco, Mayer, Price management next season, and enter upon a circuit that will enable her to win a new clientele in States that she never before visited. The circuit extends into New Orleans.

Broadway has approved Nance O'Neil's "Magda" despite the fact that Boston acclaimed her the greatest ever.

Dave Belasco's latest play for Mrs. Carter is entitled "Adrea."

It is said that Oza Waldrop is to make her reappearance in San Francisco at the Majestic.

Maud Lillian Berri and her husband, Frank Monlan, and Lillian Coleman, are now leading members of "Humpty Dumpty," a Klaw and Erlanger attraction.

Business Manager Mortimer M. Dodge of the Majestic did not let Thanksgiving go without evidencing his regard for the members of the stock organization. This testimony took the form of a dinner for the company, which was spread in one of the apartments of the theatre. In the evening J. H. Gilmour gave a stage supper to his associates in the company and a few invited guests.

The sixth annual benefit under the auspices of the Associated Theatrical Managers of San Francisco in aid of their charity fund for the sick and needy in the profession, to take place at the Orpheum next Friday afternoon, will be a gala event. Maxine Elliott was one of the first to volunteer in behalf of her distressed professional brothers and sisters and will be seen with her company from the Columbia in one of the brightest bits from "Her Own Way." Williams and Walker, the William H. West Big Minstrel Jubilee, Lillian Lawrence, John Craig and the principals of the Alcazar company, Herschel Mayall, the grand sextet and chorus from "Lucia," with Madame Fannie Francisca in the title role and Paul Steindorff wielding the baton, and the best turns known to vaudeville and the Chutes will be included on the bill, which will open at one o'clock sharp.

Next Week's Bills

Williams and Walker, the Royal Comedians, with Lottie Williams and Ada Walker and a large company of colored artists, have returned from their trip to Europe, and will begin a two weeks' engagement at the Grand tomorrow (Sunday) matinee. While in London, performing at the Shaftesbury, they were commanded to appear before the King and Queen of England. Very few performers have received this mark of approval and distinction. Their engagement at the Shaftesbury, which is one of the largest and most fashionable of London, tested the capacity of that theatre for nearly eight months. The new "In Dahomey" is a fresh version of the "coon opera" by Jesse A. Shipp and Will Marion Cook. It is crowded with melodious Southern melodies, eccentric dances and plantation patter. Many musical numbers are also interpolated during the action of the comedy. The prices for this engagement will be twenty-five cents, fifty cents, seventy-five cents and one dollar. There will be the usual Saturday matinees.

"The Suburban," one of the greatest melodramas of the age, will be presented at the Central theatre on next Monday night with a cast of two hundred people, over a half of which are speaking parts. This is one of the most pretentious efforts on the part of the Central management and should meet with great success as no expense will be spared in staging the production in a manner that has never before been equaled. Herschel Mayall, cast in the role of the millionaire's son, will have a characterization that calls for a great display of histrionic ability. It is peculiarly adapted to Mr. Mayall's magnetic personality. The great scene in "The Suburban" is the race course with its grand stand, judges' box, the tallyhos, and the race horses, of which there are six. These animals are driven across the stage at full speed and the effect should be startling in the extreme. The story is cleverly woven around a refreshing love story, the characters are all real and the production should prove an immense drawing card.

"The Senator," the play made famous by W. H. Crane, will be presented for the first time in stock, at the Majestic. It is one of the cleverest plays that has ever been written on American political life. The Board of Relief of the Native Daughters of the Golden West has taken the Majestic for Tuesday evening, on which occasion they will take a benefit for the purpose of raising funds to liquidate the indebtedness on the Home of the Order. The San Francisco Commercial Travelers will follow on Wednesday evening with a benefit.

"King Dodo" remains at the Tivoli.

Mary Shaw, remembered for her starring tour in Ibsen's "Ghosts," will make her first vaudeville appearance in this city at the Orpheum next week, in a little skit entitled "The Silent System." The Dillon brothers, John and Henry, makers and repairers of popular songs, will return after an absence of two years. Howard's ponies and dogs; Marvelous Frank and Little Bob in a novel gymnastic turn, which will introduce "Tip," an acrobatic dog, and Phyllis Allen, contralto, will be new.

At the Chutes the newcomers will be the Hart Company of mystifiers and illusionists, direct from the New York Roof Garden; Holmes and Deane, the "little Hussars," in a high class musical specialty, and Lillian Levy, a clever and vivacious sou-brette.

In Financial Circles

Thanksgiving day reduced the "Board" days to what the brokers call a short week, otherwise the volume of business would probably have equaled that of the previous week. Bond sales amounted to $248,000; Stocks to 14,770 shares, as follows: 85 Lighting, 180 Spring Valley Water, 1,780 Miscellaneous, 125 Bank shares and 12,600 Sugars. Quotations, with the exception of Oceanic Steamship Co.'s stock and Sugars, show no change of note. Oceanic, under persistent bidding, advanced to $10. It looks as if there were something in the air. The company is carrying an enormous overdraft which if called in would wipe out the whole stock, yet buying orders are thick and fast.

Sugar stocks furnished seven-eighths of all the trading. Pauhaui declared a regular monthly dividend of 15 cents per share; the stock advanced to $21. This dividend, I understand, constitutes but a small part of the earnings of the company, hence the prospect of an early rise is among the probabilities. Makaweli came in for a good advance to $33. The dividend has not been declared so far, but this will surely be done at the next directors' meeting, to be held in a few days. Hawaiian Commercial remains stationary at $74. Honokaa advanced to $19.1-4. Hutchinson to $15.7-8. The latter attracted considerable attention, caused by the fact of the company's being no longer in debt. Raw sugar remained unchanged at 43-4 cents; all signs point to further advances.

Reviews of several concerts are left out this week, owing to lack of space. They will appear in the next issue.

A Thomas Play

One of Augustus Thomas's plays that goes quite as well in stock as it did with a star cast is "In Mizzoura," which has been given several times in this city, and never appears to lose in interest. The Majestic company fits admirably into the various characters, all so different and all so typically American. Gilmour as the Sheriff is finely cast and Miss Block is a sweet and womanly Kate. To Miss Esmond and Mestayer fall the comedy roles, and MacVicars has the strong character part of Joe Vernon. The scenery is not a small part of the evening's enjoyment, being complete in every detail.

A Bill Worth While

This is one of the weeks in which Orpheum patrons, the most hypercritical of them, go away satisfied with the management. None but a person of exceptional vaudeville talent could make a superior impression with his individuality in the fast company that trips through this week's bill. Last week John Drew's brother Sidney, and McKee Rankin's daughter, pierced the smoky atmosphere like a beam of light from a battleship, but this week their radiance is not so glaring for there are others. One is Sam Elton, who made the Shah laugh, which isn't saying much for his Turkish Highness. If he hadn't made him laugh the circumstance might have been worth talking about. Mr. Elton appeals for the loud guffaw and he gets it, not to speak of the interior chuckle. Then there is Mr. de Lion who juggles balls in a way that makes you think that perhaps he has hypnotized you into not seeing. And there is good music this week, approximating the kind that Will Greenbaum lures society with occasionally. It is supplied by Marguerite Le Roy and Signor Ricci.

Miss Eleanor Haber will give a monologue recital on December fourteenth. Miss Haber attended the Summer School at Berkeley this year, and from her studies obtained many new ideas which she will embody in her monologue entertainment.

MISS MARY SHAW,

The distinguished legitimate actress and exponent of Ibsen, who will make her vaudeville debut in this city at the Orpheum tomorrow afternoon, presenting the delightful skit, "The Silent System."

With The New York Brand

Some very pretty scenery is a feature of "The Little Church Around the Corner," the typical New York melodrama which is the Central's bill. Though Mayall as the hero and Miss Clifton as the heroine, a wronged wife, are happily cast and receive a great deal of applause, it is to young Halifax and little Baby Martine most of the honors fall. Halifax is a boy of the Bowery, a product of the great metropolis, and the tiny Martine is as much of a heroine as the character portrayed by Miss Clifton. The melodrama is well built, not entirely on new architectural lines, but strong in its power of drawing the audience's tears and laughter. Miss Vane, Corrigan and Howell all have good parts.

"The Christian" Again

It is surprising what a hold "The Christian" has managed to keep upon local audiences. Every once in awhile a road company happens along with the Caine play in its repertory, and the Alcazar gives occasional revivals. Though I have never cared for the play others evidently do not share my distaste, for the Alcazar was crowded on Monday night, and seats are still briskly selling for the final performances. A new Glory and a new Storm lend new interest, no doubt, to the old play. I have never seen two Glories or two Johns who acted in the same way. E. J. Morgan is considered by the matinee girl to be the ideal Storm, but Morgan always insisted in slurring the famous kiss scene. He made it intense, but too short. Colville, who supported Effie Ellsler in the first performances of the play in San Francisco, acted strictly according to the novel. Alice Treat Hunt was the best Glory that has ever appeared here, but Ernest Hastings was not the right Storm for her. I should like to have seen Miss Hunt play Glory to Morgan's John. Such a duo would have

HERSCHEL MAYALL, at the Central.

On Sunday night of this week at the Columbia the second German performance of this season will be given by the Alameda Lustspiel Ensemble, the clever players who appeared last Sunday night with highly satisfactory results in the comedy "Grossstadtluft." The play for the coming Sunday will be Blumenthal and Kadelburg's famous comedy, "Im Weissen Roessel."

Nance O'Neil on Broadway

After years of weary waiting Nance O'Neil has achieved her ambition. She has appeared on Broadway and at the fashionable Daly's theatre at that. Four years ago when the Californian tragedienne appeared at the comparatively obscure Murray Hill theatre in New York. Alan Dale, the brilliant Journal critic, wrote of her with prophetic pen. These were his words: "The most interesting point about a not uninteresting performance at the Murray Hill Theatre was the appearance of an absolutely unknown actress, who, by sheer dramatic value, dominated a large audience and stamped herself indelibly in many memories. Nance O'Neil is the lady's name, of which I had never even heard until I went to see McKee Rankin in 'True to Life.' You are all destined to hear of Miss O'Neil in the future, however, unless I am singularly mistaken, or unless the young actress misdirects her career. Nance O'Neil is one of those rare young women whose fragrantly-feminine personality has the power of swaying men and women without recourse to petty stage-tricks. You will be told that Miss O'Neil is quite untutored. I say let her chank her lucky stars that she is so and let her remain so. To be tutored means to be mistress of all the hideously stupid 'business' that is rapidly opening up the stage to ridicule. Nobody would call Miss O'Neil untutored if she mopped tears from her forehead, ran her fingers through her hair to express emotion, gurgled throatily every time she felt tearful, and walked up and down like a caged tigress! From such an education, let her hold herself aloof."

This (Saturday) afternoon and night will be the last opportunity to see the beautiful miracle play, "The Star of Bethlehem," by the Ben Greet players. It is a performance that should not be missed.
—The Playgoer.

LOTTIE WILLIAMS

attained the ideal of intensity. Craig is the Storm this week and his version is interesting, though milder than that of his predecessors. Miss Lawrence is a gracious Glory, but with little of the diablerie with which Caine invested his heroine. The rest of the cast is good in all particulars.

A Tale of the Green Room

BY ANNE THURBER.

When the new leading lady made her appearance at rehearsal there was the usual amount of criticism of her looks and qualifications for the position. Margaret Sexton, who had been the ingenue of the Favorite Stock Company for three seasons, said it was a shame that the manager had gone East for a leading lady when there was herself qualified by experience to take the place.

"And everybody knows that I can't play ingenues forever. Why, I am getting stout," she said to the leading old woman, "absolutely stout. With my added flesh and three years of experience, and the popularity I enjoy with our patrons, who could so well have been made leading lady, I should like to know?"

"She's not good-looking either, if she is stylish," said one of the girls who played two-line parts, "and style doesn't count for so much out here as it does in New York."

"The johnnies won't care for her," said Margaret, with a toss of her chemically golden head, "there is nothing about her to please a man."

The women of the company resolved to be as frigid as actresses know how to be to the unwelcome newcomer.

But Miss Elva Morse did not seem to notice the coldness of their manner, as she stepped upon the stage at her first rehearsal at the Favorite Theatre. She had been a leading lady for many years at various stock theatres all over the country, and was perhaps accustomed to changes of climate inside the playhouses as well as out-of-doors. She beamed quite pleasantly upon Margaret, offered the two-line actress a box of chocolates with the request that she should help herself, and told the leading old woman that she reminded her of Mrs. Gilbert.

The atmosphere became a little warmer for a while, and the stage manager began to believe that Miss Morse would hold her own as no other leading lady had ever been able to do at the Favorite.

He failed to reckon on the introduction of the discordant masculine element. Perry Baird, the leading man, was in his second season at the theatre. He was not only the adored of a large contingent of matinee girls, but the ingenue and all the other women of the company were also his devoted slaves. Perry accepted their devotion as his right. Was he not a leading man by virtue of the magnetism that ensnared sentimental feminines wherever he had played? It was a part of his recommendation to managers of stock companies that he was popular with the gentle sex. His good looks and his histrionic ability would have availed little had he not gained the reputation of being the pet of the ladies.

Before Miss Elva Morse came upon the scene, Margaret Sexton had believed that Perry was in love with her. He had certainly said so, with eyes if not in words. On their "off" days he had often taken her for drives and auto spins, and dined and lunched her at restaurants. He called at her little apartment frequently and brought her bunches of violets and boxes of candy. He had even given her a thoroughbred bull pup, that one of his admirers from Burlingame had sent him. The gift of the canine had seemed positive proof to Margaret Sexton that Perry Baird really loved her.

But with the advent of the new leading lady all was changed. Perry no longer took Miss Sexton out driving or autoing, a deux. He no longer called so frequently at her apartment. When he did call, he sometimes forgot to bring the violets and the candy. Those offerings evidently went regularly, however, to Miss Morse, who was never seen without a bunch of the purple blooms stuck in the front of her coat, and she never appeared at rehearsal without a box of sweets which she generously passed around to the others.

Miss Morse was a splendid actress. Even her envious fellow workers had to grant that. She "made good" with the Favorite's patrons at once. Some of them ventured to hint that she was no chicken in age, and that her make-up could not conceal the fact that Nature had placed lines upon her smooth cheeks that were not drawn there by the pencil. But they all conceded that her acting could not be improved upon. What they objected to was the evident partiality of the leading man for Miss Morse, betrayed in the fervor of their love scenes on the stage. The clientele of the Favorite had long since allotted Perry Baird to Miss Sexton. They felt that the union of the hearts of the leading man and the ingenue was the proper conclusion of a romance they had been watching grow through two seasons. They resented the intrusion of Miss Morse into that pretty love-story.

Miss Morse had announced when she came to the Favorite that she was only to stay in the West through one season. She intended, she said, after that to take a much-needed rest and go abroad.

"And take Perry with her," hinted the girl of the two-line parts. "It looks as if she wouldn't be happy without him along."

Indeed it did look that way. Perry, who had lived in the apartment house that sheltered Miss Sexton and the leading old woman, changed his quarters to the hotel across the street from the flat where dwelt Miss Elva Morse. Miss Morse often invited the other members of the company to dine or lunch with her, and Perry was always there also. She appeared to have taken an enormous fancy to the ingenue, and invited her more frequently than any of the others to her little feasts. Margaret, who could not bear to be long out of sight of the leading man, invariably accepted the invitations, but her heart was wrung during every moment of the repasts by the knowledge that Perry was no longer hers. He was nice to her, oh yes, for that was his manner to the sex; but it was upon Miss Elva Morse that his most charming attentions were lavished.

In a spirit of jealous rancor, Margaret one day confided to the leading old lady that she was sure there was "something up" between Perry and Elva.

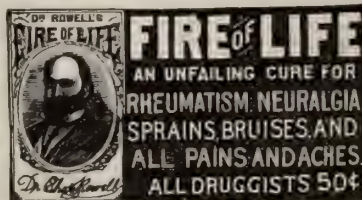

"It's a sin and a shame if it is," said the leading old lady, "for if ever there was a company that never had a scandal in its ranks it is the Favorite. If what you say is true, then I shall tell the manager. But you must be sure it's true. Are you quite sure that he lives in the flat?"

"Yes, I'm sure. I saw him myself on several separate occasions, coming out of there early in the morning, and going in late at night."

The leading old lady, had she been a society woman, would have been foremost among the tabbles who sit on the hotel verandas and destroy with a few words the reputations of buds and matrons. She did not go at once to the manager, but consulted with a reporter on one of the daily papers, to whom she was indebted for several effulgent press notices. She let the reporter do the rest.

He knew his business. He consulted with the head of his organ, and then went to the manager of the Favorite. The manager was shocked at his story, but it was his duty as the manager of a strictly moral stock theatre to see that nothing like scandal, even a breath of it, should hover around his immaculate playhouse. He visited the hotel of his leading man; Perry was not in. He called on his leading lady; she was not at home. It was the week of rest for Mr. Baird and Miss Morse, for the theatre was playing a farce in which there were no suitable parts for them.

The wires were brought into requisition, with the result that it was discovered that persons answering to the description of Miss Morse and Mr. Baird were enjoying the fishing season at Tahoe. Even then the manager would not act too hastily. He waited a day or so, until the wanderers' return, and then notified them that he would like to see them on a matter of business on a certain day, at a stated hour.

Everything was very regular. Miss Morse did not deny that she had taken a journey in Mr. Baird's company. Mr. Baird said nothing either way. Both appeared to be amused at the inquiry. Had it not been for Margaret Sexton, the affair would have ended without publicity, and the patrons of the Favorite would still have been enjoying the excellent acting of their popular leading people. But Margaret's jealousy got the better of her discretion. She blurted the whole thing out at rehearsal one day: her suspicions, her discoveries, her imaginings, the manager's wires—all the tale was extracted from her without difficulty by the circle of wondering actors and actresses. Miss Morse and Perry had not yet arrived at the theatre. As they discussed the story, all Miss Morse's kind acts were forgotten. All the courtesies she had shown them, the generosity she had displayed toward them on many occasions, were no longer remembered. The company was metamorphosed into a pack of wolves falling upon the leading lady's reputation and tearing it to shreds. Perry, being a man, came in for general commiseration. They unanimously agreed that he had been made the victim of a vampire, an aged, ugly old creature who had exerted her fascinations to his undoing.

In the midst of their chatter, Miss Morse entered, smiling, lovely, gracious and well-gowned. Perhaps her very beauty inspired further envy and malice. They all fell away from her as if she had the plague. She saw at once that something had occurred to make them her enemies, but she had forgotten all about the manager's interview that had so peacefully ended. She could not imagine what was the matter. But she turned to Margaret Sexton.

"Margaret, my dear," she said, "you are my friend. Tell me, girlie, what this is all about."

Margaret, aghast at the tempest she had raised, could do nothing but sob. The girl of two-line parts came to the rescue. It is true she had eaten the leading lady's chocolates and partaken of rarebits and creamed oysters at her flat, but old friends could not be cast aside for new favorites. She was loyal to the ingenue. She burst out with the cruel tale, and be sure it lost nothing in dramatic emphasis in the telling. The mild blue eyes of the leading lady gleamed with anger for the space of an instant. Then they softened. She turned to the sobbing ingenue.

"So you believed that of me," she said; "and I thought you were my friend. Perry," turning to the leading man, "shall I tell them now?"

He nodded.

The leading lady drew herself up to her full height, and she was of imposing inches. With the manner she assumed when enacting the role of a royal princess she said:

"I had not meant to tell you so soon. You see I am only to be here two weeks longer. However, since you will have it, you shall know all."

The curious actors and actresses gathered about her. Margaret only stood aloof.

"I am no longer young, as you have suggested," she said, smiling sadly at the girl of two-line parts, "but that is one of the things no one can help. We can't stay young, even on the stage. I am the mother of a son—he is a leading man. For two years I had not seen him. The opportunity was given me to become a member of the company of which he was leading actor. Nobody knew he was my son. It is not likely the manager would have let me play leads to my boy. Isn't it ridiculous? So I did not tell him—and I came. You know all now," she turned to Perry Baird, who came and stood proudly beside her. "This is my son. I am his mother."

Mansfeldt Club Concert

There was a deal of music as the attraction last Friday evening. The Mansfeldt Club's second piano recital drew a large audience to Steinway hall, and the hearers enjoyed a very fine program. Four of the members of the club contributed the entertainment, which was marked by considerable variety. Miss Ethel Duke played the first number, three of Zarembski's compositions, a dreamy Berceuse, a Serenade Espagnole and a Valse-Caprice. Miss Duke's playing is noticeable for its strength, joined with a remarkable delicacy of touch. I believe this is a characteristic of the Mansfeldt technic, which gives so much power to the student, but does not detract from the lightness of touch. Strength and delicacy are beautifully blended. The best of Miss Duke's interpretations was the Serenade, a composition full of exquisite sentiment. The second number was contributed by Miss Helen Stocking, and appeared to have been selected with a desire to show the player's versatility. It included the Liebestreu, op. 3, by Brahms, Liebling's Tanz-Arbeske, op. 3, Chant Polonais No. 5, Chopin-Liszt, and the seventh Hungarian Rhapsody, by Liszt. In the first two, the player's work was marred by an excessive self-consciousness and the mechanism of playing was so constantly apparent as to detract much from the pleasure one might have derived from the admirable interpretation. It was as if the audience were given a glimpse of the wires working the marionette. But the Chopin-Liszt and Liszt compositions were evidently labors of love to the pianist, and were given with entire absence of the self note that spoiled the preceding selections. Miss Stocking is essentially an intellectual pianist, and she has learned the technic of her art well. Soul is what she lacks, and that may come as her years increase. Miss Joan Baldwin gave a pleasing interpretation of four of Albert Elkus's graceful compositions—"Rosamond" and "Cleopatra" from the suite "Dream of Fair Women"; the "Lady of Shalott," and Bagatelle. Decidedly the artist of the evening was Miss Fernanda Pratt. Miss Pratt gave but three compositions—Schumann's "Vogel als Prophet," the Prelude op. 27, No. 3, by Liadow, and the twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody of Liszt, but those were sufficient to show the artistic worth of her playing. She has intellectuality and sympathy of interpretation to a marvelous degree, and her technic is superb. Her arm and wrist movements remind one of Carreno and Aus der Ohe, the wrist of steel in the covering of velvet. She plays Liszt as Chopin must have played him, with poetry and brilliancy. Though the entire program was of uncommon interest, showing what amateurs can do in serious piano work, Miss Pratt was the decided success of the evening.

At The Hopkins

The first of the Hopkins musicales, also on Friday evening, was especially interesting because of the fact that Henry Heyman, their director, was down on the program for two violin solos. Sir Henry rarely appears as a soloist nowadays, but gives his time to teaching. Consequently the occasions when he does appear on a concert program are always matters of note. The program on Friday was, in full, as follows: Organ, Festival March, Lemmeus, Otto Fleissner; Romanza from "Zaza," Leoncavallo, Oscar Sidney Frank; violin, Romanze op. 262, Sir Henry Heyman; arie, "Mein glaubiges Herz frohlocke," Bach, Mrs. Wilhelm Buergermeister; organ, Andante in F, Mr. Fleissner; song, "Tis Time Enough," Nevin, Mr. Frank; violin Arioso, op. 17, Lauterbach, Sir Henry Heyman; songs, "O Sonnenschein," von Bulow, "Confidence," MacDowell, Lullaby, Chadwick, Mrs. Buergermeister; organ, "Swedish Bridal Procession," Soedermann, Mr. Fleissner. At the concert on Thursday evening of this week a new singer was introduced, Mrs. Bruce McV. Mackall, soprano. Mrs. Mackall is recently from Washington, D.C., and this was her first appearance in San Francisco. Others on the program were: Edward McNeill Moore, tenor, Benjamin Tuttle, violin, Henry Heyman, viola, Frank Griffin, violoncello, Miss Frances R. Wertheimer, pianist, Adolph Locher, composer, Otto Fleissner, accompanist. In full the numbers rendered were: Organ, Offertory in F, Clark, Mr. Fleissner; song, "O, Dry Those Tears," Teresa Del Riego, Mr. Moore, cello obligato, Mr. Griffin; Reverie for violin and piano, Two sketches for violin, viola and piano, Adolph Locher, violin, Mr. Tuttle, viola, Sir Henry Heyman, the composer at the piano; arioso, "La Mort de Jeanne d'Arc," Bemberg, Mrs. Mackall; organ, Barcarolle, Hoffman, Mr. Fleissner; song, "Good Night Beloved," Oliver, Mr. Moore; violin, Romanze in G,

Those who missed the Fantasie from "Carmen," played by Bernat Jaulus's orchestra at the Terrace Garden on Friday night, missed a musical treat. It seems hackneyed to use the word treat, but I cannot think of anything to take its place at this moment. Those who were in the Garden at the time stopped eating and drinking, and simply gave themselves up to the delight of the music. Jaulus has a remarkable body of musicians, and in the number is that modest artist, Schott, who prefers to stay in little San Francisco when he might be gathering virtuoso laurels in Europe. Another very beautiful number played by the orchestra on Friday night was Rubinstein's "Kamennoi Ostrow." Master Nathan Firestone, a lad about fifteen years old, played a paraphrase from "The Meistersinger" as a solo, showing the possession of a musicianly spirit, and rare sympathy. He was encoored and gave a selection that showed him a brilliant technician as well as scholarly interpreter.

Die Probe Recital

A very interesting recital was given by the members of "Die Probe" on Monday evening in the recital hall of the Von Meyerinck Conservatory of Music. The program consisted of selections from oratorios and cantatas, and was as follows: From Elijah (Mendelssohn, 1809-1847), trio, "Lift Thine Eyes," Mrs. Morshead, Miss Herman, Mrs. Merrill; soprano aria, "Hear Ye, Israel," Miss Ayers; recitative and duet, "Zion Spreadeth Her Hands for Aid," soloists, Mrs. McGlade, Miss Herman, assisting quartet, Miss Ward, Miss Davidson, Mr. Gunnison, Mr. Dorr; aria, "Woe Unto Them," Miss Ward. From St. Paul (Mendelssohn) — Bass aria, "Oh God Have Mercy," Mr. Dorr; soprano aria, "Jerusalem," Miss Herman; recitative and aria, "I will Sing of Thy Great Mercies," Miss Wilcox. From Hymn of Praise (Mendelssohn) — Duet, "I Waited for the Lord," Miss Wilcox, Miss O'Brien and quartet. From Harvest Cantata (Von Weber, 1786-1829) — Recitative and aria, Miss Jessie Burns. From The Seasons (Haydn, 1732-1809) — Rec. and aria, "Oh, How Pleasing to the Senses," Mrs. Morshead. From Creation (Haydn) — Rec. and aria, "With Verdure Clad," Mrs. Craig-Elrick. From The Messiah (Handel, 1685-1759) — Soprano aria, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," Mrs. McGlade; rec. and aria, "He Was Despised," Mrs. Cox. Altogether some fine examples of oratorio work were given by the club, which has made a special study of this branch of music.

Hugo Mansfeldt will present his pupil, Joan Baldwin, in piano recital next Tuesday evening at Steinway hall, when she will render the following program: Robert Schumann — Novelllette, B minor, op. 99, No. 9; Romance, F sharp, op. 28, No. 2; Presto passionato, G minor, op. posth. Albert I. Elkus — Rosamond, from suite "Dream of Fair Women"; Scene de Ballet, Bagatelle, E major; Lady of Shalott (after Tennyson); Cleopatra from suite "Dream of Fair Women." Chopin — Etude, C sharp minor, op. 25, No. 7; prelude, B flat minor, op. 28, No. 16; prelude, C sharp minor, op. 45; etude, A minor, op. 25, No. 11. Liszt — Chant Polonais, No. 5; An bord d'une source; Rhapsodie hongroise, No. 9, Carneval de Pesth.

The concert of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music, E. S. Bonelli, director, was given on Wednesday evening, too late to be reviewed in this issue.

Miss Eula Howard, one of the active members of the Mansfeldt Club, played a number on the program given at the fourth convention of the women's clubs of Alameda District, on November twenty-second. Her renditions of a Chopin Impromptu and Liszt Rhapsody were very enthusiastically received. Miss Howard is a daughter of Mrs. John W. Howard of Bush street, this city. Mrs. Walter Longbotham, who sang, was also warmly received on this same occasion.

Miss Louvia Rogers, pupil of Andrew Bogart, will give a song recital in the Maple room, Palace hotel, on Friday evening, December sixteenth. Miss Rogers is only fifteen years old, but has a soprano voice of rare beauty and quality. She will sing fifteen songs, including classics by Schumann, Grieg, Wagner, and a group of songs by American composers. She will also sing the grand aria from Bemberg's "Joan of Arc." Mr. Frederic Maurer has been engaged to accompany the young singer. This will be Miss Rogers's first appearance in public, and a great future is predicted for her by her teacher. Tickets will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s after December first; the admission fee is one dollar.

Invitations are out for a recital to be given by pupils of H. B. Pasmore and Arthur Fickenscher, in Lyric hall next Thursday night. Mr. Pasmore's pupils who will take part are Miss Louise Smith, Miss Aldanita Wolfskill and J. C. Lacey; Mr. Fickenscher's, Miss Jessie Burns and Miss Suzanne Nicholine Pasmore; Miss Daisy Fickenscher, accompanist.

Mrs. Arthur Fickenscher, a pupil of H. B. Pasmore, was the soloist at the Memorial church, Stanford University, at both morning and evening services and made a most favorable impression with her lovely voice and fine rendition of "With Verdure Glad" last Sunday.

The Wanrell Operatic Recital

A grand operatic and song recital will be given by G. S. Wanrell, basso cantante, next Monday evening, December fifth, in Steinway hall. Mr. Wanrell will be assisted by Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup, soprano, Miss Mignon Judson, mezzo soprano, Rafael Meany, pianist, and Prof. La Villa, accompanist. The program will be: "O Sacra Terra" (Vespera Siciliani), Verdi, Mr. Wanrell; "Love is the Same," song (first time), Paola La Villa, Miss Judson; Sonata (A flat) first movement, Weber, Mr. Meany; duet from "Simon Boccanegra," Verdi, Mr. Wanrell; "Nay, Bid Me Not Resign" (Don Giovanni), Mozart, Mrs. Northrup and Mr. Wanrell; "Rhapsodie Hongroise" No. XII, Liszt, Mr. Meany; grand aria from "Don Carlos," Verdi, Mr. Wanrell; ballata from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo, Mrs. Northrup; "Vi Ravviso," (from Sonnambula), Bellini, Mr. Wanrell; "Love" (duet), Pinsuti, Miss Judson and Mr. Wanrell.

On Friday evening of this week (December second) the piano students of Elizabeth Westgate and the violin students of Alexander Stewart, assisted by Miss Minnie Smith (pupil of E. D. Crandall) gave a recital in the First Unitarian church, Alameda. The affair was invitational.

At the unveiling of the McKinley monument on Thanksgiving day, a special feature was the music by the band of twenty-five pieces, conducted by Sir Henry Heyman.

The offertory at St. Mark's church, Oakland, two Sundays ago, was sung by Mrs. Richard Rees of this city, and the soloist was very heartily complimented at the close of the service by the organist and others. Mrs. Rees has sung at several affairs lately. She has been a pupil of Alyce Gates for a little over two years, but has never given a public song recital.

Madame Gadski will give her first public recital at the Alhambra on Tuesday night, January third. This artist has been selected for the opening concert of the St. Francis Musical Art Society.

De Pachmann will give three concerts here in January. While the Chopin playing of this artist always creates a furor, he has no superior as an interpreter of Mozart and Schumann, and Manager Greenbaum promises three of the finest programs of pianoforte literature ever offered our public.

Among the charter members of the St. Francis Musical Art Society are Mrs. M. H. De Young, Mrs. Frank Sullivan, Mrs. Ralph Harrison, Mrs. Fernando Pfingst, Mrs. M. C. Sloss, Mrs. Downey Harvey, Mrs. C. A. Selfridge, James D. Phelan, John Parrott, W. L. Gerstle, S. Goldstein, the Misses De Guigne and many others of our best known society and musical people. The plan of seats is now open at the information bureau of the St. Francis hotel and as the capacity of the beautiful white and gold hall is limited, anyone desirous of securing seats should do so at once. There are still vacancies on the list and memberships will be received until the supply of seats is exhausted.

Mr. Boyer, manager of the Pope-Toledo Touring Car Company, reports sales of Pope-Toledos as being very satisfactory during the past week. Parker Lyons, a prominent man of Fresno, purchased a 4-cylinder Pope-Toledo, which he drove overland. Mr. Telfer, manager of the Fresno Canal and Irrigation Company, also bought a 4-cylinder Pope-Toledo, which he drove overland. Mr. Boyer states that California will have as fine an array of cars the coming season as any State in the Union, and that large cars are in very keen demand. Two 40 h. p. Pope-Toledos were sold during the past week, one to L. P. Lowe and the other to Marshall C. Harris.

The Pope Motor Car Company advises its California representatives, the Pope-Toledo Touring Car Company, that the engine of the 40 h. p. Pope-Toledo car develops 54 h. p. on the brake test, which is wonderful. The Pope Motor Car Company will ship Jas. L. Flood's 60 h. p. Pullman Pope-Toledo from the factory by March fifteenth. This will be the highest h. p. car on the Pacific coast for 1905 as the actual brake horsepower of the motor of this car will develop about 90 h. p.

Mrs. McCabe of the McCabe Ranch recently brought her friends, Geo. E. Morse and Mr. and Mrs. C. O. Scott, over to Byron Springs in her touring car. The roads are simply perfect now for automobiling.

The first Thomas Pullman limousine touring car to reach San Francisco was sent here last week by the Western Motor Car Company of Los Angeles, coast agents for the Thomas. This car is elegant in design, well constructed, and luxurious in its arrangements. The limousine accommodates four persons, is lighted by electric lights and can be heated if desired. Mr. Hartigan has been kept busy during the past week exhibiting this interesting vehicle to the enthusiastic automobilists of the city.

Information comes from the East that the 40 h. p. 4-cylinder, side entrance Thomas, which left Buffalo in August, has returned after completing a trip through New England and as far south as Maryland, covering a distance of over ten thousand miles. Later it goes to Florida, where a Thomas enters the Ormond races.

Barney Oldfield is in town, making his headquarters at the Mobile Carriage Company's. He has his racing cars there.

Recent orders for 1905 White cars include those of W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., Harlan W. Whipple, President of the A. A. A., H. M. Flagler, of Standard Oil and Florida hotel fame, F. D. Underwood, president of the Erie Railroad, John D. Spreckels of California, Charles A. Starbuck, president of the New York Air Brake Company, Newman Erb, vice-president of the Pere Marquette Railroad and J. H. Emanuel, Jr., of the J. P. Morgan Company.

Winthrop E. Scarritt, president of the Automobile Club of America, delivered the inaugural address at the formal opening last week of the automobile school which has been established by the West Side Y. M. C. A. in New York. Mr. Scarritt, who delved deeply into the history of locomotion, incidentally indicated his preference for steam as a motive power for automobiles.

Among the White owners who made trips Sunday were R. H. Pease, who drove his steamer to San Jose on a most delightful trip, and A. Haas, who made a trip around the bay. Charles D. Blaney has been touring extensively in his new model White about San Jose, and intends to leave this week for a run to Los Angeles in his White steam touring car.

Miss Grace Spreckels has added an Autocar runabout to her stable of horseless carriages and was seen running her latest creation through the park last Sunday. Mrs. C. S. Middleton was seen on the park south drive last Sunday in her Autocar, accompanied by Miss Jean Bruns and several of her girl friends. Emil Abadie and his father, who has just returned from Goldfields where the four-cylinder Columbia is doing such splendid work, were piloting an Autocar about last Sunday.

W. W. Foote, an ardent auto enthusiast since his return from the East, is daily running his Autocar over the thoroughfares of San Francisco. Rudolph Spreckels has not had a bit of trouble with his little Autocar runabout and states that he derives great pleasure in running around in the speedy auto.

Mrs. J. J. Moore successfully took the park examination in her Autocar last Friday. She made a special engagement with Examiner Saville so as to be able to get a thorough and difficult test. Mrs. Moore said she wanted to be sure that she could operate the car under a harder examination than Saville usually gives applicants.

Marshall C. Harris is one of the latest of the local motor car enthusiasts who has taken a fancy to the little Autocar runabout and can now be seen daily operating his new machine about the city.

Ebb-Tide

BY NORA CHESSEON.

The tide, reluctant, draws away
Down the long reaches of the bay;
The children come with dancing feet,
Following the edge of its retreat.
In each withdrawing wave they dip
Their hands in shouting fellowship,
Glad of the last ebb of the day.

The swallows cry about the cliff,
As if they grudged the ebb, as if
The slow withdrawal of the sea
Were pain to their winged company.
The wind fills slowly—as, maybe,
Flowers fill with honey on a tree—
The white sail of a passing skiff.

The seaweeds shudder to and fro
In pools that catch the afterglow;
Over the entrance of a cave,
Fringes of hardy cliff-flowers crave
Colour and scent whereby to own
Largess of sunshine, spilled and strown
Upon them as days come and go.

The wave draws slowly down the bay,
The rainbow-colours die away
From pool and seaweed floating there.
All things are manifest and bare;
There is less magic in the day,
Less glamour in the waves that were
So sweet when they were blown astray
With wind, and white with flying spray.

Robertson's "From Crypt and Choir"

A CRITICISM, BY HENRY MACDONALD SPENCER.

A new book of verse by Louis Robertson strengthens the impression of both the virtues and limitations of this admirable Californian poet. In the mastery of technique and the writing within forms, in passion and fire of utterance, his work is in the front rank of contemporary production; while in the musical quality there is no one, now writing, who surpasses or indeed equals him. On the other hand, there is nothing esoteric or transcendental in his verse. There is a lack of ideas, a tendency toward the obvious, which is only saved from commonplaceness by beauty of form. He appeals essentially to the emotions and is pre-eminently lyrical, subjective and self-expressive. In certain respects he may be well compared to Byron and Swinburne, especially the former, of whom Matthew Arnold has said, that with all his true poetical quality he had the ideas of a country squire; and therefore the application of the touchstone of great poetry found him lacking. Robertson may be said to be the antithesis of Browning, and—to paraphrase Oscar Wilde—so is Browning. (Obviously the tuneful quality of Browning's early lyrics as compared to the mixture of metaphysics and jangling consonants in his later verse.)

Few there are, in any branch of art, who have possessed even in a small degree all of the qualities necessary to perfection. A work of art appeals to us in three ways—to the intellect, to the emotions, to the imagination. Because the art of literary composition most successfully combines these three qualities, it is the greatest of the arts, and poetry is its crowning glory. Poetry—especially in its highest form—concerns itself principally with the imagination; but the greatest poetry is that which contains all three qualities. It is on account of his pre-eminence in this respect, his many-sidedness, that Shakespeare is ranked as first among the poets.

To say of one artist that he leaves the intellectual unsatisfied, of another that he fails to stir the emotions, of a third that he does not fire the imagination, is not of itself condemnatory; but serves to show the direction in which his limitations lie. There are few who have more than one excellence.

In "From Crypt and Choir," the longest and easily the best poem, is "Phryne," a piece of sonorous blank verse worthy of the author of "The Dead Calypso." An excellent example of the author's handling of the Spenserian stanza is shown in the selection given from "The Promised Peace," though the idea of these two stanzas is obviously from Wordsworth's beautiful sonnet beginning "The world is too much with us; late and soon,". The last line of the selection from "The Promised Peace"— has the subtle, indefinable touch of true poetry, the felicity found in such lines or phrases as: "Cold Pastoral," from Keats's "Ode to a Grecian Urn"; Wordsworth's "The light that never was on land or sea," and Browning's "O'er the breast's superb abundance where a man might base his head."

The double ballade, an exceedingly difficult form which few have attempted, is illustrated by one to Rudyard Kipling, "O Singer of the Seven Seas." Though if the exigencies of the rhyme required the use of such words as "perdu," "ambigu," and "goo-roo," another terminal sound would have been preferable; but as an example of verbal gymnastics it shows the author's facility. The point of the ballade is missed, however, in that the refrain should not be a mere exclamation or rhyming jingle, but should be a conclusion or question raised in crescendo movement, driven home with greatest force in the envoy.

Robertson's mechanics are generally faultless, and it is a surprise therefore to see this line in the sonnet "Protean Zeus":—

"And as a Flame entered Aegina's bower."

This introduces a trochee in the middle of the line, is an offense against the sonnet, the most tyrannical of forms, and jars the ear. The accent cannot be placed other than on the first syllable of "Entered" and cannot be slurred in the reading. This line could be easily transposed and made to scan, without the sacrifice of sense, thus:

"And entered as a Flame, Aegina's bower."

Among other verses there are some ballades on popular proverbs, and sonnets of classical myths. The simple verses "Happy Days" have a happy conceit and are truly Robertsonian in phrasing.

While the book is creditable, Robertson's many admirers are still looking for the great work of the author of "The Dead Calypso" and "Beyond the Requiems."

These two stanzas are from "The Promised Peace":—

"Beneath the burden of the primal curse
We toil and sweat, but could more bravely bend
And bear the galling yoke, yea, were it worse,
If we but knew what waits us in the end.
Or if we could back through the ages wend
And hear again the ringing reeds of Pan—
See Cytherea from the waves ascend,
And with the pagan's raptured vision scan
What he beheld of old, we then might bear the ban.

"The gods and myths of Greece have ever flown
From field and mountain and from grove and stream.
Ah no, they live; but we ourselves have grown
Blind to the beauty of the splendid dream
That thrall'd man's senses when the unborn beam
Of Truth's eternal torch in darkness lay;
Before the din of dynamo and steam
Moaned Fancy's dirge and drove us forth to stray
Far from the pictured night into the dreamless day."

The following lines are from "Phryne":—

"Still masked and robed, she in an instant scaled
The waiting pedestal, where she remained
A mystery for a moment, but no more;
For at a sign, the robe slipped from her form,
The hood dropped off, the mask was flung aside,
And Phryne stood in faultless beauty there.

"The marble miracle of Phidias—
The chaste Oorania—seemed to shrink away.
The people cried with an applauding voice,
'Euploea! O Euploea!' for they saw
In Phryne's form the living counterpart
Of one whose Parian beauty never paled,
Until it met its breathing prototype—
The matchless mistress of Praxiteles.

"Then silence followed; as I looked on her,
Methought I saw a likeness unto thee,
And cried thy name aloud; a thousand tongues
Chorused my cry and claimed thee for their own.
Then in the clamor I awoke to find
The dream as fleeting as thy faithless love."

The book is dedicated to James V. Coleman, who, I understand, has a keen literary sense, and a talent which if exercised would rank him with the recognized writers of the day.

"From Crypt and Choir," by Louis Alexander Robertson, author of "The Dead Calypso," "Beyond the Requiems," and "Cloistral Strains." A. M. Robertson, San Francisco, 1904. Price, $1.00.

The Cocos Island Fiction

There is something distinctly novel about "A Search for the Missing Millions" by One of the Searchers. As a rule the followers of phantom fortune are decidedly reticent, especially when the fortune happens to be pirate gold. Either they deny all connection with the scheme or else they put their interest under the head of a search after literary material, and all that the public ever hears of it is a more or less apochryphal yarn in which truth and fiction are mixed in varying proportions. But this time we have the genuine thing, Cocos Island at that, and an expedition which left our own city—and a good sprinkling of its citizens besides. Old Captain Brawn was born about a century too late, else there is little room for doubt that with his dominant disposition he would have trod the quarterdeck and gazed aloft at the Jolly Roger as cheerfully as Morgan or Captain Kidd or any other old buccaneer. He related a most circumstantial fairy tale, as it was, in which he figured as a hero of romance, the only living being who knew the whereabouts of some fifty millions of dollars' worth of treasure, part of it the original Cocos Island cache and the remainder, the proceeds of piracy on treasure-laden vessels from the gold mines of Australia. It is not to be supposed that staid business and professional men were drawn into the scheme without investigation or that they started out on a wild stampede to dig up all the islands of the South Pacific. On the contrary, they made due and reasonable inquiries, and fate or coincidence furnished sufficient corroboration to make it look like a sure thing. Cocos Island is no myth, the original treasure, after leaving Peru, was lost sight of, the Australian treasure ships disappeared from the face of the ocean, and other portions of Braun's narrative were corroborated by circumstantial evidence, so a schooner was bought and fitted out and it cost the investors just twenty thousand dollars to discover what a monumental old liar their expirator was. Those of the company who were appointed to accompany the expedition can hardly congratulate themselves, as did the New Bedford Whaler, after a long absence in which he never saw a single whale, on having enjoyed a mighty fine sail, for a captain who objects to having his passengers speak to each other or to any one else without his approval whether afloat or ashore and puts a stop to chess playing may be an interesting character in the abstract but one would prefer to study his peculiarities at long range. Sufficient to say that the Herman was never out of trouble. The autocratic and suspicious demeanor of the captain kept every one in hot water. There was financial mismanagement which caused endless delay, litigation and expense; there was constant uneasiness for fear the wily old rascal, who kept the situation of his Treasure Island a profound secret, would either refuse to go on, or else desert and form a new expedition, and back of that a growing suspicion that perhaps the old fellow was the victim of an hallucination and knew no more than the rest of the object of their search, and there was, too, the probability that the shareholders in what they at first believed to be a sure thing would cease to contribute funds to further the object. The result, of course, is history. No treasure was recovered and there is no probability that there is any in existence. The narrative of the "survivor" possesses all the interest of a "turkey shoot from the turkey's standpoint." It must have been worth something, however, to have enjoyed the society of one who was intimately acquainted with Captain Kettle and had employed Sherlock Holmes. Had the wily old scamp confessed to his distinguished associates earlier in the game there would have been no cruise to record. As it is, he threw some doubt upon his own future movements, for, the last seen of him, he was departing for New York, where he was to take Gould into partnership and go for his good thing in the millionaire's steam yacht. That was barely a year ago, so the author's "The End—I Fear" may prove premature. There are two editions published by the South Sea Bubble Company, one at one dollar, cloth bound and with a number of photographic illustrations; the other, paper at fifty cents. The typographical errors which mar the first edition will be eliminated in the subsequent prints.

The Grand Jury

Grand Juries are seldom taken seriously in this community. Years ago, during the ascendancy of that cunning boss Chris Buckley, it was made clear to the people that Grand Jurors could easily be perverted to base uses; and the system by which men are impaneled for the holding of secret investigations, and the passing of judgment on their peers, fell into disrepute. Though at a subsequent period the lesson that Buckley taught was applied to his own undoing, that circumstance did not restore the system to popular esteem. On the contrary it served to accentuate its imperfections. And since then Grand Juries have come and gone without disturbing the pulse of the community. It has seemed that they were impaneled merely for the laudation of public officials in final reports. The jury that was discharged last Monday, by Judge Kerrigan, was the first, in many years, to render important public service. It did that when it probed the primary election frauds, causing a stampede among the degraded henchmen of the political bosses, and deterring them from violating the purity of the ballot at the general election. It earned public gratitude when it officially disclosed the indecent thrift of public officials, who had previously posed as victims of unfounded newspaper criticism. Unfortunately the jury was not an harmonious body. Unfortunately the motives of members were impugned in the press, and unfortunately those who were most zealous in the discharge of their duties met with discouragement from various sources. However, the majority of the jury did some good, the consciousness of which should be sufficient compensation for the time devoted to the public welfare. But while appreciating the benefits accruing from the efforts of this particular jury, we are not inclined to approve the system by which men of non-judicial temperament are empowered to hold secret investigations, and without the light of judicial direction place even a transitory stigma on unfortunates who have not had the opportunity to utter a word in their own defense.

An Indignant Missionary Defender

From Mr. W. E. Lee of this city we learn that Mr. Edwin H. Clough's exposition in Town Talk of the missionary graft in the Orient "aroused considerable interest and indignation among the good people of England." In corroboration of this information he submitted a copy of a letter received by him from England, in which it is stated that "the articles in Town Talk show the animus of the writer and of the conductors of the paper." We thought so. The animus of the writer, we believe, was to expose the hypocrisy and graft of certain missionaries; that of the publishers was to give world-wide publicity to the news. The Britisher added, by way of refutation of Mr. Clough's charges, that if the missionaries were actuated by unworthy and dishonest motives, "they would not be such fools as to risk even life itself and all the sweets of civilization in order that they might misappropriate the funds of their respective societies." The writer assumes too much. According to Mr. Clough's narrative of facts brought to his attention while in the Orient, in the capacity of a newspaper correspondent for a non-sectarian journal, the missionary neither risks his life nor renounces the sweets of civilization. On the contrary he enjoys greater protection to life and property than does the average citizen of an American or British city, and he is provided with more of the sweets of civilization than are tasted by any middle-class British or American citizen residing in the midst of the madding crowd. Our British critic, pursuing the same line of logic seeks completely to confound and rout Mr. Clough by pointing to the missionaries on the West Coast of Africa—"the white man's grave"—as examples of heroic self-sacrifice. "Why have they risked their lives?" he asks. "Not for money," he replies, "but for love of souls and love of the great Savior." To which we might retort: Behold the missionaries of Hawaii—the white man's paradise, but obviously the manners and customs of those well-fed vineyard workers do not illuminate the line of logic, seeks completely to confound and rout Mr. Clough, never having visited "the white man's grave," would not have the impertinence to question the veracity of one who had, in matters relating thereto. There is nothing in the Britisher's letter to indicate that he was ever in the Orient, and we assume that he never was because of his ignorance of conditions as revealed by Mr. Clough. He seems quite confident, however, that the latter's charges cannot be proved, for he says: "the editor of Town Talk would not dare to accept a challenge to prove his charges." The editor of Town Talk has made no charges, but Mr. Clough has, and he will no doubt accept any reasonable challenge that the representatives of the missionary societies may care to make. Let the challenge be formulated and it will be submitted to Mr. Clough.

The Great Norse Dramatist

Henrik Ibsen, greatest dramatist of the day, is drawing to the close of his career. The despatches tell us that he suffered a stroke of apoplexy the other day, and as he is now seventy-six years of age, he no doubt feels that the end is not far distant. Of Ibsen as of many another writer it may be said that he has been misunderstood and depreciated just in the degree in which he is thought to be new. But Ibsen is not new. Like Schopenhauer he has sought only to emphasize truths with which the world has long been familiar, and which it hates to acknowledge. Unfortunately he has taken a narrow view of life and is blind to some of its greatest blessings, but his viewpoint is occasionally that of every thoughtful person. The playwright that deals less ruthlessly with our weaknesses, and that exploits our virtues and our noble qualities is always pleasing to us, but Ibsen is too conscientious to flatter our vanity. He wished to recall us from our dreams, and remind us that the actualities of life are terrible to contemplate. Perhaps his plays have exerted a pernicious influence on the eternal feminine, giving her as they do queer notions of conjugal and parental relations. His heroines propagate pernicious precepts of moral conduct, and his writings play the devil with the emotional class of educated women, but the Norseman should not be blamed for the feeble intellects of people to whom he did not appeal. To be outraged by him is to be Pharisaical, and yet it must be acknowledged that his works are not adapted for promiscuous thumbing at the fireside. They are intended for thoughtful people, capable of interpreting satire, and appreciating subtle distinctions. He has not attempted to subvert the rules of right-thinking or the principles of good conduct, and there is really no reason why his name should arouse vague alarm. He has been censured for the immoral tone of his plays, but nobody every accused him of being a prurient dramatist. His sincerity has never been questioned by honest critics, not even by those who found fault with him for continually depicting the gloom and misery of life and for giving us women who stand for deceit, infidelity, lying, hypocrisy and suicide. His plays, it is true, are depressing. If we were to accept them as true to universal nature we would be committed to hopeless pessimism. But whatever be our opinion of the effect of his plays we cannot help admiring him for his grasp of the technique of his art. His plays sparkle with incident, the dialogue is vigorous and brilliant, and his fervency in picturing the gruesome side of life is most fascinating. He is easily the most powerful of living dramatists.

The Censor And His Troubles

The British censor of plays is having a hard time these days trying to discriminate in the matter of drawing the line for the protection of London's morals. The playwrights are seeing to it that his job is no sinecure. To differentiate the clean from the unclean in subtle suggestion is no trifling task in an age in which the evolution of public taste goes on apace. We smile approvingly today at what mantled our cheeks with blushes a week ago. "Camille" is no longer emasculated for the nursery. The Zaza kiss long since lost its tang. So the British censor to avoid being dubbed a prude must keep in touch with popular taste or be laughed at for his bourgeois squeamishness. He got out of the embarrassing situation over Pinero's doll that keeps tab on an amorous young married couple, but not without loss of dignity. Now he is being buffeted for permitting a spicy scene in Marie Tempest's new play, "The Freedom of Suzanne." The play deals with the tribulations of a frolicsome young wife who obtains a divorce on impulse and then repents it. Hardly has the law separated the couple than the woman longs to have her husband back again. Most of the action concerns her cajolery in winning his love a second time. She succeeds, of course, but not until she has manifested her affection by revealing pink toes and a bare ankle to the audience. The husband has taken the divorce philosophically. He returns to his old bachelor quarters, and it is here the young woman comes seeking his heart and hand a second time. In reality she always has been the wooer, but the conventions are observed by giving the impression that the husband is the anxious one. The fellow at first is resentful of the visit, but he cannot hide his deep satisfaction. He submits himself joyously but with apparent restraint, to the woman's blandishments. She observes his gradual drift toward sentimental tenderness, and by one bold stroke makes him capitulate at her feet. She whispers that she has stepped in a puddle, and that her shoe is "awfully wet." The husband, sympathetic soul, fears pneumonia and kindred ills, and bids the young woman kick off her shoe and hold her foot near the fire. But the wife's plot is deeper than this. She affects coyness, hesitates, then with apparent unwillingness permits him to take off the shoe. He does it neatly, quickly, and makes a discovery. Her stocking is wet, and this is a positive menace to her health. That stocking must come off, says the husband. No, such a thing is not to be thought of, demurs the wife. But it does come off, and it is in the execution of this operation that the Nonconformist brethren find reason for indignation. The stocking is held up to view; the man carries it at arm's length across the stage, and drops it with a shudder in a waste basket. The woman meanwhile is cuddling her toes in her skirts. The man returns to her, expresses deepest alarm least sickness and death follow the wetting; catches sight of the toe in a maze of white, drops on his knees and catches it between finger and thumb. Reconciliation is effected while the man is fondling the woman's foot and apostrophizing it. The play is a great success, but many good people regard that particular scene as a sensuous appeal, and demand its elimination. The Censor has witnessed it without a shock, and he is probably wondering whether London is having a spasm of reform, for the Pinero doll is still dancing.

When The Devil Is Sick

When a veteran crook like Colonel Butler of St. Louis is touched by remorse for his sins and "makes a clean breast" of his infamous practices, all men who have bartered their honor in the political mart, and who are not insensible of the danger they have courted, experience a thrill of alarm. What guarantee have they that the man or men by whom they were corrupted will not some day be awakened by a sting of conscience? The dishonest official who is faithless to the public trust reposed in him seldom considers the probability of his exposure by those with whom he has corruptly bargained. Knowing that they are implicated in the crime of bribery he feels that they consider it as important as he that the transaction should never be beaten upon by the white light of publicity. But in their more sober moments, when they reflect that what they have done is not a secret in their own keeping, that it is in the power of some one else to proclaim their shame, their feelings are not to be envied. Colonel Butler, repentant, was deemed beyond the possibilities. His hide was thought to be immune to the sting of public scorn, and his conscience moribund beyond awakening. But with him it was a case of the devil being sick, so the devil a saint would be. And that is what happens every day. No crook knows when his turn will come to be exposed by the man who corrupted him.

The Cautious Heathen

When Chief Wittman was charged with responsibility for the wide-openness of Chinatown he pleaded that it was beyond human power to prevent gambling in that quarter. It is probably true that some of the denizens of that quarter will always be able to gamble some of the time in defiance of police vigilance, but it is absurd to state that all that wish to gamble will be able to gamble all of the time even though the police seek to prevent their doing so. At the time of the raid of Police Commissioner Hutton gambling was permitted in Chinatown. If it was prohibited the Chinese would not have been conducting their games under the nose of the police. They do not court arrest; nor could they afford to take the chances involved in conducting gambling games without the consent of the authorities. Whenever the authorities have prohibited gambling in Chinatown as a result of newspaper agitation, the gambling houses have been closed. It is therefore not unreasonable to assume that the Chinese gamblers have been enjoying police protection. But it is probably unjust to suspect the authorities of having been bribed. Our public servants are, perhaps, men of exceptional virtue, men of high moral character unlike those that have been responsible for the shame of other cities. They may have been acquiescing in the illegal practices of the Chinese out of pure friendship for the heathen. It has frequently been reported that two thousand dollars is raised by the gamblers every week, ostensibly for the purpose of purchasing immunity; but there may be some mistake about that. It is not improbable that the money is devoted to some charitable object. However Mr. Abe Ruef volunteered to find out, and the police commissioners, who are gentlemen with a keen sense of humor, gladly availed themselves of the services of the distinguished foe of the grafters. The community owes much to Mr. Ruef for his many contributions to the gayety of the town, and it is particularly indebted to him for that peculiarly refreshing spectacle of himself on the trail of a sack.

Gambling in Chinatown

It would be easy for us to improve our morals if we had the courage to shake off our hypocrisy. We prohibit the Chinese from gambling because we affect a virtuous repugnance to the practice. Yet we tolerate gambling of a much more pernicious character than that which absorbs the attention of the Chinese. Our best and most cultured citizens are gamblers, and they gamble in the open mart, in a manner deemed eminently respectable. We permit white lottery agencies to be conducted in violation of law, and our sacrosanct journals that have spasms of indignation over the degradation of the Chinese gamblers unblushingly share in the profits of the Caucasian criminals, and assist them in spreading the glad tidings to the holders of winning tickets. If we were candid with ourselves long enough to take a disinterested, unbiased view of the situation, it would be easy for us to comprehend that the morals of this community suffer not because the Chinese gamble in Chinatown, but as a result of our solemn enactment that it shall be unlawful for certain gambling games to be played. The law prohibiting gambling is an incentive to corruption. If it were revoked the Chinese would not pay the price demanded by the police, and the police would be free from the temptation which appears to be irresistible. Moreover if we licensed gambling we could look one another in the face without blushing. Gambling is an immoral pastime, one that stimulates the ignoble passions, but authorized gambling is far less harmful than illegal gambling that is winked at by the servants of the people, and that is not resented by public sentiment.

Cinching The Government

As a result of the experiment in building the battleship Connecticut in the Brooklyn Navy Yard the Government has discovered that it is more economical to have such work done by private concerns owing to the fact that men employed by the Government demand and get higher pay than the employes of private shipyards, and are paid for holidays on which they do not work. This is a humiliating confession to make. Why should any man employed by the Government be paid more than the prevailing rate of wages? Why should men receive pay for work that they have not done? We know that it is the practice of the Government to pamper its workmen, but there is no justification for so doing. The statesmen at Washington have no right to tax the whole people for the benefit of the few. However, it is vain to expect them to deal squarely with the Government in such matters. The species of indirect bribery of which they are guilty has been indulged for many years, and it has become deeply rooted in the political system of the country. It is the result of the blunting of the national sense of morality. Such is the low moral tone of the people that there is no longer any sentiment against cinching the Government in commercial transactions.

Life On The Farm

It is very sweet and kind of the young ladies attending the University of California to take an interest in the culinary accomplishments of the farmers' wives and manifest a willingness to give courses of lectures and provide reading matter with a view to improving the quality of the table fare, but perhaps it would be just as well for these philanthropists to spend six months or so on an average farm not as a summer boarder but as an actual resident, and so have an opportunity to observe the conditions under which the farm woman is obliged to labor. It is one thing to deck one's self out in dainty frilled apron and preside over a gas range, provided with the latest wrinkle in cooking utensils and labor-saving contrivances and plenty of the best the market affords. It is another story altogether to have a decrepit stove of ancient pattern whereof all parts but the two griddles just above the fire chamber have gone out of commission. Porcelain-lined kettles will produce different results from tin lard pails and a heat that is regulated automatically by the turning of a valve is not precisely in the same category as that which results from burning wood of varying degrees of greenness cut and brought in by the cook. It is true that bread sometimes fails, but making yeast and keeping it up to standard is not quite so easy as running to the corner grocery for the patented article. Likewise there is monotony in the everlasting fried salt pork, but where is the butcher, and even supposing that there is a route served once a week, how is meat to be kept fresh for days in the hot weather? It is one of the delusions of the dwellers in cities that eggs, milk, cream, butter, fresh fruit and spring chickens are plentiful on farms. The poultry and dairy products are there, but not to be eaten. Out of the proceeds of these the farmer's wife must provide clothing for herself and the daughters and for the younger children of both sexes. It is not the women on the farm that need the kindly ministrations of half-baked university graduates. It is the men who need to be converted to a sense of their responsibilities in providing for their families. The aim of the California farmer is to get as big a ranch as possible, and he usually manages to do this by mortgaging every clod of his holding. Then he puts in a crop of wheat, or oats, or barley, hires help to cut his hay or grain, and manages to get enough out of it to pay his interest and the grocery bill and buy him a cheap suit of clothes every second year. The wife and children do the rest. Every egg that is used, every chicken that is killed, every spoonful of cream and every helping of butter means just so much less somewhere else. The women who are up at three o'clock in the morning to cook breakfast for a crew of twenty men and who empty their dishpans at ten at night after being on foot all the long summer day, may not be able to talk about nitrogenous matter and food values but they are capable of speaking eloquently enough on the subject of doing without and making a cent do a dollar's duty. The university ladies are deeply concerned about the proper filling of the stomachs of farmers and farm boys but there is another side to the story. It is an historical tale of a prosperous Sacramento valley farmer that, being complimented on his fine farm, he answered in all seriousness: "It ought to be; I wore out three wives making that ranch."

Scholarship and Pull

Adele Marie Shaw, who has been investigating school management in various localities for The World's Work, is loud in praise of the system in Indiana, whereby those attendants at State Normal Schools who do not show the qualifications, apart from scholarship, which go towards making successful teachers, are dropped after it has been satisfactorily proved that they cannot acquire what they lack. No account is taken of the social or political status of the student but the banker's daughter and the day laborer's offspring are given to understand that it is not a question of their future livelihood but the good of the pupils in general which is under consideration. The system is, on its face, an excellent one. It does away with a large percentage of incompetency to start on, and minimizes the necessity for hunting easy places for people with pulls and little else. But Indiana is not the only State in which it has occurred to those in authority to sift their ingredients betimes. It was tried right here in California, and in the days when we had but one Normal school which could easily be kept under surveillance. Certain rules and regulations concerning boisterous conduct, flirting with male pupils, spending an undue portion of time in social pursuits and in general manifesting a disposition which could not be regarded as an exemplary model for pupils to follow were recognized as sufficient reason for requesting the withdrawal of the student. From time to time boys and girls were notified, after due warning, that the welfare of the school and of the State's educational forces would be best conserved by their withdrawal, and in some instances the notice was given within a few weeks of graduation. There seemed to be nothing to do but comply until one obstreperous young lady took her case into court, sued for damages and carried her complaint from one tribunal to another until she finally won her contention, which amounted practically to declaring that the faculty of the State Normal school had nothing to do with the conduct of pupils outside of school hours. If they fell behind in their studies or were guilty of immoralities on the school premises they could be called to account, but if they chose to attend parties, go driving, entertain young men in the evening or "carry on," it was nobody's business. It cost the State a little something to find out that moral unfitness or natural incapacity for teaching were not disqualifications. The State must take any apprentice who applies for admission to its teacher factories. Pull secures a position and the Kennedy decision anchors the incompetent for life. There are old fossils in the city schools who cannot be stirred by a charge of dynamite. They are incompetent through sheer senility, but as long as they can keep awake during school hours they are retained. An attempt to remove one of them invariably means a suit for reinstatement, with costs and back salary to pay. There was a time when teachers who did not constantly cultivate a pull were in daily danger of having their heads lopped off if some one else happened to have an eye on their class rooms. Now it is the other way. Once a teacher is installed a steam derrick would have no power to lift her. We have no legal means of keeping the incompetents out to begin with and no means of getting them out afterwards. It is the public now that needs the protection.

Open Letters to Men of Mark. No. 4.

ADDRESSED TO WILLIAM H. TAFT, SECRETARY OF WAR FOR THE UNITED STATES, IN RELATION TO HIS PROPOSED SCHEME FOR EXPLOITING THE PHILIPPINES IN THE INTEREST OF AN ADMINISTRATION SYNDICATE.

BY DEMOCRITUS.

My Dear Taft:—

I am rejoiced to learn that your health has improved since you resigned the Governorship of the Philippines Dependency. I am glad also that it was not wholly on account of your health that you forsook the comforts of a palatial home in the tropics to assume the arduous duties of a more exalted position amid the malarious environment of the national capital. Even the "corroded Americans" of Manila are now convinced that you left the subject colony for the good of all concerned, your own interests included. It is now plain to the least observant of those who watched your career in the Philippines that you are resolved to fulfil every requirement of a step-fatherly relationship to our "little brown brothers."

I have always contended, and I am sure you are in accord with my opinion, that the millions already expended by the American people in the Philippines is a profitable investment. I can heartily approve, therefore, of your scheme to expend some more of the people's money in building a railroad for your own profit and the profit of your friends. This is the kind of profit that is not without honor save in the Philippines. What does it matter whether this profit inures to the people who expend the money or to those who devise and operate the system? Pardon me, my dear Secretary, for using that word "system." If the laborer is worthy of his hire surely the employer of labor is also worthy of any profit that may accrue from the hiring of labor. Capital invariably claims the hog's share of all profit arising from the hiring of labor upon the plea that if it were not for capital labor would never be hired. The converse of the proposition that if it were not for labor capital would cease to be profitable may be regarded as a ductio ad absurdum. It is perfectly just and fair that capital should profit infinitely from the product of labor, but it is unthinkable that the wages of labor should increase in proportion to the profits of capital. Labor was made for capital. Capital was not made for labor.

You propose to operate a railroad system in the Philippines under a guarantee of the Government that the bonds of that system shall be paid. You don't propose to risk a single dollar. The laboring millions of the United States—the taxpayers—are to be responsible for all losses incurred in the building and operation of your railroad. Of course there ain't going to be no losses—to the Syndicate. If the system pays the bonds will be redeemed—in the third or fourth generation. In the meantime the interest on the bonds will be assessed to the running expenses. Of course you will build the road. That certainty will entail the organization of a Contract and Finance Company into whose pockets will flow the millions derived from the bonds guaranteed by the people of the United States. The schemer as well as the laborer is worthy of his hire. Mr. Thomas Lawson has called this sort of thing "frenzied finance," but you and I, my dear Taft, know that it is the safest, the sanest, the most conservative finance.

Of course you are firmly opposed to the paternalism that fosters public utilities for the profit and convenience of the community. That policy savors of socialism, and socialism is akin to anarchy—a paradox easily reduced to the plainest logic in the mathematical theorems of capital. You would not for a moment admit that if the people pay for building railroads they should also own those roads. That would indeed be a species of "frenzied finance." The paternalism, however, that fathens the capitalist is all right. The capitalist must be first considered in all governmental graft.

Some of the most ignorant people of the United States have wondered why you and your Administration pals have so persistently opposed free trade between this country and the Philippines. It has been asserted that your opposition was based on a desire to "protect" the bureaucrats of the Islands. Free trade with the Philippines, these ignoramuses declared, would reduce the income from the customs and compel economy in the administration of the colony. That would mean the cutting off of sinecures and the reduction of exorbitant salaries. In the light of your application for this Government guarantee it is clear that your opposition to free trade was induced by the fear that with the increase of trade in the Philippines other capital than that of the Administration financiers would invest there without asking aid from the people of the United States. You didn't want that sort of competition. Yours was the sane, safe and conservative policy that insists on monopolizing the trough with all your feet.

I hope, my dear Taft, that you have included all the powerful railroad combines in your scheme. Otherwise there is trouble ahead for you and your confederates. Unless the other grafters are "let in on the ground floor" your scheme is sure to incite strenuous opposition. It is almost certain that the story of the Benguet road from Dagapan to Dean Worcester's elegant villa in the Simla of Luzon will be told in Congress and offered as an example of the manner in which great enterprises of this character are conducted in the Philippines. Now, my dear Taft, you don't want that Benguet scandal aired before the people of the United States. It wouldn't be nice to force an accounting in that matter, and it would be positively suicidal to compel an investigation of the reason for attempting to build a road to Benguet in the first instance through a region where no road could be maintained during the rainy season. Of course you can lay the blame on the surveyors and the contractors, but the surveyors and contractors might retort with the truth concerning the scheme, and that would be dangerous.

Therefore, my dear Taft, take my advice and placate every interest that may in any way prove inimical to your purpose. Remember that the money does not come out of your pocket or out of the pockets of your friends. The people are going to pay the bill. The prospective profit of the scheme may be somewhat lessened, it is true, but discretion is the better part of valor in finance as in other conditions. Soothe the opposition; glad-hand the possible objector; purchase, if need be, any honest, conscientious legislator who may be likely to call attention to the fact that you are engaged in a get-rich-quick scheme—that you are using the treasury of the people to float a private enterprise.

You will understand that this is strictly heart-to-heart and confidential as a whisper to the dead. Personally I hope that you will succeed, and I am ready to assist you in any way that lies in my power. I will write your prospectuses and your siren songs to the bond papers. I will indorse your integrity as a politician and I will boom your ambition for the Presidency. By the way, I must decline your kindly offer of assistance to a Consul-Generalship. If you can't get something better you needn't come around. I'm no broken down political hack to be contented with any bone that the Administration may see fit to fling at me. I can't earn legitimately more than five thousand dollars a year from the office of a Consul-General and my graft wouldn't net me more than as much again. I wouldn't object to the first vacancy on the Philippines Commission after you get your railroad scheme in operation, but we will talk of that hereafter. Hoping that your health will continue to improve I am, as ever, your best friend and well-wisher.

Historical Sketches

BY THEODORE BONNET.

From the testimony of monuments and the voice of tombs we have derived much accurate information about the great metropolis of San Francisco that flourished for a century on the west coast of America. It was a city of rare natural beauty, and its people were highly cultured. So great was their admiration of the artistic temperament that at one time they selected for their ruler a musician and composer. He was a disappointment, because the keynote of his harmonies was harshly metallic. His best known composition is "The Wide Open Town," a symphony of graft with fine effects in light and shades but principally in the shade. It is a fine fantasia on two themes—the looting of an American city and the milking of a Chinese village. In the handling of the Celestial theme a fine, large grasp is shown. The peculiarities of this distinguished ruler's conduct overshadowed his achievements in art.

The American people were at one time inclined to recognize the importance of superior physical development, and they encouraged feats of strength as did the Greeks in a more remote period. They were partial for a time to a game called football which was conducive to the development of brawn and muscle, but the academicians of the country who were of an effeminate character, and who favored unremitting devotion to intellectual pursuits, urged the emasculation of the game. They were hopelessly committed to estheticism and to their agitation may be attributed the failure of the nation to develop a race of giant warriors. They succeeded in arousing public sentiment to such an extent that in the year 1904 the sport became an innocuous pastime. Casualty figures from three hundred colleges in that year showed that only nine players had been killed. The game having lost its vaunted status of bloodthirstiness, and it becoming apparent that human life was scarcely to be jeopardized in the insipid scrimmages that produced only an occasional broken bone, it was soon abandoned in favor of lawn tennis and other more thrilling but invigorating pastimes. From that year may be dated the decline of the race.

The conduct of the people is always found to be the same at similar periods in the development or decline of a nation. In the dissolution of empires history everywhere presents the same pictures of luxury and folly, and indulgence of extravagances of factitious and depraved tastes. In the dawn of the twentieth century the people of the United States were addicted to follies similar to those that enervated the people of Rome in the period of the Empire's decline. And like the Romans they were insensible to the augurs with which their excesses and caprices were fraught.

Theodore Roosevelt's success as a statesman was largely due to his grasp of history. He read the characters of great men without the aid of a magnifying glass, and he became cognizant of the fact that the most glorious achievements of individuals were those that appeared to have been dictated by patriotic zeal, but that were in reality mere theatrical stunts. He was, of course, a great patriot, but he did not consider it infra dig to keep his hand on the gallery's pulse. His affectation of ingenuousness was superb. He dined a negro to score a reputation for moral courage, and alienated the vote of the Solid South irretrievably, but he didn't need it, and had reason to believe that he couldn't get it if he wanted it. Later on when the South gave promise of disintegrating he handed out a job to Senator Cockrell, an ex-Confederate. His conquest of Germany took place in the year 1904 when he delivered a eulogy of Frederick the Great, which rendered an arbitration treaty with the Empire a work of supererogation. In imitation of Alexander of Macedon, Roosevelt employed a valet to arouse him in the morning and remind him that he was mortal. It was also customary for him to have a death's head at the feast as a memento mori, for things were coming his way at an intoxicating pace.

There was great industrial unrest in the United States during the first decade of the twentieth century. It was due to the unreasonableness of the merchant princes, and financial kings who insisted that men were merely born equal, and that those who had not sufficient ingenuity and want of scruple to vindicate their superiority in commercial enterprises should take a back seat. As the inferior outnumbered their natural masters, they asserted the doctrine of the righteousness of might, and demanded the equal distribution of wealth. As a consequence employers banded together for mutual protection, and after many struggles labor had to go to work.

Perhaps the most notable figure in American history was that of John D. Rockefeller, the most influential man of his time. Though he never occupied the Presidential chair he directed the affairs of the nation during a score of years from his private throne-room at Twenty-six Broadway. During that period he suffered incessantly from indigestion but never permitted it to interfere with State affairs. He was the inventor of a patent process for the absorption of the nation's wealth; and he operated the device with success most gratifying to himself. Notwithstanding the indigestion he was a man of infinite charity and of great religious enthusiasm for Christ. It was his theory that the people were hopelessly selfish, and that he had been divinely commissioned to preserve the church and promote education. He therefore took the money of the people as a rebuke to their cupidity, and devoted some of it to the cause of religion and the endowment of institutions of learning. The people apotheosized him for his unselfishness, and were grateful that his indigestion was no worse. They knew that if he had not kept up the supply of coal oil the lamp of Knowledge would have gone out.

The Universal Vice, Vulgarity

BY HARRY COWELL.

"Some of us know vulgarity for worse than a vice and would fain spend our second nobly, with dignity." In the foregoing words, written a few months ago for this journal, I endeavored to set forth as best I could my aversion to what to me is a monster of most hideous mien—a monster which in one of its various forms I no doubt, like the majority of my fellows, have come wittingly or unwittingly to embrace. For, if in this delicate matter, you will accept the word of one who is no saint, it is easier to be good than to be fine. Moralists may find no little comfort in this fact, but for my part I find it full of tears.

To lack distinction, to be of the many to the bad manner born—or the indifferent, rather—is obviously the unfortunate lot of most men. Not that the common people are all guilty of vulgarity, any more than all feudal tenants of the lowest class were guilty of villainy. Seldom indeed are the poor sinners above other men in this matter. It is only when a man has money enough to advertise extensively his woeful want of taste that he becomes especially offensive. The successful pawnbroker who makes of his overdressed wife a walking advertisement of his prosperity and the adversity of other men is not attar o' roses to the soil.

It is not so much because the vice in question is characteristic of us as because here in America so many who have neither culture nor instinctive preference for the fine have the means of making that unhappy fact conspicuous, that envious foreigners have dubbed us a "nation of vulgarians."

In sad truth vulgarity is of no nation but as common as vanity—the desire that others should think better of us than we do of ourselves. The wish to stand well with our fellows is doubtless laudable enough, in itself, but with what queer coin do we essay to buy golden opinions of all sorts of men! He who who sees so clearly the vulgarity of opening one's doors ever so little to dollars as such is totally blind to the equal vulgarity of opening them to blood. It needs but a very slight acquaintance with the old world to convince the observer that so-called "birth" does not invariably stand in causal relation to beauty of character or any human worth whatever. Were one with a title inevitably a noble man, and the "base born" of necessity base; were a man's worth in proportion to his pocket and God's best found nowhere but in good society, and my words were beside the mark and I must needs go elsewhere for a grievance to make copy withal. But his living in a palace may mean that Brown was not over nice in the matter of making money; and his living in a cottage that Robinson had rare scruples. And yet the world beams on under-nice Brown and at best bows stiffly to supersensitive Robinson.

Admire a man's park, his picture, his wife, his horse, his dog, or anything that is his, and you pay him a compliment—making little or no distinction between him and his. Now, the park he inherited; it is still very beautiful indeed, but its beauty makes the owner out of place in it—still very beautiful, I say, for he had the handsomest trees cut down to buy jewels for a fille de joie; the picture he grudgingly accepted in payment of a small loan to a then struggling artist, since famous; his wife he married for her money; my fine gentleman despises her and insults her daily; she, poor beauty, is the daughter of an American butcher and blushes at the mere mention of beef or mutton; 'twas with her dollars that he bought the horse and the dog; as they are of his own choosing and the best of their kind in the countryside, may he not be justly proud of them? Much better of their kind, I grant you, than he of his, he who has spent no small portion of man's brief interval in learning the "good points" of horses and dogs. To estimate a person by what is his rather than by what he is, is to use the judgment not of the just but of the vulgar. A poor man's coat is more often the index of his necessity than of his taste. At times the shabby coat is to his credit. If you put a good coat upon your back, the fool and the wayfaring man will not fail to see it and doff their hats; but if you put a good book into your blood, who so fine as to detect the fact and do you honor? Mrs. Smith is admitted even by those who envy her to be a woman of excellent taste. Why? I will tell you. On her husband's ugly money — for which she sold herself, having jilted a poor man whom she loved — she dresses beautifully; her gowns, however, discover not her taste but that of a noted French modiste into whose artistic hands Mrs. Worldly-Wise unreservedly places her vulgar self.

When Jack London was in the city of his name, learning at first hand how the "People of the Abyss" live, he thought it wise to make himself one with them in dress; and how at a certain house where he looked for lodging she who opened to him — "slavey" though she was — thinking he looked for work, treated him, the guest of honor at so many fashionable tables; and how the daughters of the house blushed for very shame and chagrin because they had failed at first sight to discover in him one who could dress well but didn't, is told in his book itself much better than I can tell it. Suffice it to say that as the author of "The Workers" garbed as one of them, gathered his data without a soul suspecting him of being a professor at a big university, so was the genius in Jack London, the gentleman, and many much more obvious things hidden most effectively under a few sorry rags. Gods in disguise pass readily for everyday mortals. Let one of them but finally appear in his proper person and forthwith the vulgar, remembering having somewhere read that "the immortals know each other at first sight," are in haste to declare from the housetops that they had recognized the divinity with half an eye. 'Tis in the other world that the gods cannot travel incognito. Common opinion to the contrary notwithstanding, nowhere has worth less recognition than in a democracy.

Somewhere east of the morning sun dwell those of us who never even in our off moments make cheap bids for the consideration of our fellow men, never offer for their admiration other than what is admirable, never accept the "queer" the vulgar "shove" us for our golden opinions. Ambrose Bierce's dictum that wise poets write for one another is not to be gainsaid; yet in the eyes of the vast army of readers the fact that the monarch of Great Britain praises the verses of Ella Wheeler Wilcox is nothing less than an ostrich plume in that prolific lady's cap. What vulgarian I wonder, made Albert Edward of England lord and master over the American muse?

So long as discernment is rarer than diamonds, and vanity common as clay, so long shall we continue to quote with gusto the commonplaces the king said to us or tell for the thousand time how much the billionaire made us feel at home. To what strange logic vulgarity makes its far from mute appeal! A man informs you that Poole made his prince albert and his wife that her wedding dress was one of Worth's "creations" not that you may admire the head work of the famous tailors and the handiwork of those in their employ, but that they, the wearers of costly clothes, may have honor in your eyes. Only last night on my way home I overheard a lady advertise to a whole street-car the fact that she had paid five and twenty dollars for her boy's first suit, and watched with curious interest her expectant pose and the visible unhinging of her companion's knees.

But enough and more than enough of these illustrations. Would God they were farther to seek.

The Saunterer

Pardee's Pet Project

The Republican machine of California is making a great record for procrastination. Here we are within a month of the convening of the Legislature, with a Senatorial contest in full blast, and everybody in the dark as to "what's doing." At this writing nobody has even an inkling to what the program is to be for the organization of the House, and as for the toga contest, the probability is that it will develop into a free-for-all dash, at catch weights. Two years ago it was known before the end of November that Arthur Fisk was the slate candidate for the Speakership. November, 1904, is now but a memory, and the identity of the next Speaker is a matter of conjecture. Why this procrastination? Well, it's an interesting story. Chapter I is dominated by Governor Pardee. Two years ago His Excellency was a novice in State politics. He did not understand the importance of controlling the Speaker. The result was that his voice in legislative matters was quite feeble. Now he is familiar with all the dips, spurs and angles of the game and he insists on naming the Speaker. As I announced last week, Pardee is a candidate for re-nomination. So far he has done nothing to electrify the dear people, but he purposes touching the button that will let loose the intoxicating current, at the next session. He has a revenue measure to put through that will score the biggest hit ever made by an Executive of this State. His friends assure me that it will make him the idol of the people and the logical candidate for Governor in 1906. Hence the importance of his getting control of the organization of the House.

Awaiting Developments

The Republican machine could easily nip the ambition of the Governor in the bud, but it might prove unprofitable to do so, for it is in his power to retaliate. At present he is being conciliated as much as possible, and the machine leaders are waiting for him to uncover his candidate for Speaker, believing it quite possible that his choice will prove persona grata to them. They feel that it would be foolish to declare war if there is to be no occasion for hostilities. Meanwhile they are speculating as to whom he will select for the speakership. They will not be surprised to learn that Assemblyman Waste is the man, for he is known to be loyal to Pardee. The Governor would also like to have the selection of committees in the Senate, but that is the prerogative of Lieutenant-Governor Alden Anderson, who, hoping as he does to succeed Pardee, is not likely to surrender any of his patronage.

A Prediction

It is rather early (Monday) to venture a prediction regarding the Speakership, but after consideration of the several candidates I cannot think of a man more acceptable to all concerned than General Frank C. Prescott of San Bernardino. Waste is too closely identified with the Pardee faction to receive the endorsement of the organization; Phil Stanton of Los Angeles is more objectionable than Phil Walsh, to Pardee; Drew of Fresno, being a Bard representative, is out of the running, and Rolley of Humboldt is not considered safe by the organization. Prescott would be acceptable to both sides. The Assemblyman is of sudden growth in the political field. He was formerly a telegraph operator in Santa Barbara. Later he was a newspaper man in Oakland, and then he drifted to Redlands where he joined the militia in time to be sent to the Philippines, where he became Major in the army. He was made a Brigadier-General by Pardee.

In the Toga Race

Some of our statesmen-elect have become terribly exasperated over the tangle in which the Senatorial contest has become involved. They expected the Organization to straighten it out weeks ago, but the Organization is maintaining a discreet—some say indiscreet—silence. Some of the most experienced politicians believe that it is now too late to attempt the straightening out of the tangle. Flint, Bard, Oxnard and Knight are in the fight to stay, and none is subject to orders. Each is negotiating for votes, and several program legislators have pledged themselves. Those statesmen who are known to have no mere hygienic interest in the game, and who are swayed only by substantial argument, have been intimating that they are for Arthur Fisk, who has not yet announced his candidacy. And, by the way, stranger things have happened than the election of a rank outsider. Fisk is the choice of Senator Shortridge, who started the Postmaster's boom in a jocular way, weeks ago. Since the election several members of the legislature have informed Fisk that they will vote for him if he decides to have his name presented, and Shortridge will nominate him if he gives the word. In the event of Colonel Mazuma keeping his hands off, Fisk may loom large in the foreground, and there is no indication of the Colonel's materializing at present.

No Eastern Help

For a long time there was talk of possible Eastern interference in the fight, but it no longer receives attention. Bard has Standard Oil connections, but he has not been of any service to that corporation. He has cut such an unimportant figure in the Senate that his re-election is not a consummation devoutly to be wished by anybody in particular. Roosevelt was expected to throw out a suggestion, it being known that he felt deeply indebted to George Knight, but courtesy to Bard, the incumbent, demands that he keep hands off, and besides he was a schoolmate of Oxnard and feels very friendly to the sugar magnate. So whatever viewpoint be taken, it is not easy to size up the situation. Only one thing seems to be certain—that the Organization has overslept itself, and cannot swing a sufficient number of votes to elect. Its principal concern, however, is the defeat of Bard, whose only chance lies in a plethoric sack, and that distinguished statesman would scorn to corrupt a legislator.

Carpenter and The Chinese

L. G. Carpenter, the attorney, who caused the Chinatown explosion that shook up the police department, is the legal representative of the semi-decent element in the Chinese quarter, and is better versed in the ways that are dark of the heathen than any other white man in this city. His first experience in Chinatown was as a newspaper reporter, and it was then that he learned all about the methods of the gamblers, the hatchet-men and the police. He exposed these methods in the Examiner a few years ago, and subsequently, as the attorney for the Chinese Educational Society, he procured evidence against a gang of assassins upon which he has since been prosecuting them in the civil courts. He is a man of remarkable energy, tenacity and courage, and with those qualities he combines exceptional mental force and shrewdness, all of which is keenly appreciated by Chief of Police Wittman. During Carpenter's early career as a reporter, Wittman was a sergeant of police, and the newspaper man undertook to have him dismissed from the department for corrupt practices. He prosecuted Wittman before the Police Commission but was not successful. His evidence was deemed insufficient.

Handling The Sack

The use of a Chinatown sack for the corrupting of the authorities has long been known. Men have frequently been dismissed from the department for protecting the Chinese, but the sophisticated have always believed that the men who lost their position were the scapegoats of somebody higher in authority. There has been a great deal of speculation as to how the bribe money was delivered, but nobody has ever traced the sack from the Chinese to the police authorities, and yet the manner of its delivery has at times been known. The favorite method, it is said, involved the use of a safe-deposit box to which the representative of the Chinese, and the representative of the authorities had access. One man put in the money and the other took it out. The theory that every man has his price is one of the fundamentals of Mongolian philosophy, and when evasion of the law is profitable to the Chinese they lose no time in ascertaining the figure of the man whose duty it is to see that the law is obeyed.

Hammering Byrnes

Upon very good authority I am assured that the capitalists, financiers and Captains of Industry of the Pacific-Union Club have reconsidered their amiable purpose of perpetuating the memory of their worthy president, Mr. Byrne, in a bronze effigy. To such a degree has their enthusiasm over his marvelous executive ability abated that they have decided not to dedicate a room to him in the palatial new club house which stands as a monument to his enterprise. Those projects had received almost unanimous approval when the club was on the eve of removal to the new quarters, for the members felt that they were under deep obligations to their active and energetic executive. They believed that to him, and to him alone was due the credit for the revivication which the opulent institution recently experienced. Bank presidents, corporation magnates, prosperous professional men, and the representatives of our leisure class—all joined in acclaim of the achievements of President Byrne. But, as I reported a few weeks ago, after getting into their new quarters, a melancholy dirge was substituted for the glad refrain. There had been whispers of an assessment and rumors of bad management, and then the anvil chorus was heard in dolorous minor. But not until Acting President Hopkins sent out a little circular letter last week were the knockers in real good voice.

A Financial Classic

According to this circular letter the directors of the club have levied an assessment of one hundred dollars payable in monthly installments of ten dollars each, beginning January, 1905. It is explained that "the construction of the new club house, as is usual in such matters, has required some extras not included in the original estimates;" that, "many conveniences are needed which were not foreseen when the plans were adopted, including a second elevator, house telephones, a suitable table service for the restaurant, some new furniture and carpets, and other accessories, to make the club comfortable and creditable to its members." The humor of this note is not appreciated in the Pacific-Union Club. The literary style is said to be peculiar to financial writers, and it was no doubt employed to conceal the thoughts of the directors, who know that the members abhor attacks on their purse. The members have received it with impressive solemnity, and it has been suggested that as the club is over sixty thousand dollars in debt they should forego conveniences and subject themselves to a little inconvenience even to the extent of dining without a suitable table service. Meanwhile President Byrne's unpopularity is increasing at a terrific pace, while he, blissfully ignorant of the revulsion of club sentiment, is joyfully touring Europe, and fondly expecting to be feted uproariously on his return.

"Rich and Respectable"

One of the waiting list of the Bohemian Club was baloted into active membership last week, and thereby hangs a little tale illustrative of the conditions now prevailing in this world-famous organization. When the name of this candidate came before the Directors last week one of them sought out the sponsor of the applicant and asked him what qualifications for membership in the Bohemian Club were possessed by the man he had proposed. Now it happens that the man questioned is a life member of the club but no longer finds the environment congenial. He is one of the old departed coterie who made the club world famous and who grieves that it has come to the base use of mere money. "I think this candidate for membership in the Bohemian Club is eminently qualified," he answered. "He is rich and respectable; very rich and very respectable. He is related to a family of financiers who once guided the money policy of the nation. He is himself a part of the money manufacturing department of the Government. He can hold his own in any manner with the other rich and respectable members of the club. I consider him better fitted for membership than myself." "But," the other insisted, "can he do anything for the Jinks?" "Oh, no," was the answer. "He is rich and respectable, but he is also very stupid. He is receptive, however, and a good listener. He will even laugh at the quips and jests of your average humorists, when he hears the laugh going round, but he is not humorous himself. Quite the contrary. But why do you ask me if he is fit to take part in your entertainments? I thought you had ceased asking that question long, long ago. I wasn't aware that you had any intention of trying to revive the old spirit of the club." It is needless to say that the candidate was duly elected to full membership in the club at the meeting of the directors last Thursday.

A Cynic's Wail

I heard a veteran Bohemian Club member complain, the other day, that the institution had degenerated into a social club, a rendezvous for the younger fashionables of the town and a lounging place for the money-laden merchant princes of the down town district. "Women have invaded the Jinks room," he said, "and dancing parties are given there. The Red Room smells of commercialism and the odor of Front street is over all." He was a cynical chap who does not appreciate the fact that the genuine blown-in-the-bottle bohemian cannot support a luxurious club. Artists and writers are encouraged to membership, and there are several in the club who contribute to the gaiety of the jinks. Moreover there are many clever young professional and business men in the club who are very good parlor comedians, and who dabble harmlessly in verse and prose. Artists place their work on exhibition once a year and draw the women of the smart set, and the Midsummer Jinks is still a feature by which the club sustains its reputation fairly well. Perhaps the club is no longer the theme of admiring comment in the Savage Club of London, or in the Lotus or Clover Clubs of this country. The Lambs of New York may not be quoting the brilliant sayings of the Bohemians of San Francisco any more, but the club's degeneracy is not what it is painted. It has simply grown more prosperous and select. No doubt a club that deems a Jim Phelan an ideal man for President on account of his wealth, must be afflicted with a sordid atmosphere, but the old spirit that made it famous is far from dead. The cynics may indulge their satirical humor at the expense of the poor old owl whose sad-eyed ghost haunts the plaster effigy in the main corridor of the palatial home of the Bohemians of Battery street, but the landlord gets his rent on time, and the Gas monopoly never threatens to remove the meter.

Kipling and London

One of the book reviewers of the Chronicle is aggrieved because Barrett Wendell in his "History of Literature in America" gives no more than "grudging attention to a new writer like Jack London, whose work is certainly worth more than faint praise." Professor Wendell declared that London's fiction was obviously modeled on the style of Kipling, but his stories have power enough not to seem unworthy of their original. What's the matter with that judgment? Does the Chronicle reviewer deny that Kipling is a great writer? Does he class London as the equal of Kipling? If in the opinion of this critic London is superior to Kipling then Professor Wendell has done him no more harm than would have resulted to the fame of Shakespeare if he had said that the Master had modeled some of his plays on the plot and circumstance of the stories of Boccaccio or the tales of the Gesta Romanorum. If Jack London is merely the equal of Kipling wherein has Professor Wendell damned London with faint praise? And finally if London is inferior to Kipling what does it matter if some gangling, spectacled pedant of the universities commends him for work with power enough "not to seem unworthy of his original?" If Jack London has found a critic in Professor Wendell who warns posterity to estimate him a little lower than Kipling he has at his back a bunch of publishers who announce in larger type than the Professor uses that he is far and away the superior of Kipling. If posterity is in doubt concerning the respective validity of these diverse judgments they can blow the dust from their uncut volumes of "The Sea Wolf," or open the age-yellowing pages of "The God of His Fathers" and by comparison with "The Jungle Stories" or "The Man Who Was" decide the dispute for themselves. For my part I should merely ask to inspect Jack London's royalty account. It is the dollar that fixes the place of the modern author in the pantheon of literature. It is "the best seller" that sounds the trumpet of a brief fame in the literary market place. Just now I am inclined to think that Miriam Michelson's bugle call is worth a score of Kiplings and at least a hundred Londons.

"How do you know she is not in society?"

"She didn't attend the Martin ball and she wasn't a witness in the Dolbeer case."

"Then she's a nobody."

The Strenuous Mrs. Martin

After that big ball in honor of Anita Harvey, last week, I came to the conclusion that Mrs. Eleanor Martin was as distinguished for virility as Sarah Bernhardt, and that her staying qualities were equal to those of the perennial William Greer Harrison. She was on her feet from nine o'clock at night until four in the morning without the aid of an electric battery, and at no time was there any perceptible diminution of her vivacity. Her farewell grasp was not less magnetic than her glad-hand at greeting. She is surely a wonderful woman. Her democratic spirit was shown in the personnel of her guests. The bars were down for the ball, as they always are when Mrs. Martin is hostess. She resurrected several people who were fast sinking into social oblivion. I heard one society woman say that she had met people at the ball that she had long believed dead. It is Mrs. Martin's indifference to social status, and her readiness to take people for what they are worth, that distinguish her from the base-born of society. Her ball was a dignified affair, a circumstance due the predominance of people of mature years. Horace Platt and Charles Webb Howard, who figured in many a stately minuet in the first half of the last century, were two of the sprightliest men present. Some of the gay youths of thirty-five drifted in, and feeling as though they were in an old people's home, fled the scene. The conversation was appropriately prosaic. If any one had laughed or cracked a joke the solecism would have caused a shock.

The Lame and the Beauties

There was a great display of family jewels at the ball. Mrs. Flood outshone every one with her blazing gems. Others who scintillated were Mrs. Will Tevis, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels and Mrs. Horace Blanchard-Chase. Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels looked her handsomest in a pink crepe frock embroidered with spangles. The skirt was very full and the bodice was of the period of Marie Antoinette. Mrs. Spreckels, I am happy to say, has more than one frock. She appeared at the last Greenway ball in a wonderful princess gown of green spangles. Mrs. John Rodgers Clark, who, since the birth of her baby, has cared very little for society, reported on at the ball. The beauties of the ball were Mrs. Walter Hobart, Mrs. Kierstedt and Mrs. Clement Tobin. Among the younger cripples interspersed with the halt were Joe Tobin with his arm in a sling, a token of his courage on the polo field, and Mrs. Howard, limping on a cane. She is rapidly recovering from her recent accident.

Bored by Society

Wherever Maxine Elliott has gone during her sojourn in San Francisco she has been admired for her beauty and wondered at for her calmness and failure to go into ecstasies over the functions given in her honor. Miss Elliott is a good business woman, and so does not disdain social favors now and then. But she thinks them an awful bore. Her lively husband, on the contrary, dearly loves a social circus. Shortly after their marriage he occasionally came dashing in to his handsome wife, the glorious Maxine, announcing triumphantly all sorts of invitations. "Yes," she would say, "but surely you don't care to go." "No?" would inquire her amazed, convivial husband. "Well, of course if you do go you will be bored to death by a lot of people who think you are there to entertain them. They will talk at you and expect you to reply. Worse yet, you will be expected to eat and drink a lot of things you don't care for, and you will be tired out tomorrow. For myself, I shall stay at home and not bother." She does usually, in this country, and she is just as happy as the lively Nat, who loves nothing so much as fanning the flame of conviviality.

The Awakening of Society

It was not until her present visit to this city that Mrs. Goodwin was discovered by local society. Several years ago, when she was in the hey-day of her beauty and exhibited as much talent in the Frawley stock as she has now, just before Nat Goodwin came out here and determined to marry her or die, society was scarcely aware of her existence. Since then Mrs. Goodwin has hobnobbed with the beauty-worshipping nobility of Europe, and been admired by Lord Rosebery. Moreover Pierpont Morgan has given her tips and she cuts coupons herself nowadays. So our local fashionables sat up and took notice when the charming actress opened her present engagement. Mr. Goodwin is still as deeply in love with his present wife as he was years ago when, in consideration of Frawley's releasing her from a contract, he permitted the stock manager the use of all his plays. It was then that she went to Australia, much to the sorrow of Frank Worthing, who was her most ardent admirer.

Bob (from Boston): Are these oysters shipped from the East in bulk?

Jack (a Native Son): Why, no, they are from Darbee & Immel's in O'Farrell street.

Bob: Well, they have the real salty flavor of the Chesapeake Bay oyster.

Wore a Demi-Masque

Maxine Elliott has come to the belief that she really hates her own beauty. It follows her around as the tail does the comet, and she sometimes says she wishes she had been born homely. When she was in Florida last year, resting between seasons, she used to wear a half-veil when she entered the dining-room of the Ponce de Leon, but this mask had only the effect of enhancing her beauty. She meant it for a disguise, but it deceived no one. Her stage make-up is inartistic, and obviously undertones her beauty, and it is incredible that with all her experience with grease-paints and rouge she could not improve on the job. I should not be surprised to learn that she purposely mars her pulchritude in the hope of concentrating attention on her acting.

Mrs. Ash-Tonnish: "I hear that Mrs. Brush-Palette poses for all her husband's pictures."

Mrs. Ray-Partee: "Why not? We all want to be model wives, don't we?"

How They Get There

Mrs. Samuel Newhouse, formerly of humble station in Denver and now one of the queens of British society, on whose interesting personality I shed some light last week, did not take any interest in the affairs of our provincial aristocracy. She came hither with her friend Maxine Elliott and spent most of her time while here in the company of the actress. Very few San Francisco women are acquainted with Mrs. Newhouse, but many of them know of her prominence in London, where she is known as "Mrs. Sam of the Pearl Necklace." Of course it is presumed that she won her way into British society through the strength of her husband's pocketbook, but it is by the same token that all American matrons reach that goal of their aspirations. Mrs. Newhouse differs from most of them in that she has a personality that would be worth while without the gilding. It is easy to break into British society, say the best authorities, if you have abundant wealth, because British dukes always have use for money, and are constantly engaged in seeking assistance in the flotation of stocks.

Mr. and Mrs. Z. E. Mauzy of Rushville, Indiana, have announced the engagement of their daughter Louise and Charles Albert Schroth of this city. Miss Mauzy is now visiting her uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Byron Mauzy.

Marriage of a Matinee Idol

Ernest Hastings, erstwhile matinee idol of the Alcazar, has taken himself out of the category of mash-note heroes. In a private letter from New York comes the news that he was married last week in the "Little Church Around the Corner." A little over a year ago a sensational story was wired from New York about the strange conduct of Ernest Hastings. It was represented that his mind was shattered, and that he was wandering around under the hallucination that somebody was trying to murder his sweetheart, a San Francisco girl. Later it was learned that the aberration was only a transitory affliction resulting from over-work. The girl referred to in the despatches was Maude Chapman, daughter of the late Dr. Chapman of the Pacific Mail Steamship service, and granddaughter of a former Governor of Oregon. She had been one of the matinee idol worshipers at the Alcazar, and a very warm attachment had sprung up between them. At the time of the report of his insanity she was living in San Jose. A little later she went East, and joined the show girl ranks, and until recently was in the chorus of an extravaganza in Boston. It was to Miss Chapman that Hastings was married last week.

Two at the Ball

There were a few girls at the Confederacy ball who are not often seen at society's dances, young women who are eligible to admission to the functions of the elect but who are not as a rule partial to the giddy whirl. One of these was Blythe MacDonald, whose sister Laura recently married Senator Simms. Miss MacDonald is a daughter of the late De Witt MacDonald and a niece of Captain "Jim." She is a beauty of the chic and brunette type, and has a snug little dot to bring to the man who succeeds in winning her heart and hand. Another of these rare attendants at society dances was Anita Gonzales, the daughter of Mrs. J. Philip Smith. Miss Gonzales has been living in Paris for some time past, and I understand is in California merely for a brief visit. She is of the Spanish type, resembling her father, the late Dr. Gonzales. When she lived in Santa Cruz, during the period when her mother and stepfather were the people of that somnolent burg, she was noted for her fearless horsemanship and skill as a swimmer. She was queen of the first Water Festival in that resort. She is a niece, by the way, of Jack Crooks of San Rafael.

In the Japanese room of the Hotel Pleasanton a charming "surprise" dinner was given by "Steve" Costello in honor of "Joe" O'Donnell. The decorations of asparagus ferns and red carnations were delightfully in harmony with the Japanese appointments of the room.

She Gave Him No Encouragement

Captain Stirling, an Englishman of distinguished family who recently spent several months here, went away disappointed. During his stay he was unremitting in his attentions to Miss Helen de Young. So manifest was his devotion to that charming young woman that everybody divined his purpose. All her friends eagerly awaited developments. They knew that the Englishman was expressing his passion in flowers, books and music, and they knew that England's first quality blood coursed through his veins, but Miss de Young was not impressed. The young officer left town without having been inspired with the slightest hope.

The Sutro Genius

The biggest hit of the season in London is a play by Alfred Sutro, a cousin of the local Sutros. It has proved a greater drawing card than Pinero's doll drama. British critics have pronounced Sutro the most promising of young playwrights. He was unknown until his play, "The Walls of Jericho," was presented early last month at Wyndham's theatre. At that time everybody was talking about the Pinero play, but Sutro's drama diverted attention from the Englishman's spicy comedy. Sutro has sprung a moral lesson on the Britishers and it has captivated them. He strikes at the inanity of society, at the shams and follies of modern life. He dwells on the artificialities of our city existence. His hero is a young man who has made millions in Australia, and who resolves to obtain entrance to the London smart set. He marries the daughter of a marquis, pays her gambling debts and watches her flirtations until the honest heart in him cannot longer remain silent. He speaks his mind about society without thought of the consequences. He is disgusted with the whole lot. "I am sick of these sexless women, gambling, betting, chattering scandal, flirting with one another's husbands, and grudging the very time spent in bringing children into the world," he shouts to his wife. He resolves to go home, where men and women are real; his words and drastic action inspire the better nature in his wife, and together they sail for Australia. This story rings sounder than Pinero's, and its sincerity and truth have won out.

A Fugitive Titled Foreigner

Sir James Talbot-Power is the latest sprig of gentility to appeal to the fancy of our title lovers. He is a young man just out of his teens, of the extremely Anglicized type of Britisher. He is sojourning here for the winter, and the report is current that he was sent hither by his family to escape the machinations of the managing mammas at home. There is in this report a suggestion to those foreigners of title who leave home not on account of match-making mammas but rather to do a little match-making on their own hook. What could be more alluring or better calculated to abate the suspicions of the ultra- wary than the pose of a fugitive from matrimonial alliance? Sir Talbot-Power may not be responsible for the report in his case, but I hear that it has silenced the alarmists, and awakened the keen interests of more than one enterprising mother.

Hard on Blingum

I hear that Mrs. Frank Carolan is going to purchase the portrait of herself which was painted by some rather obscure French artist and attracted a great deal of attention at the World's Fair, where it was conspicuously hung. Mrs. Carolan is not a flawless beauty but she is a very good subject for the painter and this one has most happily expressed her on canvas. There was some wonderment as to the original of the striking portrait, but a glance at the catalogue satisfied curiosity. Instead of the usual "Portrait of a Lady" or "Portrait of Mrs. C.," there was this explanatory paragraph: "Portrait of Mrs. Francis J. Carolan of Burlingame, near San Francisco, California." Evidently it was feared that Blingum was not known to the Pikers. That phrase "near San Francisco" must carry a sting with it to the loyal Blingumite, who seems to regard San Francisco as the mere winter appendage of Burlingame.

Our Gay Society

Ethyl Hager parties are coming in again. I have recently heard of at least six dinner parties at which the ebullient spirits of the guests were expressed in rough-house performances. Judging from the conduct of our quality at these affairs, there is no refined accomplishment so eloquent of high-bred indifference to consequences, as pelting your vis-a-vis with the surplus grub. The humor of our society people is highly diverting. When the conversation lags they stimulate the gayety of a dinner by passing the cutlery. This is the latest intellectual pastime. At a Pacific avenue home, recently, all the cutlery went round the table, much to the hilarity of every one.

Woman Guilty, Man Innocent

From the decree of Judge Ogden, of the Superior Court of Oakland, granting Professor Van Horn a divorce from his wife, on the ground of adultery with a Berkeley student, President Wheeler dissents. Judge Ogden's decree was conclusive as to the divorce suit, but not as to the standing of young Knopf, the student with whom Mrs. Van Horn was said to have been criminally intimate. When the divorce was granted it was thought that Knopf would be dismissed from the university, but President Wheeler concedes not the infallibility of Judge Ogden. He decided to give the student a trial, and on the latter's own statement expressed the opinion that he was innocent. Yet Judge Ogden said that the evidence against Mrs. Van Horn was overwhelming. According to President Wheeler, Judge Ogden's findings were all wrong. When the jurist was told of the Wheeler decision he said, "The world would not be bettered for turning a young man out of college. Let the world believe it as well as President Wheeler, if it can. Such things are better disbelieved than believed, anyway." Thus ended the conflict of authority, with Mrs. Van Horn stigmatized as an adulteress by Judge Ogden, and the only man with whom she is said to have been intimate, vindicated by the President of the State University.

The bachelor's burden is often a tenacious married flirt.

Skirting Bohemia

"The 'Dutch Supper' which followed the regular meeting of the Sequoia Club, the other week, was not the usual sauerkraut and frankfurter spread. In fact it did not smack of wienerwurst and beer. The hungry Sequoian could run the gamut of a St. Francis supper—if he had the price! In other words, the 'Dutch supper' was cousin-germain to a 'Dutch treat.' Now there is an ancient dispute as to the true and noble interpretation of a 'Dutch treat.' Large-minded, generous hearted folk usually agree that the person bidden to the Dutch treat foots the bill instead of the host that suggests it. The Sequoia Club accepted this interpretation of it, at least the feminine end did, and mere man had to take his cue. The idea of supplementing the copious draughts of ice water, which constituted the sole lubricant that night, by little supper parties in the grill room originated in the nimble mind of Ednah Robinson. She gathered a half-dozen satellites around her and suggested that they each ask some man who was on terms of excellent fellowship to join a supper party in the grill room. The girls who could take their courage by the scruff of the neck lost no time in inviting an escort to a 'Dutch supper,' and before long the grill was sprinkled with little parties of congenials rounded up under the Dutch treat banner.

Free Running Salt for the table. Runs freely from the shaker or cellar. It's sterilized. Insist on getting it.

The Sequoias cannot afford to "put up" for a supper every time they meet, and even punch is a blow at the club exchequer, so that the flowing bowl now and then responds to a regular W. C. T. U. recipe which virtuously reads: "To one large chunk of ice add a gallon of Spring Valley." "What is a salon without punch?" query the bibulous, but echo answers not. In spite of the uncertainty of the cheering bowl the women proudly point to the fact that the male attendance does not sag. There are any number of men who seem to take the Sequoia seriously. A jaundiced wag suggested that the men who go are tied to some woman's bonnet string and dragged there, but he did not prove his case. Charley Field, cleverest and most incorrigible of wits, insists on calling the Sequoia the "squawmen" and that "right out in meeting," too. I hear that Charles Sedgwick Aiken, the president of the Sequoia, and a great friend of Charley Field swallowed hard when he heard the bon mot, but he managed to smile it out. Aiken is the editor of Sunset, and that explains his enthusiasm as an officer of the club. He is always on a still hunt for talent and he believes in rounding it up and inciting it to action. In that way he gets many a suggestion for the magazine that has made great strides under his management.

The Bohemian Artists

That the commercial element has by no means crowded out all the talent in the Bohemian Club is evident from the present exhibition of paintings by the club artists. Without exaggeration, I may say that this is the best showing by San Francisco artists that has been given here in many years. It explains why there were no masterpieces hung at the just-closed fall exhibition at the Hopkins. The artists were saving their chefs d'oeuvres for the club exhibition. It is difficult to determine which are the best canvases, when such general excellence is apparent. Cadenasso has some gems in those atmospheric effects in which he revels, "After Glow" and "The Strangers" drawing forth much admiring and critical comment from the visitors on Tuesday night. Bloomer gives the result of his sketches up Inverness way in the summer, "In the Hills of Marin County" and "Evening Light" being in his best manner. Maynard Dixon has some of his characteristic sketches, with one large Chinese interior of a joss-house, which he calls "The Prayer." Gamble has seven exhibits, two Weber Lake views, and one an exquisite "Springtime" (Lake Merced). They are quite different from anything he has hitherto shown, gray shades predominating instead of the bright greens and yellows of his former works. Jorgenson has some Yosemite canvases and others, all in his usual majestic vein. Latimer's big canvas "Where the Trout Love to Hide," has been shown before, but he has two smaller works, "Near Guerneville" and "In the Armstrong Grove," that were the result of his summer outing inspiration. One of the best of Martinez's showing of six is "The Outcast," drawn in Paris. It is the figure of a man on a bench in the park, his head sunk in his hands, a pose of utter despondency expressed. The only "sold" sign thus far, by the way, is on one of Martinez's landscapes. Robinson has his enormous "Battle of Manila Bay," which covers many feet of wall, and two Yosemite, also one of his fine marines, showing a gale of wind off Seal Rocks. Stanton has but two paintings, but they show him at his best. Dickinson, Piazzoni and Seawell are all represented by good examples of their work. Piazzoni's simply revel in poetry and sentiment.

The Portraits

There are fewer portraits than usual. Clawson has one which he calls "A Rhapsody," not at all characteristic of him, suggesting the famous group of Milton and his sisters. It shows Emlyn Lewys at the piano, his three womenkind grouped about the instrument. Clawson's portrait of "Joe" Howell is far away from being lifelike and might be a portrait of anybody else than the subject who posed for it, but his portrait of the late P. B. Cornwall is an admirable treatment. Martinez has a portrait of "Miss F." and Wores shows his old one of Marie Wells, which I always considered a stiff, unnatural pose, and I have not changed my opinion. He has two other portraits that are very finely done. Sandona is represented by the two portraits he showed recently at his studio reception, those of Grace Llewellyn-Jones and Gertrude Joliffe. Orrin Peck's unfinished portrait of Mr. Phelan promises to be an excellent one when completed. I believe it is for the club's gallery of presidents.

At The Members' Reception

There was the usual gathering of members' women relatives at the opening of the exhibition on Tuesday night. There was nothing in any way bohemian about the gathering, which was vastly different from the genial affairs at which the Press Club used to entertain its women folks. The Bohemian reception was distinctly smart and except for the sprinkling of artists might have been any society crush. Mrs. Sam Boardman was there in a gray gown and wrap. Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels wore a cream lace frock, and a beautiful wrap of old rose panne velvet. Mrs. Edgar Peixotto looked very charming in lavender crepe. Mrs. Deering looked well in white and pink and Mrs. Latimer wore a handsome cream lace gown. The best dressed woman there was Mrs. Older, in a delicate shade of shrimp pink net, with rose hat of the same shade. Marie Wells was in red and ermine. Miss Llewellyn-Jones had the courage to come in evening dress as befits the subject of a portrait — in fact she wore the gown in which her pictures had been painted. Mrs. W. B. Hopkins, who has just returned from abroad after two years, made her first public appearance; she wore a stunning gown with a large plumed black hat.

Gregory's Thrilling Experience

Warren Gregory, the well-known lawyer, had a narrow escape from death Sunday before last while he was gathering mussels or whatever one gathers from rocks near Point Lobos, Monterey. An unusually ambitious wave washed Mr. Gregory from his slippery foothold and then he was dashed back and forth against the rocks for five or six minutes. His cries could not reach his friends, who were at some distance; fortunately some one missed him and caught sight of him as he was being washed back against the rocks and he was dragged out almost as dead as alive. Fortunately he had not been seriously injured but the experience was one which will make his heart beats quicken whenever it is recalled to him during the rest of his life.

A Philosophical Crook

Over in Oakland there is a man so different from all other men that I wonder he has not come more fully beneath the searching analysis of the local psychologists. His name is David P. Kiniry and he is in jail charged with the murder of a policeman. The peculiarity of this man is his assumption that burglary is a legitimate trade, upon the principle that he may take who has the power, and he must keep who can. Kiniry's philosophy is primitive and its application elemental. He argues that laws were devised classifying burglary as a crime for the purpose of protecting the property of the weak against the predatory habit of the strong. It is his opinion therefore that burglary is no more immoral than usury or the snap judgment that deprives a debtor of his property by the legal process of foreclosure. I asked him if he regarded murder as part of his trade of burglary and he replied that it was not necessarily in the curriculum but was certainly one of the vicissitudes of the burglar's vocation. It was always imminent that the burglar would be called upon to insure his life or his liberty against the assault of the law. If the burglar killed anyone who attempted to obstruct the free exercise of his right to rob another the act of killing was clearly in the category of homicide committed in self-defense. Burglary, argued this criminal sophist, is conducted on the "open shop" principle.

Why Other Men Are Honest

Kiniry cannot be classed with the "social highway-men" of fiction and he is not an "amateur cracksman" of the Hornung variety. It is true that he has led what the newspaper reporters and the melodramatists call a "dual life," that is to say he has companioned with the best society within his acquaintance during the day and he has burgled for a livelihood during the night. As a matter of fact his associations day and night have been absolutely respectable, the only difference being in the circumstance that during the day all concerned were wide awake and that during the night all except Kiniry were asleep. Kiniry says he prefers the companionship of respectable people. He detests the ordinary, vulgar thief as heartily as that illiterate, uncultured person is detested by the strictest Puritan of the Young Men's Christian Association — an organization with which Kiniry affiliated chiefly because its gymnasium afforded opportunity for constant and agreeable exercise of his muscles, thereby keeping him in excellent health for the somewhat arduous labors of his trade. Of course this educated and gentlemanly burglar insists that many of those who openly condemn him, now that he has been found out, are themselves secretly addicted to the so-called crimes for which the law condemns him. These people, however, are devoid of the courage of their convictions; they fear the law. It is the insurmountable bulwark of this fear that preserves a virtue which they are pleased to call honesty. In the opinion of this philosophical crook these timid fellows are self-deceptive egotists. They would not hesitate to rob a widow or an orphan of her ultimate dollar in a suit at law to collect a cent per cent mortgage secured by a promissory note given in a time of dire necessity when it was a question of the money or starvation. He instances the recent deal manipulated by Russell Sage in Wall street wherein that able and unscrupulous financier swooped down on his debtors with "call loans," thereby raising the rate of interest from four to six per cent — a stand and deliver proposition, Kiniry declares, as culpable from the strictly ethical point of view as any involving the action of the stage robber who levels a shotgun at the driver and orders him to "throw down the box." Altogether this debonnaire, nonchalant, philosophical crook is very much out of the ordinary, and worthy of closer attention by the newspaper scientists than he has thus far received. Even Professor Howison of the State University might study him with interest and possibly with some profit. It is not often in real life that a man like Kiniry drifts into our ken and only De Quincey, in his celebrated essay on "Murder as a Fine Art," has adequately treated a subject of similar psychological aspect.

"What was the cause of his break-down?"
"Trying to live up to his reputation."

Honors To Marsily

During his recent stay in Holland, Hon. George J. G. Marsily, Consul for the Netherlands and a resident of Oakland, was with his daughter Georgette the guest of Queen Wilhelmina. For services rendered by the Consul he was decorated by his sovereign, who made him Knight of her Royal Order of Orange-Nassau, an honor rarely bestowed on a civilian.

Oakland society had been looking forward to a gay time at the wedding of Josephine Winifred Barraclough and Percival J. Harwood of Honolulu. The affair was to be solemnized at the home of Miss Barraclough's brother in Piedmont, but the expectant groom finds that he cannot get away from his business. Therefore Mrs. J. T. Barraclough will sail for Honolulu with her sister-in-law and the wedding will take place there in March.

Claremont Day

The opening of the new Claremont Country Club drew all the social world and his wife to Oakland last Saturday. The Fifth Regiment band played during the afternoon. On the tall stone mantel in the living-room there was a great display of silver cups and trophies won by the various women's and men's clubs included in the Country Club. For the present I believe the entrance fee for men is one hundred dollars; for women, half that sum.

Egypt in Berkeley

"Sakimpala," an Egyptian play that has not seen the light outside the mystic land of the "Pharaohs and Fellahs," is to be given on December ninth in Professor Wickson's attic. Miss Wickson and her sister Dorothy found the old play in an ancient volume belonging to their father and decided to produce it. The affair will be in honor of Mrs. J. S. Bunnell and Katherine Bunnell, who leave Berkeley directly after the holidays for New York.

A Student Who "Knocked."

Much indignation is shown in the State University over the action of a senior in the class of mechanical engineering, who wrote to the Carnegie Steel Company in the East discrediting Professor Frank Soule, head of the department. In a talk to his class on "Strength of Materials" Professor Soule explained the act for which the young man had taken it upon himself to censure him. It seems that the professor wrote to the Cambria Steel Company before the beginning of the term, asking for copies of their "Cambria" for distribution to his class. The company replied that the books could be had only at the regular price of fifty-five cents each, and about eighty men of the university subscribed for them. Later, Mr. Isaacs, the representative of the Carnegie Steel Company, offered to send out one hundred and thirty copies of his company's books for free distribution. The offer was accepted by Professor Soule and the books were placed in charge of the co-operative store, it being decided that only those who had subscribed for the "Cambria" should receive these new books. After these had been supplied the books were given to all of the class who applied for them. When they were exhausted Professor Soule wrote to Mr. Isaacs asking for a further supply, and was told that there were no more available. Later, it was found that a senior of the class had written to the Carnegie Steel Company accusing his professor of double dealing and charging that only those who paid for the book of the rival company could receive the gift of the Carnegie concern. Professor Soule says that the man who made the false statement to the Eastern firm was not only guilty of malicious falsehood but attacked his honor.

"Mrs. Brown of London."

The "Mrs. Brown of London" who frequently appears in the social columns of local dailies is a follower of Miss Withrow. Miss Withrow was Mrs. Brown's teacher in London town and when the music teacher returned to San Francisco the pupil came with her, and has decided to remain for a time, at least. Mrs. Brown of London is already enjoying all the clubs and most of the teas. She is a round-faced woman who wears lorgnettes and has a singularly direct gray-eyed gaze. She is not at all like most of the English women we see in these parts.

Century Club Finances

The Century Club had an exciting and stormy meeting last week, the result of which was the determination to build a club house costing thirty-seven thousand dollars. The club has been in a ferment over the question for months—ever since the lot at the corner of Sutter and Franklin was purchased. This lot with the house cost thirty thousand dollars and it was the intention to use the house as it stands with some alterations. The house is the old Bee residence and though handsome in its time and costly, it having been built twenty-five years ago, is entirely unsuitable for a modern club house. The Hastings property, where the Century Club now holds its meetings, was offered to the club for sixty thousand dollars but the women lifted their hands in holy horror. Several advocated the purchase of this property thinking that the lot would soon be available for business purposes at which the club could realize a handsome profit and move further up town, using the building without change in the meantime. The club had no money but bonds to the amount of forty thousand dollars were sold within the club for the purchase of the Bee property, thus leaving a ten thousand dollar surplus for remodeling the house. Now that the conservatives have been routed, the radicals have determined to move the house off the lot, sell it for what they can get and build a fine new building to cost nearly forty thousand dollars—seven thousand dollars more than the Hastings property was offered for, the very thought of buying which gave several members nervous prostration.

An Attack of Cold Feet

Mrs. Alec Morrison was instrumental in carrying the day for the progressives. She had been one of the conservatives but had talked the matter over with some of her men friends who had laughed her out of her fears. She, in her turn, passed the laugh on. The new building will be by far the finest club house for women in San Francisco. It will contain two halls for renting purposes. The women of the California Club were eager to have the first and best club house in the city, but after talking of spending forty or fifty thousand dollars they were seized with cold feet over the prospect of a large bonded debt. Some of them were almost frightened out of their senses when told that as the club was incorporated each member was liable for its debts. So they compromised on a twenty-five thousand dollar building.

The Neurotic

BY ROBERT MACE.

When the bavardes of the press announced in the social columns that Miss Hattie Gaylor would leave in a few days for Europe, there were at least six young bachelors in town who were quite distressed by the news. One of them, Bob Idlewight, almost threw a conniption fit, for his income was not only slender but uncertain, and Miss Gaylor had given him the impression that she favored his suit. He could not afford a protracted interregnum in his courtship.

Miss Gaylor was a great heiress, and was alone in the world. Both her parents were dead, and there was a wide gulf between herself and her relatives. She seldom saw any of them.

Miss Gaylor was one of the most popular belles in society, and the object of much interest to fortune-hunting beaux. She received their attentions as though she had no conception of their meaning, a circumstance that caused her friends to regard her as somewhat peculiar. None but her most intimate chum knew that she had had an affair of the heart.

It was during a gay season at Coronado that she met Dr. Granby of New York, and with her it was a case of love at first sight. But her dream was dispelled when she learned that he had a wife in the East of whom he was very fond. Fortunately she had not revealed her passion to him, but occasionally she brooded over her disappointment, and as a consequence exposed her nerves. On her return from Coronado she took the rest cure, and her physician said that the excitement of the social whirl had slightly deranged her nervous system. But she soon recovered, and was as buoyant as ever, though occasionally she was given to moodiness, and then her friends knew that her nerves were active.

Bob Idlewight lost no time in calling on Miss Gaylor after reading the news of her contemplated trip.

"Even a society girl must take a holiday," she said in answer to his question as to her sudden determination to go abroad. She smiled pleasantly and did not notice the expression of deep concern on Idlewight's face.

"I shall not be away more than a few months," she continued. "This interminable round of mechanical functions, meeting the same old faces, and being bored by the same old bores, gets on my nerves."

"Do I—" began Bob in a tone of mingled banter and pain.

"Oh, no, I can stand you, Bob," she said with a smile. "Even almanac jokes are preferable to stale gossip. You are always good fun. I'm going to let you have my automobile while I am away."

Idlewight smiled grimly. "Don't think I can afford the gasoline," he said.

"I've provided for that," said Miss Gaylor with a hearty laugh. "But you must leave me now; I'm busy packing. Meet me at the train and don't waste any money on flowers."

II.

The trip across the continent was tiresome and dull. Miss Gaylor and her friend, Miss Wilson, read nearly all the way, and were worn out when they reached New York. But on board the great Atlantic liner their spirits were revived. Dr. Granby accompanied them to the steamer and when he said good-bye an expression of sadness flitted across Miss Gaylor's face. But a little later she seemed the most joyous person on board the ship. Crossing the Atlantic she enjoyed every moment of the trip. Each bound of the vessel seemed an aspiration accomplished. The waves nodded approval, and pleasant odors came up from the deep. Her face was incessantly wreathed in smiles. She seemed to feel that she had triumphed over boredom. This was freedom! The wind caressed her hair with faint kisses, and when night came the pulsing stars above her shared in the joy that thrilled her being.

Her destination was not Paris. She had left home to escape from the smoke and grime of the city. To Ireland she went and into the fields where she inhaled the sweet odors of earth, and spoke to the country people as they passed along the open road. The hot sun embraced her and the birds called to her in their thin voices with so lover-like an entreaty in their songs, that she waved her hands to them, and occasionally burst into song herself to encourage their joyous notes. At the end of a few weeks she felt refreshed, and invigorated, and started on her homeward journey.

III.

The steamer entered the New York harbor and Miss Gaylor stood on the deck watching the small craft approach. She was filled with glad expectancy, and when the ship was boarded she scanned every visitor. She was expecting a friend, but he came not. With her companion she entered the big city, and was rapidly driven to a hotel where apartments had already been engaged. It was her intention to remain in New York a few days and see some of the latest theatrical sensations. The longing for home had seized her, but she was fond of the theatre and had made up her mind to witness certain performances which had been warmly praised by the critics. Presently she walked to an open window, and looked down on the moving, jostling throng below. A peculiar sensation came over her. A delicate mist came before her eyes, and she heard a soft voice calling her. It was the voice of a man. It was a voice that she knew. It was tender and sweet, and it came from below. "Do not keep me waiting," it said. So he really wanted her, she said to herself. She must go. She had been at the window but the fraction of a second, but it seemed as though she had kept him waiting a long time. So she hurried to his arms, through space, to the pavement.

The Camel House Light illustrated on the front cover of this issue is the latest invention in house lights. This light has been tested for years and is a success in every particular. The Camel House Light gives a very powerful light, being equal to five or dinary Welsbach burners. The light is given because the burner is so constructed that the gas and air is properly mixed in the air chamber of the lamp and with the addition of the air hole chimneys the consumption of gas is reduced to eight per cent, while ninety-two per cent of air is burned. As a consequence, a candle power of 500 candles is produced with a consumption of gas only equal to that consumed in an ordinary light. The mantle used is made in a green color which burns off after the mantle is lighted, but this mantle is very heavily impregnated with the chemicals, the thorium in this mantle being nearly a fifty per cent solution. There are many places where these mantles have been burning over one year. For a light which will give satisfaction the Camel House Light is recommended.

Artistic calendars for 1905 are now beginning to make their appearance. From the publishing house of Paul Elder & Co. comes one of the most beautiful that I have ever seen. From an artistic standpoint, it is an exceptionally creditable performance, and not a little of its value is due to the quotations interspersed among its illumined pages.

The Stage

A Colorful Show

Those self-styled royal comedians, Williams and Walker, who returned from London without any medals, but proud of having excited the jaded fancy and won the esteem of Albert Edward, have brought a wealth of color with them to the Grand. "In Dahomey" is distinctly a colored production. It was written—book and music—by sons of Ham, and it is presented by ladies and gentlemen of African descent. Even the leader of the orchestra is sheathed in the skin of fast hue that radium will not turn. In addition to color there is atmosphere to spare in this darky production. It fairly reeks Darktown atmosphere. It is a comic dramatization of the advanced negro, of the colored gentleman in the pride and panoply of the high station to which every boot-black aspires. The conceits and vanities of the negro are delightfully sketched in this breezy, tuneful musical comedy, and its fidelity to nature, and the vividness of the generalization of its individual types, raise it almost to the dignity of a classic. The strength of the company, considering the fact that it is of strictly negro extraction, is remarkable, the performance being superior to many that have been given in this city by the highest priced New York organizations. The chorus was not picked for beauty of face or figure, but it contains several good voices and more than the usual number of toggle-joints. Every man and woman has the swing of the accomplished cake-walker, and all are past masters and mistresses of the buck-and-wing art. Williams and Walker are a team thoroughly imbued with a sense of their importance, and of their title to the stage-centre, the foreclosing of which is their favorite pastime. They are industrious comedians, and one of them, Bert Williams, is an artist who compels laughter. He is of the Sweatman-Thatcher order of colored comedian, extra-dry and exceedingly droll. An artist of equal merit is Miss Aida Walker, a soubrette full of magnetism and bubbling over with talent. "In Dahomey" has proved a strong attraction and it is entitled to the money.

In the Lime Light

Florence Roberts made a great hit in Salt Lake City, where she lately appeared.

The Alcazar's revival of E. R. Willard's former successes, "The Professor's Love Story"—on the stage this week—and "Judah," the ante-holiday attraction, is of timely interest because the favorite English actor begins another American tour at the Knickerbocker, New York, next month.

Belasco and Mayer's stock company at the Belasco theatre, Los Angeles, is meeting with great success. Amelia Gardner met with an enthusiastic welcome, upon her return, and has scored great hits in "The Christian" and "A Lady of Quality." Joseph Galbraith, a young and handsome leading man, brought on from Philadelphia, is so good that the management signed him for two years the morning after his first appearance. George Barnum has become a favorite.

Pinero's dancing doll is soon to provoke blushes in New York. "A Wife without a Smile" is now being rehearsed under Frohman's management.

May Irwin must be contemplating a tour to the West. I received a big bunch of press notices from her agent this week about her success in "Mrs. Black is Back."

Fanny Janauschek's death in poverty is a sermon for improvident stage stars.

Georgia Bryton, who will be in "A Chinese Honey-moon," made her first appearance before the public when she could barely walk, on the stage of old Drury Lane in London. "Aladdin" was about to be produced, and Georgia was engaged to create the role of the Captain of the Forty Thieves. Augustin Daly saw her when he moved his famous company to London and engaged her to appear at his New York theatre. She remained under his management for three years, when Charles H. Hoyt engaged her to create the role of the boy in "A Trip to Chinatown."

What an awful crush there'll be at the Grand when Blanche Bates opens. The St. Louis engagement was a fortunate one for the Californian actress, for it brought her into contact with people from all parts of the world, and enabled her to win such widespread fame as comes only to those who have traveled great distances for their conquests. Instead of going to the remote corners of the country to introduce herself to people, she held the stage in St. Louis for several months, and the people from remote corners came to her. She broke all records in St. Louis.

Max Hirschfeld, formerly leader of the Tivoli orchestra, is now wielding the baton for Fields formerly of the Weber-Field combination.

Proctor, the famous vaudeville manager, has perfected a circuit extending to this city and including the Orpheum. Mr. Proctor has on his lists some of the best people in the vaudeville business.

New York is gradually awakening to the fact that though Fritzi Scheff is cuteness personified her voice is so acute as to be occasionally painful.

"The Senator" Again

It was a mistake to allot Crane's role in "The Senator" to Howard Gould, for J. H. Gilmour was decidedly the man for the part. The perfection of a stock performance always depends upon having every character properly fitted to the actor or actress best suited to portray it. Now Mr. Gilmour, as any one who has ever seen him act must know, is suited in every way to take the part that made Crane famous. Gould would be well enough fitted with the part of the stuttering lieutenant, which does not suit Gilmour at all. The other parts are acted very well, though of course "The Senator" will never seem quite the same in stock hands to those who saw the original star cast, with Georgie Drew Barrymore as the widow.

PADEREWSKI,

The Wizard of the Piano, who is to appear at the Alhambra Saturday afternoon, Dec. 17th, and Monday and Wednesday evenings, Dec. 19th and 21st.

Paderewski Coming

Ignace Jan Paderewski, the greatest of living pianists, is due to arrive from Australia on Monday morning. The opening concert of his American tour will take place at the Alhambra on Saturday afternoon, the seventeenth, the second Paderewski concert on Monday evening, December nineteenth, and the third on Wednesday evening, the twenty-first. In all probability Paderewski will devote considerable attention to the playing of his own compositions, which include: Minuetto, opus 1; Chant du Voyageur, opus 3; Variations and Fugue on an original Theme, opus 11; Humoresques a l'antique, opus 14; Legende, Nocturne, opus 13. For piano and orchestra; Concerto, opus 17; Polish Fantasy, opus 19. There are two collections of song—Album de Mai, opus 10; Mickiewicz Lieder, opus 18. But the work on which he lavished his care and labor is the opera "Manru," which was first performed at Dresden, May twenty-ninth, 1901, and afterward at Lemberg and Cracow. The sale of reserved seats will open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Monday morning at nine o'clock.

Paderewski's Reputation is Real

I suppose that Paderewski's sweet and charming nature, so well known to his intimates, has more than most people would suppose to do with his success. His heart is pure, his life clean, his ideas lofty. He is full of fun, of humor, but never low. This refinement of Paderewski's incurred for him the enmity of a man, powerful and influential in his way, and old enough to be his father. This man, an American, entered Paderewski's dressing room before a concert one evening. He started to tell a "blue" story, and was promptly turned out of the room by the artist. Naturally this has never been forgotten by the old man, whose coarseness was unappreciated, but it gives an excellent insight into the artist's character. This shows that it is possible to have a sensitive and highly developed nervous system, to lead for many moons in each year the roving life of a bohemian, although it is roving in purple and fine linen, and yet be a clean and self-respecting mortal.

A Scenic Melodrama

The racetrack melodrama at the Central gives opportunity for the scenic artist, and spirited acting by Mayall, Shumer, Halifax, Miss Clifton, Miss Vane and Miss Blanc. People out this way always enjoy anything with a race in it. I could fancy "The Sporting Duchess" going well on the Central's big stage.

Features of Next Weeks Bills

One of the sweetest love stories ever staged is "Caprice," which has just become available for stock, and the Alcazar has secured it for presentation next week. It was this play that enabled Mrs. Fiske to win her first success. Lillian Lawrence will be seen as the country girl who weds the young artist. To follow comes "Judah," then Joseph Arthur's "Lost River." This play has never been done in stock, nor have other Alcazar acquisitions, such as Mansfield's version of "Old Heidelberg," the German military drama "Taps," and a score of others.

"Mr. Potter of Texas" will confine himself to the Majestic stage during all next week and it will be admitted by all who have read Gunter's book that as a stage personality the famous character of his creation will be more interesting than in a cold type make-up. J. H. Gilmour will portray Mr. Potter, Howard Gould will have a congenial role and the other favorites will be in the cast.

In the new edition of "A Chinese Honeymoon" opening at the Columbia Monday night among the principals are John L. Kearney, Robinson Newbold, George Broderick, Albert Froom, Joseph E. Miller, Georgia Bryton, Regina McAvoy, Mabella Baker, Winnie Carter, Helen Latten and Eveleen Dunmore, with a chorus of over fifty. "The Billionaire" comes next.

Hermann the Great will make his first vaudeville appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum, this coming week. He announces many novelties and some startling illusions. Vernon, the ventriloquist, will return with a brand new act. Mrs. Vernon assists in the act, introducing some elaborate costumes. The Ford sisters, Dora and Mabelle, a duo of singing and dancing girls, will make their first appearance in San Francisco, with latest Eastern song successes.

At the Central the bill will be the sensational melodrama, "Lost in Siberia," which is full of startling features. An escape from prison is one. To follow comes, direct from the Criterion theatre, New York, "The Two Little Waifs," with the stars Tempest and Sunshine.

A present that always pleases the Mr. Man—a bottle of good pure whisky. You can depend on the word of an old established house like HOTALINGS; they will tell you buy the best, OLD KIRK, and please your friends.

In Financial Circles

The week's business has again been satisfactory. Dealings in Bonds aggregated $400,000—in Stocks, 11,425 shares, divided as follows: 1,776 Lighting, 570 Spring Valley Water, 1,739 Miscellaneous and 7,340 Sugars. Trading in S. F. Gas & Electric has shown a little more activity though the much talked of competition has put a damper on the stock. Spring Valley Water shows no change and Alaska Packers shows a further decline to $86. Even at that figure there was a lack of support from inside sources, which intensified the apprehension felt by small holders. A great deal of activity was displayed in Sugar stocks, while a good deal of profit taking has taken place. Prices were well maintained. One of the largest Hawaiian plantation companies (the Honolulu) is about to enter the field as a competitor to the Trust in marketing its product in a refined shape. The Trust is preparing for war and the situation promises to be full of interest. Of course this will not affect the price of raw sugar, that being regulated by the world's markets.

—The Financier.

PICTURE FRAMES

An immense variety of mouldings for framing pictures to order; also ready-made frames in all the new shapes and every tint and color of mat board and binding paper made. Sanborn, Vail & Co., 741 Market street.

The romance of a famous Chicago singer and a well-known Californian woman is one of the interesting stories in tomorrow's (Sunday) Bulletin. Other features are a study of Paderewski and his vogue; Admiral Remey's son's adventures while on a horseback trip in the wild Southwest; how Captain Baldwin's Californian airship beat the record; Protean life of a young man who courted four women at once. Madame Bavarde will furnish her regular quota of bright society chat, Frances Joliffe will interview prominent theatrical folk and there will be timely contributions from Dorothy Dix, Grant Wallace, Lowell Otis Reese, John T. Waldorf and other well known writers.

From Ghosts to the Orpheum

One by one the actors in the legitimate take a little vacation and go into vaudeville. No actress of the serious drama ever stepped into vaudeville so gracefully as Mary Snaw, who is now playing in a thirty-minute farce called "The Silent System" at the Orpheum this week. From the depressing horror of Ibsen's "Ghosts" to a typical Orpheum farce must mean a great relaxation and Mary Shaw enters into the spirit of the thing as if it were great fun. The story turns on a wife's jealousy of her husband. Its situations are funny enough to keep a vaudeville audience in good humor throughout the entire piece. John and Harry Dillon, two well known performers, again appear with a new act in which they introduce some new specialties. A contralto with the refined name of Phyllis Allen sings well but her work is marred by the society manner which she affects. Others on the bill are Frank and Little Bob, gymnasts, Howard's ponies and dogs, Marguerite Le Roy and Signor Ricci, the Josselin Trio and Clement de Leon.

DANNY HALIFAX.

Light comedian, who has spanned the few years of absence from this coast while he was starring in the East by leaping into immediate favor at the Central. In next week's production Mr. Halifax will have a splendid comedy role. The piece next week will be "Lost in Siberia," a thrilling melodrama.

The Professor in Love

One of the prettiest plays that has been given here in many a day is "The Professor's Love Story," and the Alcazar company gives it a very faithful interpretation. It is full of the charming humor that J. M. Barrie, above all the authors and playwrights of the day, possesses. The wit is brilliant without being satirical. The hero is an old-young man, an electrical professor who is immersed in diagrams and galvanometers. When he falls in love with Lucy White, his pretty young secretary, he does not recognize the symptoms. But no longer is he able to find enjoyment in figuring A plus B, C minus D. Lucy's name spells itself before him and his interest in electrics lags. One of the physicians he consults tells him to try quinine for his malady, but a cleverer mind-reader suggests that all that ails him is love. "How dare you suggest such a thing?" asks the old-young scholar, in anger. "Tell me who is the woman?" But the physician refuses to divulge the secret of her identity. In the next act we find the professor joyously gamboling in a field, with his pretty young secretary. He feels happy and boyish, but still does not suspect the reason of the change in him. His sister, who is prejudiced against the sex because of a love affair of her own that did not go smoothly, objects to her brother's falling in love with Lucy, which romance she sees growing before her eyes. There is another woman in the play, a fascinating young widow whose step-children desire to get her another husband so they can receive their inheritance. The mamma concocts a plan by which she is to faint in the field and be restored by the professor. "If a woman can't draw a man to speak sweet words when she is in his arms," reasons the wily widow, "well—that woman is not a widow." Lucy overhears the plan and decides to make use of it herself. The result is happiness for the professor and the girl he loves, and the discomfiture of the designing widow. "The Professor's Love Story" is a series of those refreshing stage pictures that occasionally serve as a tonic after a long diet of problem dramas and wishy-washy comedies. The acting is admirable, Mr. Craig playing the professor with fine understanding of the character. Of course thoroughly to enter into the spirit of the scenes the company needs a more lengthy season than one week.

Eleanor Haber in New Monologues

Society will assemble in the ball-room at the St. Francis next Thursday evening when Eleanor Haber will give a monologue recital. The hour for the recital is placed at the fashionable one of nine. Only six numbers will constitute the program. With the exception of two of the selections, all will be of a humorous character: "Shoes," "At the Employment Office," "Mr. Carson's Wife," and "Her First Experience." The serious numbers will be "Three Old English Ballads," very beautiful and quaintly worded, and "The Philosopher in the Apple Orchard," arranged from a pathetic little play Miss Haber heard in New York and which she adapted for her monologue entertainment. Miss Haber is a niece of George Davis, manager of the Central theatre, and is very talented. She was on the stage in New York with David Belasco's company for a season, and last year had a season with the Neills. Among Miss Haber's patrons for her recital are the Norris Davises, Mark Gerstles, Mrs. Lilienthal, Mrs. McKinstry, the De Youngs, George Sperrys and Mrs. Eleanor Martin.

ALFRED A. FARLAND,

Conceded to be the world's greatest banjoist, who will give a single recital in this city at Steinway hall, next Tuesday evening. His program will include compositions of Chopin, Paganini, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart and other classical writers. Mr. Farland will be assisted by Alice Kellar-Fox, renowned for her banjo playing and her singing. Seats are on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

Music

[Communications addressed to this department should be received not later than Tuesday noon.]

The Kopta Concerts

The third chamber music concert of the Kopta Quartet, assisted by Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, will be given tomorrow (Sunday) afternoon, in Lyric hall. The program will be: String quartet, op. 41, No. 1, Schumann; string quartets, Adagio from op. 137 (first time), Lachner, Scherzo from Quartet No. 1, Cherubini; piano quintet, op. 51 (first time), Arensky. The fourth concert will take place on January fifteenth, 1905, when the program will be: Sonata for piano and violin (Sonata Chromatique—first time), Raff; string quartet op. 74, No. 10 (harp quartet), Beethoven; piano trio op. 50 (by request), Tchaikowsky.

San Francisco Conservatory Concert

As usual on the occasions of the San Francisco Conservatory's pupil concerts, the Alhambra theatre was crowded to the doors on Wednesday evening of last week. There were twelve numbers and only in a few instances were encores permitted. E. S. Bonelli, director of the Conservatory, conducted the program, which went off without any hitches whatever. It was an admirable exposition of the work of the advanced students, in piano, violin, cornet, vocal and ensemble (strings). The piano pupils who took part were Beatrice Wornes, Winnie Valor, Mrs. E. Paillet, Bessie Beatty and William R. Beatty. Particularly good was the work of Mrs. Paillet, Miss Beatty and Mr. Beatty. The last-named has evidently bestowed much time on his practice, and has an excellent understanding of his art. Miss Wornes' number was a brilliant Polka de Concert by Bartlett; Miss Valor's, Rubinstein's "Portrait in F sharp"; Mrs. Paillet's, a Meditation, by Jaell; Miss Beatty's, a Romance by Gruenfeld and the picturesque Valse de Concert, op. 3, by Wieniawski; Mr. Beatty's, the Schubert-Tausig Marche Militaire which has become so familiar to San Francisco audiences as a selection in the repertory of visiting virtuosos. Mrs. Lenore Greven received a very warm welcome as she stepped upon the stage to sing the big air from "Oberon," which suits her large, full soprano so well. Mr. Greven accompanied his wife's solo, at the piano. Miss Estelle Grey, accompanied at the piano by Miss Beatty, rendered the violin solo, Polonaise A major, by Wieniawski, exhibiting skill and intelligence. Miss Maud Crabtree, contralto, gave an aria from "Il Trovatore," and Miss Grace Crane, to the piano accompaniment of Charles Rogers, gave a cornet solo that was one of the most warmly received numbers of the program. Her selection was a Grand Fantasia by Millars. The air from "Mignon" was very well rendered by Miss Lillian Beanston, whose voice is a soprano, clear and well balanced. The string quintet, that opened the program, was an interesting number. "In Beauty's Bower," Bendix, was rendered by: Violins, Misses M. Abeille and A. Valentino, Alfred Lamb; viola, P. Kinell; violoncello, Messrs. McLane and Harding. As the concluding numbers the S. F. Conservatory Mandolin Club rendered two delightful selections—Serenade, Sartori, and Hawaiian Melody, McLean—with precision and expression.

The Adelstein Musicales

The first mandolin musicale of the second season was given by Mr. Samuel Adelstein and pupils on Monday evening of last week. As usual the affair attracted a large and fashionable crowd. The mandolin and lute selections were extremely good and played with fine effect. One needs to hear the Adelsteins to discover what can be done with plectrum instruments. Many of the numbers were special arrangements made for the mandolin orchestra by Alfred Cottin and Edouard Mezzocapo of Paris. Mr. Glen Cowgill, the soloist of the evening, is quite a virtuoso, and surprised the audience by the effects he produced. Miss Helen Heath, the vocalist, was in excellent voice. Miss Heath is one of the most gifted of our local concert singers, and is always eagerly listened to. Mr. Amon Cain, baritone, late of the Castle Square Opera Company, New York, made his first appearance in San Francisco. Mr. Cain has a noble voice and much dramatic power. I predict that he will be a success, as he certainly was on Monday evening. The program offered was as follows: "Alborda," a Sevillian serenade, by the Mandolin Orchestra accompanied by castanets and tamborine; songs, "Du Bist die Ruh" and "Pastorale," Miss Helen

The Coonan Sisters

Blanene Coonan is a young violinist of very unusual promise. At the recital given by herself and her sister on Tuesday evening last she showed a breadth and freedom rarely found in the feminine player. Her numbers were ambitious for so young a performer, including the Grieg Sonata op. 8, the rarely beautiful Mozart Concerto in E flat, Melodrame de Piccolino (Lefort), a Sauret Capricietto (played for the first time in San Francisco), and for a finale, the brilliant Leonard Fantasia Militaire. Miss Coonan is still in the age of short frocks, yet her playing is mature. She gets a good full tone, her bowing is easy and her technique admirable. Besides, she has temperament and musical intelligence. She is a pupil of Nathan Landsberger. Miss Josephine Coonan, the pianiste, now studying under Hugo Mansfeldt, used to be heard from time to time at the late Otto Bendix's recitals. She has always been a conscientious student and her work has been marked by steady improvement. She accompanied her sister with intelligence and good taste. Miss Coonan is a brilliant solo player, and is doubly fortunate in possessing what few soloists have, that sixth sense which tells an accompanist just what is wanted. Her solo work for the evening comprised Liszt's "Heriodade," a Liebling "Capricietto," Poldini's "Etude de Concert" (op. 19, No. 6), a Schumann Novelette, Elkus's "Lady of Shalott" and Sinding's "Frühlingsrauschen."

Miss Wolfe's Recital

The song recital given by Miss Ida Muriel Wolfe on Tuesday evening of last week in Century hall was decidedly a social and an artistic success. The hall was packed to the doors and many of the audience stood throughout the program. Miss Wolfe possesses a powerful voice which shows careful cultivation and holds inducement for more. The program was long and varied, and the young artist stood the ordeal with self-possession, much grace and ability. Her tone is not at all times pure, and there is a peculiar quality in her voice; some of her low notes are very sweet and well sustained and some of her high notes are clear, but at times her attack is not good. Here is a place for the acquisition of certainty and smoothness. The most ambitious effort of Miss Wolfe was "Die Lorelei," of Liszt, which she sang with much fervor and color. Among the composers represented on the program were Bracken, Grieg, Schumann, Gretry, Reinecke, Schlesinger, Wekerlin and Arthur Whiting. Miss Wolfe rendered three Russian songs, by Daridoff, Arensky and Tchaikowsky, with much effectiveness, as also the old Irish song "Fly not Yet." Mr. Strelitz, the cellist, accompanied Miss Wolfe in Reinecke's "Spring Flowers," and contributed two solo numbers to the program, the "Reverie" by Bottesini and Gotterman's Grand Duo. He was received with much applause. Mr. Maurer was at the piano, and as usual his accompaniments were delightful.

At the evening service of the Washington Avenue Baptist church, New York, the last Sunday in November, W. H. Keith, the baritone of its famous choir, sang "Abide with Me" to an exquisite arrangement by Liddle.

The death of David Loring means a great loss to musical life here. Mr. Loring was the founder of the Loring Club, which he directed for many years, only giving up his work with the club during his absence from San Francisco. During the period of his absence D. P. Hughes was the leader. Mr. Loring also founded the Schumann Club, for women's voices.

Cantor E. J. Stark of Emanu-El will leave for the East tomorrow. The congregation has granted him a two months' vacation his health being somewhat run down from overwork. New York will be his headquarters, but he will visit several of the other cities. He will make arrangements while in New York to publish his five volumes of Temple music.

Howe Club Concert

The third concert of the Howe Club was given last Friday evening, conductor, James Hamilton Howe; concert master, Charles G. Montgomery; soloists, Mrs. Celia J. Weil, soprano, Mrs. Edith Scott Basford, contralto, Miss Grace M. Campbell, oboe, Miss M. A. McCann, harp, T. Jenkins, tenor, J. Dykes, Jr., tenor, George Stark, baritone, George R. Bird, bass, Hugh Williamson, bass, Miss Ruby A. Moore, accompanist. The orchestral division opened the concert with the overture, "Rosamunde," Schubert, and also played, for an intermezzo, Schubert's March Militaire, transcribed for grand orchestra by Mr. Howe. The first part of the program was devoted to Theodore Dubois's Paradise Lost, parts one and two. Of the solo singers Mr. Williamson, the bass, was most worthy of praise. He has a fine organ, sings intelligently, musically and with good taste. The other singers were badly over-weighted and the choruses, while earnest, energetic and of full volume of tone, were evidently not able to cope with the difficulties of so ambitious an undertaking. The various divisions were not equal to their scores. But Part II was delightful; nothing better of its kind than Anderton's part song, "The Curfew," rendered by the choral division, has ever been given in San Francisco. It was reminiscent of the Loring Club in its best days, with this difference that the addition of women's voices supplied what so often was felt to be a lack in many numbers of the small choruses. The orchestral division, that had not shown very much life in the numbers on the first part of the program, were enthusiastically encoored for the stringed rendition of Ballet's "Babillage." Misses G. M. Campbell and M. A. McCann won a recall for their exquisite playing on oboe and harp. The Choral Division again were excellent in Fanning's "Son of the Vikings," Mrs. Edith Scott Basford sang a cycle of songs by Arthur Sumerville. The concert closed with the choral and orchestral divisions in Mendelssohn's "Be not afraid" (Elijah). The audience almost filled the large hall. The organization of this club was the outcome of a desire on the part of a few friends and acquaintances of the musical director, to meet once a week for the delightful practice and rehearsal of modern classic choral music. The conditions for membership are: good voice, moderate reading powers, prompt and regular attendance upon rehearsals and concerts. The dues are small, and a portion of the music used is furnished from the director's library. The director's services are a labor of love, the desire being to benefit those who have a sincere appreciation for the best music, and to render what aid possible, in building a choral force capable of taking up any oratorio, cantata or operatic excerpt worthy of serious attention. The director further urges that none, who really feel that they have the desire and ability to sing, be deferred from applying for membership. The orchestral division is formed from the best amateur element of the city supplemented by a few professionals, many of the amateurs being competent to enter the regular profession should they so desire.

A Night of Revelry

A most enjoyable entertainment was that given by Miss Jean Logan and her pupils on Friday evening last and entitled "A Night of Revelry in Cupid's Garden." The little folks were graceful and well drilled, and their pretty costumes and clever specialties received unstinted praise from the large audience. Space forbids any detailed mention of the little actors, all of whom did so well, but I can not pass over the "Folly" of Miss Flora Dietrich, the "Fairy" of Miss Arline Rice, nor the cunning baby "Cupid" of Elsie Weder. The dances of the "Bluebells," the "Gayety" girls, gowned like poppies, and the classic "Nymphs" were charming arrangements well carried out. The double sextet "Tell Me Dusky Maiden" brought down the house. The "Wigwam Dance" of Fredericka Gomez was a very original effect; it was really pantomime rather than dancing, and nobody but a clever student could have carried it out. The entertainment closed with "Living Pictures," and an ensemble, "My Own United States," Donald Cameron doing the vocal part very nicely. Miss Jean Logan appeared in several of her specialties. The entertainment showed originality and hard work, and was a credit to Miss Logan and her assistants.

At a concert given by the Blanchard and Venter Concert Company in Stockton last week, Margaret Gray Best, a pupil of Percy Dow, made a most pleasing impression. One Stockton critic wrote of her: "Margaret Gray Best is possessed of a fine soprano voice and sang her numbers with much ability. Her voice is possessed of much strength and has excellent quality."

Cecil Cowles will Play

Cecil Cowles, the phenomenal child pianist, will give her second annual concert December fifteenth in Steinway hall. The little artist will play a new and very difficult program, including some of her own compositions from the opera she is composing, called "The Fairy Queen." Cecil is a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt. Her program at her recital will be: Deux Nocturne, op. 55, Fantaisie-Impromptu, Valse E minor, Chopin; Marionette, No. 2, Poldini; Theme and Variations, Cecil Cowles; Fruhlingsrauschen, Sinding; Nachtstucke, Schumann; Melody in F, Rubinstein; Fugue, op. No. 3, Rheinberger; Polonaise, Cecil Cowles; Valse, C sharp minor, Scherzo, Chopin.

Little Eric and Elizabeth Davis will give their second operatic concert next Friday evening in Y. M. C. A. Auditorium.

Miss Joan Baldwin's piano recital will be reviewed in next week's issue.

Singers from Over the Bay

There was a large sprinkling of Oakland society people in the audience that assembled at Mrs. Carroll-Nicholson's pupil recital, last Friday evening. It was a recital somewhat out of the common, in that the singers were all young, and this was in most cases their first appearance before an audience. Though there were several good voices among the singers, in Miss Susie B. Culver Mrs. Nicholson has a real "find." Miss Culver's is the "velvet" voice that one so often reads about but rarely hears. She sang with very fine expression Nevin's "O That We Two Were Maying" and "Erinnerung" by Spicker. Another young singer whose voice shows promise to a decided degree is Miss Lita Schlesinger. She gave McDowell's "Deserted" and Thome's "Sonnet d'Amour" with rare feeling, clear tone and admirable diction. A charming number was the trio "Absent" (Lynes, arranged by Metcalf), by Misses Schlesinger, Waterman and Murcell, the voices blending together as one beautifully shaded tone. The double quartet that opened the program was also good, Bishop's "The Bloom is on the Rye." Other numbers were: Massenet's Elegie and "Open thy Blue Eyes," Miss Mary E. Scott; Serenade, Misses Susan and Ruth Waterman; "Thine eyes so Blue and Tender," Lassen, Miss Cora Ethel Reagh; "Ave Maria," solo by Miss Scott, with double quartet; "Lo Hear the Gentle Lark," Bishop, Mrs. Minnie Kempkey-Henderson; "Delight," Luckstone, Miss Jessie Barstow; "My Heart at thy sweet Voice," Saint-Saens, Mrs. Mabel Walker Murcell; "Heav'n Hath Shed a Tear," Kucken, Miss Susan Jeanette Waterman; "Sapphic Ode," Brahms, "The Wanderer," Schubert, Miss Ruth Waterman; "Der Nussbaum," "Widmung," Schumann, Miss Clara H. A. Freuler; "Annie Laurie," arr. by D. Buck, double quartet. The pupils were assisted by Miss Gertrude Hibberd, violin; Howard Taylor, flute; Mrs. Arthur W. Moore and Miss Susan Waterman, accompanists.

Orpheus Club in San Francisco

The concert given by the Orpheus Club of Oakland last week, in this city, in aid of the P. E. Old Ladies' Home, was an interesting affair and netted quite a sum for the worthy cause. The Orpheus is a club of mixed voices, which are well balanced and sing with excellent expression and tempo. Edwin Crandall led the singers, with fine precision. Lowell Redfield sang the baritone solo in Saint-Saens' "Song of Ancestry." William Leimert, cellist, and Mrs. Arthur Moore, accompanist, assisted the club.

Bessie Mills, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Mills, sang at the musicale given by the Mansfeldt Club at the Alameda Adelphian, last Saturday afternoon. Mrs. Walter Longbotham also sang, and Miss Julia Tharp and Mrs. George Perry were the accompanists. It was a delightful "open meeting" and of it, Mrs. Chapman, the Adelphian's president, said: "It was a gala day among gala days."

The date of the concert to be given by Louvia Rogers, pupil of Andrew Bogart, in Maple hall, has been changed to Thursday, December twenty-second.

Automobile Topics

E. R. Thomas, builder of the Thomas touring car, has just received two patents on the designs of the body of the 1905 model. One is on a dustless tonneau; that is the outlines of the tonneau are such as to create a current of air which acts as a down draught, thus preventing the dust from reaching the passengers. There is no section of the country where dust protection is as much needed as on the coast. The other patent covers a baggage cabinet located in the back of the front seat. The space is sufficient for two suit cases. When not used for this purpose, the cabinet is supplied with wicker trays. There is also a tire and tool case placed under the rear of the body, large enough for tires and supplies. These are the first patents ever issued on an automobile body.

Mr. Hartigan has received advices that the first 40 h. p. 4-cylinder side entrance Thomas touring car will arrive in San Francisco next week. This will be the first of the 1905 large model cars to reach the coast. It is also the first high grade 40 h. p. 4-cylinder car put on the market at $3,000.

E. P. Brinegar, president of the Pioneer Automobile Co., returned on Saturday last from a tour of the Eastern automobile factories. In speaking of his trip, Mr. Brinegar states that all the principal factories in the East are enlarging their capacity and the outlook for business for the year of 1905 is brighter than ever. The Olds Motor Works at Detroit, Michigan, are so sure in the belief that next year will be a banner year with them, that they have stored, at the present time, over two thousand machines and they claim that by the first day of February, 1905, or by the time the season opens in the East, they will have five thousand machines of different styles ready for delivery. For the year of 1905 the Oldsmobile people will run their standard curve dash runabout of the present model, and will have in addition thereto their French type touring runabout which is a new 1905 model. The company has been making shipments on these cars since the first of November. They will also have in addition to the above mentioned cars a two-cylinder 5-1-4 x 6 twenty horse-power which will sell at $1,400 F. O. B. factory, or $1550 F. O. B. San Francisco. This car will be of beautiful design with side entrance tonneau and will weigh about 2,000 pounds. Mr. Brinegar states that this will be the only car in its class and he compares the car for power with the 1904 Winton touring car and, in view of the fact that it will weigh 500 pounds less and the price will be $1,100 less than the 1904 Winton car, he predicts for it a great sale in California, it having been demonstrated during the past two or three years that any car, to be successful in San Francisco and surrounding country, must have excessive power. The Olds Company has also gone extensively into the manufacture of delivery wagons and will now turn out two models, one with a capacity of 1,000 pounds and the other with a capacity of one ton. These machines have been thoroughly demonstrated and proven a success in Detroit and other cities, and the Oldsmobile Company is now ready to quote prices and specifications on these machines. Mr. Brinegar is most enthusiastic over the outlook for Winton touring cars next year. The company will have three models, 20, 30 and 40 horse-power, and the price on each of the different machines is at least $1,000 less than that of any other American built car of the same horse-power. Mr. Winton's new machines will have several new features.

The Stevens-Duryea people are building a 20 horse-power car which is causing considerable comment throughout the East on account of the enormous power developed for the weight of the car, and the machine has some new features heretofore unknown to American cars. Sample of this machine will reach San Francisco about February 1st.

Geo. A. Hensley and party of friends made a trip to San Mateo and return on Sunday last in an Oldsmobile light tonneau touring car.

Peter Bacigalupi, Jr., is now the possessor of an Oldsmobile light tonneau touring car which he last week purchased from the Pioneer Automobile Company.

The Pioneer Company is in receipt of a carload each of Oldsmobile delivery wagons and Oldsmobile French type touring runabouts. These machines are both the 1905 model and are attracting considerable attention at the Pioneer headquarters.

Fernando Nelson and J. H. Durst have each placed their order with the Pioneer Company for a 40 horse-power Winton touring car.

The Horseless Age says in a recent issue, of the four-cylinder Autocar: "The Autocar Company, of Ardmore, Pa., are getting out for the 1905 season a new four-cylinder, side entrance tonneau model. The car is of distinctive appearance, owing chiefly to its exceptionally low construction, and possesses a number of refinements in mechanical design over former Autocar types, although it retains most of their exclusive features. The first four-cylinder model completed late in August has since been subjected to severe and prolonged road tests; a second model with minor improvements is now nearing completion, and the first lot of cars of this type will be finished in January next. The car will weigh about 1,900 pounds in touring condition and is rated at 16 to 20 h. p."

The four-cylinder Columbia automobile has not yet missed a day in carrying passengers between Tonopah and Goldfield. The auto has a full load, seven, sometimes eight people, on a trip and covers the thirty-two miles of rough country between the two towns twice a day.

Among the auto enthusiasts who braved the weather last Sunday to enjoy a ride into the country with their motor cars were the McCutcheons, who drove their Autocar to Livermore without any mishap to mar the pleasure of the journey.

Leo Korbel has been running about town frequently in his Autocar and is usually accompanied by some friends.

Marshall C. Harris, who has now a large stable of automobiles, has been driving his Autocar runabout about daily, and is as enthusiastic as ever over the horseless vehicle.

Miss Grace Spreckels, after but two lessons, has mastered the operation of her Autocar runabout and can now run her car about feeling perfectly at home in the driver's seat.

Charles D. Blaney of San Jose left last week accompanied by his wife to make the five hundred mile trip down the coast to Los Angeles by auto.

The recent success of the new 1905 model White steam touring car in the Eagle Rock hill climb in New Jersey is particularly worthy of the attention of every motorist. The course on this climb, a mile in length and 12 per cent grade, was not in good condition, being covered in places with small, loose broken stones. Despite this fact the 15 horse-power White made the fastest time by 12 seconds over any American built car, and the time of the White, 1:23 3-5, was only beaten by four foreign cars, three of ninety horse-power and one of 60 horse-power, each costing over five times the price of the American motor car. It was another grand victory for American made cars, and although a Renault won the event, this big foreign auto covered the mile climb in only 1:20, but three seconds and a fraction faster than the White.

In spite of the fact that a large number of future delivery orders for the 15 horse-power White steam cars have been booked by the White Sewing Machine Company of San Francisco, fresh orders are being taken in such numbers as to prove the great popularity of the premier steam car in a most satisfactory degree. The first new model Whites were seen last week in Southern California when two carloads were received in Los Angeles by H. D. Ryus, selling agent of the White company.

A neat automobile booklet is the last White Bulletin, a little pamphlet issued from time to time by the White Sewing Machine Company of Cleveland, Ohio. All of the stories are pleasingly told and the book is filled with interesting views. The Bulletin is free to all who ask for it.

HOW TO SPEND AN HOUR OR TWO.

If you have an hour or two to spare Sunday, or any other day, you can not spend the time to better advantage than by taking the Sausalito ferry for a short trip in connection with the North Shore electric to Mill Valley, Ross Valley, Fairfax, or San Rafael. The ride is very enjoyable and the country most beautiful. Round trip fares only 25c to 50c. Ferry departs daily at 7:05, 7:45, 8:25, 9:10, 9:50, 11:00 a. m.; 12:20, 1:45, 3:15, 4:35, 5:15, 5:50, 6:30, 7:15, 10:15 and 11:35 p. m. Return on any of 16 trips daily. Get copy of "Short Scenic Trips" at No. 650 Market street.

CROWN JEWELS PAWNED BY MONARCHS.

It is a well known fact that rulers have been compelled to pawn the royal jewels in times of need to carry on affairs of state importance. The private citizen of today need not feel skeptical about doing likewise if necessary. A special department for this purpose exists at the Baldwin Jewelry Store, 906 Market street, where liberal advances can be obtained at banking rates.

The finest diamonds in the city are those sold by Colonel A. Andrews, at his famous Diamond Palace, at 221 Montgomery street. The store is the handsomest and most artistic in the West, and no tourist ever comes to San Francisco without visiting it.

"The Happy Average"

Brand Whitlock has been fortunate in the selection of a title for his latest novel, "The Happy Average." It deals with the life of an ordinary American, the only son of a Methodist minister stationed in a small Ohio town, between his graduation from college and his marriage, some three years later. Glenn Marley had neither exceptional talent nor especial unfitness for any career, and he had neither money to invest nor pull to promote his interests. His father had done all he could in sending him to school and at twenty-two he had to face the world on his own account, and the first thing he did was fall in love and engage himself to the first girl he met. Marley determined to read law, and he built youthful hopes on the practice he would accumulate when he had been admitted to the bar, but he was speedily discouraged. A small town, he was told, offered no opportunities, and anyway, "the law is not what it was." The only chance was to go to some large city. Attempts to obtain situations in banks and business houses met with the same result. Macochee had gained its maximum growth and to the time of the sounding of the last trumpet it would remain a town of four thousand inhabitants, offering no inducements to new enterprise or to the expansion of its present interests. So the youthful hero set out for Chicago, intent on grasping opportunity by the forelock, and again he had just the average experience. He had little money and no friends. The letter of introduction so confidently given by the village lawyer to his ex-classmate, now a United States circuit judge, awakened no memories, but was ignored, and instead of the expected assistance young Marley was treated to a lecture on the heinousness of flocking to cities. Opportunity walked the streets of small towns, and he, the judge, heartily wished he had remained in one all his life. To the surprise of the college fledgling, low clerks in Chicago were not raw boys but men already admitted to the bar and well on in years. Then followed a period of idleness in which any employment, however hard or menial, would have been acceptable, a brief experience as a freight handler brought to a speedy close by the opposition of the union, a short term of employment as a clerk, and then the meeting with a newspaper man whose fraternity pin served as an introduction. This led to Marley's trying life as a reporter and his troubles were practically ended. Meanwhile his love affair proceeded in much the same style. There was neither encouragement nor opposition, for though Lavinia's father, after the manner of his kind, would have liked to blusteringly dismiss the impecunious suitor, Mrs. Blair, with greater wisdom, prevailed upon him to keep his hands off. The youthful pair might outgrow their infatuation and the engagement come to an end, in which case no harm would be done, while to offer objection would be to convince them that they were persecuted. Meanwhile, if they remained constant to each other, marriage would be the fitting termination. And that is just what happened. Lavinia was an average girl, just enough intellectually inferior to Marley for her to be able to understand his aspirations without seeing how really little there was to wonder at, and the prospects of their union were that they would form an average American household, living comfortably within their means, raising an average family and helping to keep the ship of State on an even keel. Life in the small town, a typical small American community, is well depicted. The characters are all types and the incidents could be duplicated every day in the year. There is Jack Lawrence, promoter of village enjoyments, slangily familiar and harmlessly egotistic. Mayme Carter may be called "his girl," and the easy terms on which he is received by her parents are photographic. Wade Powell is a typical American of another kind. Originally he was a man of some talent and ability, but he has been too much of a good fellow for his own good; not only convivially, but his advice and his law library have been public property and he has failed to make good either in the promise of his youth or in financial success. So the world has passed him by and he serves as an example to youth—an example to be avoided. Every one uses him but no one requires his services. One can all but hear the village gossip and see the moonlight picnic which the youths and maidens attend unchaperoned and return from unharmed, and the awe and admiration for the "literary man," albeit only a new reporter on a Chicago journal, is done to the life. "The Happy Average" is a wholesome and optimistic addition to the fiction of the day. After the problem novels, the bloodigore, the rant and fustian and the heights of rapture and depths of woe of the generality of books, it is like turning down a green lane shadowed with trees. Bobbs, Merrill Company of Indiana are the publishers.

The Lazy Author

Hall Caine, who has a new novel just on the market, has refused to set a date for the appearance of his next, saying: "My books come rarely. Owing to uncertain health, and the difficulties of satisfying myself with a subject, I can write less than any other author of the time." He further stated that he feels in writing humor only one day in five. Much and little are, of course, relative terms, but when certain authors, whose press agents keep it constantly before the public that they have gone here or there in search of local color or that they are making researches into the history of this or that period for the purpose of securing accuracy in some new work, or that the number of printed volumes of the latest masterpiece would reach half way to the moon if piled one on top of the other, or twice round the equator if laid end to end, try to make us believe on their mere assertion that they are not machines turned by a perpetual motion crank, they have their work cut out for them. Those whose only business with books is to read them hardly have time to catch breath between announcements that Hall Caine or Marie Carelli or Cyrus Townsend Brady or some other of the lightning conductors, is ready again. If Hall Caine can turn out as many books as he does and write only one-fifth of his time, what on earth would become of us, supposing that he were capable of keeping it up at an even gait right along? He produces now at least one book a year. What if it were five?

"Oak Leaves"

A handsome souvenir is "Oak Leaves," issued by the graduates of the Presentation Convent in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Presentation Order in California. It is an illustrated brochure containing, among other pictures, that of the modest convent in Powell street which was the home of the nuns in 1854. It also contains many interesting sketches of the lives of some of the prominent members of the Order, an eloquent address delivered by Frank J. Sullivan on "A Christian Home," several interesting essays and some charming verse. It is a very creditable publication.

A pretty and humorous conceit for a Christmas greeting is "The Wishing Tree of the Amiable Pup," issued by Morgan Shepard. It is a string of verses containing the "wishes that grow on the wishing tree," and ending with the wish that the recipient may have a merry Christmas. The verses are in illuminated text, illustrated by a headpiece depicting two amiable pups under two well loaded wishing trees.

Something new in the Christmas card line, is Otis M. Carrington's achievement, "Mozart's Ten Commandments," which should have interest and value for music lovers. The commandments are printed in Old English type, with a rubricated and illuminated initial, the design being a double staff with antique square notes in gold on red lines. The card is almost five and a half by eleven and one-half inches in size and is in booklet form.

Other People's Ideas

From "Gorgon Graham's Letters to His Son," by George Horace Lorimer:

When your name is on a note it stands only for money, but when it's on a letter of introduction or recommendation it stands for your judgment of ability and character, and you can't call it in at the end of thirty days, either. Giving a letter of recommendation is simply lending your name with a man as collateral, and if he's no good you can't have the satisfaction of redeeming your endorsement even; and you're discredited. The first thing that a young merchant must learn is that his brand must never appear on a note or a ham or a man that isn't good. I reckon that the devil invented the habit of endorsing notes and giving letters to catch the fellows he couldn't reach with whisky and gambling. Of course, letters of introduction have their proper use, but about nine out of ten of them are simply a license to some Clarence to waste an hour of your time and to graft on you for the luncheon and cigars. It's getting so that a fellow who's almost a stranger to me doesn't think anything of asking for a letter of introduction to one who's a total stranger.

These millionaires who give away a hundred thousand or so, with the understanding that the other fellow will raise another hundred or so, always remind me of a lot of boys coaxing a dog into their back yard with a hunk of meat, so they can tie a tin can to his tail—the pup edges up licking his chops at the thought of the provisions and hanging his tail at the thought of the hardware. If he gets the meat he's got to run himself to death to get rid of the can.

It isn't what a man's got in the bank, but what he's got in his head, that makes him a great merchant.

Look in a man's eyes for honesty; around his mouth for weakness; at his chin for strength; at his hands for temperament; at his nails for cleanliness.

The fellow who said you can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear wasn't on to the packing business. You can make the purse and you can fill it, too, from the same critter. What you can't do is to load up a report with moonshine or an inventory with wind and get anything more substantial than a moonlight sail towards bankruptcy.

Blood is thicker than water, I know, but when it's the blood of your wife's second cousin out of a job it's apt to be thicker than molasses—and stickier than glue when it touches a good thing. After you have found ninety-nine sound reasons for hiring a man, it's all right to let his relationship to you be the hundredth. It's the only bad reason in the bunch.

While I've been married as long as I've been in business, and while I know all the curves of the great American hog, your ma's likely to spring a new one on me tomorrow. No man really knows anything about women except a widower, and he forgets it when he gets ready to marry again. And no woman really knows anything about men except a widow, and she's got to forget it before she's willing to marry again.

A fellow's always in the wrong when he quarrels with a woman, and even if he wasn't at the start, he's sure to be before he gets through. And a man who's decided to marry can't be too quick learning to apologize for things he didn't say, and to be forgiven for things he didn't do. When you differ with your wife, never try to reason out who's in the wrong, because you'll find that after you've proved it to her she'll have a lot of talk left that she hasn't used.

The joy of today may be ashes tomorrow, but the humiliation of the morrow will surely be the jest of the day after. Always, in some way, the future justifies the past.—Ina Brevoort Roberts in Lippincott's.

He who can see the good in art-works is an abler and a far superior critic than he who sees only faults—Merz.

A Salutary Reactionary Movement

For several years Town Talk has been calling attention to the grave imperfections of our educational system. We have pointed out that the educators (?) who are directing our public schools have all but banished the three R's as unworthy of attention, and substituted for the old-time solid foundation a sham culture as flimsy as it is spurious. We are therefore pleased to report that Boston has awakened to the defects of modern methods. The country always hearkens to Boston when it has any newism to propose, or any suggestions to make for the improvement of the understanding. Boston is more frequently wrong than right, and we believe that the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers were responsible for many of the defects of which we have complained, but if they have come to a recognition of the error of their ways we shall rejoice. Boston is railing at the new education. The best families say that the methods of today are out of joint, and that it would be well to return to the educational simplicity of former generations. The best families have started a reactionary movement. They are convinced an immediate reform is essential if the debutantes of the future are to know enough to say baked beans in pure English. A little less Ibsen, Kant and Browning and a little more grammar, orthography and fractions, say the reformers, would be salutary.

Tariff Revision

The Tariff Revisionists are once more lustily shouting for discontinuance of the "Protection robbery," and some are forecasting Congressional action with remarkable confidence. It seems to be taken for granted in some quarters that President Roosevelt is heartily in favor of radical tariff revision, but there is likely to be great disappointment among those who think that the Republican party is going to change schedules in a way that will force certain manufacturers to sell their products at home below the prices that are obtained abroad. The Republican party's reply to the demands of the radical revisionists will be as it always has been, that it must consider the whole country and the largest possible benefits to the largest possible numbers in the United States. The Republican party is not disconcerted by the statement that it is an atrocity upon the American consumer that American steel rails are sold in Great Britain for six dollars a ton less than they are sold in this country. The Republican statesmen reply that the American wage-earner does not eat steel rails at his meals, and does not smoke them in his pipe afterward. Republican statesmen are concerned only for the welfare of the American wage-earner. They know that what he wants is bread and butter on his table and tobacco in his pipe, and that he cannot buy them unless he has work at which he may earn a daily wage. They contend that he cannot have work if American industries are closed down because foreign-made products, of which the labor charges are only a third or a quarter of what they would be in this country, are free to sell here alongside of American products. They hold now, as they have always held, that the American producer should be permitted to charge his countrymen more than he charges foreigners whenever he is brought into competition with the pauper labor of Europe, but their argument is not clear. It does not appear that American industries must practice extortion in order to live, but it does appear that extortion is conducive to the fattening of trusts. Though American wage earners do not eat steel rails, they have to pay for them indirectly in freight tariffs on what they do eat. If steel rails may be sold at a profit abroad for six dollars a ton less than they are sold at home, it is difficult to understand why the price at home cannot be cut without serious injury to honest industry. However, the Republican party is not likely to play havoc with tariff schedules. It is too much interested in the welfare of the wage-earner.

Shaw and His Critics

The London critics have been after Shaw again, and Shaw has retaliated by getting after the critics. The savants of the press found many defects of construction in the Irish dramatist's latest play, "John Bull's Other Island," and with his usual aggressiveness the Celt took up the rhetorical lash and applied it right vigorously to his critics. Shaw's diatribes always attract attention, and start controversy, for notwithstanding the egotism with which they bristle, there is always sufficient candid truth and stinging comment in them to ruffle the feathers of those to whom he addresses himself. This is what he says of his play:

I never achieved such a feat of construction in my life as in "John Bull's Other Island." Just consider my subject—the destiny of nations! Consider my characters—personages who stalk on the stage incarnating millions of real, suffering men and women. Good heavens! I have to get all England and Ireland into three hours and a quarter. I have shown the Englishman to the Irishman and the Irishman to the Englishman, the Protestant to the Catholic and the Catholic to the Protestant. I have taken that panacea for all the misery and unrest of Ireland—your Land Purchase bill, as to the perfect blessedness of which all your political parties and newspapers were for once unanimous; and I have shown at one stroke its idiocy, its shallowness, its cowardice, its utter and foredoomed futility. I have shown the Irish saint shuddering at the humor of the Irish blackguard—only to find, I regret to say, that the average critic thought the blackguard very funny and the saint very unpractical. I have shown that very interesting psychological event, the wooing of an unsophisticated Irishwoman by an Englishman, and made comedy of it without one lapse from its pure science. I have done all this and a dozen other things so humanely and amusingly that an utterly exhausted audience, like the wedding guest in the grip of the Ancient Mariner, has waited for the last word before reeling out of the theatre as we used to reel out of the Wagner theatre at Bayreuth after "Die Gotterdammerung." And this, they tell me, is not a play. This, if you please, is not constructed.

After telling the critics that they had made fools of themselves on several occasions, he takes a smash at the managers who "ignore an opportunity to give the English stage a drama of greater worth than that of any period in its history," failing as they do to approach such men of genius as Rudyard Kipling, Gilbert Chesterton, Hillaire Beloc, H. G. Wells and Maurice Hewlett. He says that compared with them he is only an "elderly farceur"; that they are capable of greater work than the Elizabethans, "whose child's play in blank verse, including a good deal of Shakespeare's," he would be ashamed to put his name to. "Pah!" he wrote in conclusion, "you've no national respect, you English. You've only the sort of patriotism that shrieks when Russians knock off the heads of two fishermen, and says not a word when railway employes are cracked like walnuts by the hundred in the shunting yards of your big companies to make dividends." George Bernard Shaw is not to be stirred up recklessly. The critics pretend to regard him as a mountebank, a humorist and an egotist, and unquestionably he is something of a poseur, given to extravagant utterances, but he is also a keen, observing philosopher who drives home unpleasant truths that are worth pondering. He never fails to hit the English in their weak spots, but they are not always appreciative of his satire. The coupling of his depreciation of the revered Elizabethans with extravagant laudation of his young contemporaries is an example of Shaw's nimble wit, the kind that puzzles his London readers. It is hard to determine whether his purpose was to parade an affectation of modesty or to josh the novelists who have not had the temerity to try their hand at play-writing. It is noteworthy, however, that one of them—H. G. Wells—did enter the dramatic field tentatively this year, and failed to meet with a gratifying or encouraging reception. When Shaw wrote his diatribe against the critics, and amiably panegyricized the men of genius compared with whom, in his own judgment, he is merely an "elderly farceur," he was aware of the fact that one of the distinct failures of the season was a play by Mr. H. G. Wells.

When Books Are Free

Archer Miller Huntington, who is one of the greatest living authorities on Spanish literature, is, according to the Spanish press, a greater benefactor than Andrew Carnegie. Mr. Huntington is not furnishing free libraries, but he has assumed all the risk of publishing cheap editions of the Spanish classics, thus putting good literature within reach of the masses and at the same time not fostering a system of municipal alms solicitation. Cheap books are an undoubted blessing. Free books are like everything else that comes without effort, an incentive to indifference and laziness. It is not the difficulty of getting books, but the ease by which poor ones can be obtained, which destroys the real usefulness of public libraries. If people who now read two or three books a week by courtesy of the municipality and the taxpayer could get nothing except by purchase, they would content themselves with about the same number in the year and make every book account for itself. There is no probability that book-making will ever again become an expensive operation, and the habit of reading is now firmly fixed, at least in this country, but one has to wonder sometimes what the future public taste will be. Each generation passes something on to the next as worth preserving, and children read on the recommendation of their parents and form their own opinions. One has to wonder how many of the best-sellers will be kept in mind ten or fifteen years. Trash has always been plentiful enough since the art of printing was perfected, but never before was it so persistently forced to the front. Large numbers of the people who patronize the fiction departments of the libraries are the descendants of those who never took book in hand, and they, quite naturally, have no traditions to guide themselves by. The question of interest is, what traditions will they pass on to their offspring? The dime novel has been execrated far and wide, but where is the material difference between sensation at ten cents in paper covers, supplied from the private purse, and sensation cloth bound and illustrated, at one dollar and a half, furnished by the municipality? We are better provided for than the Spanish masses who, now for the first time, will have available the best books in their language at a nominal cost. Good, cheap English editions of the classics of all languages, in all branches of literature, are to be had for the traditional song, but apparently the people will have none of them while the free libraries provide best sellers.

Piano vs. Encyclopedia

An alarm has been sounded because the people of the United States are spending forty million dollars annually for pianos while the expenditure for encyclopedias is comparatively insignificant. Presumably the people who buy pianos know what they want, though it is an open question which is the more worthless in an ordinary household, an expensive musical instrument or a set of ponderous books. The piano is, to some extent, an advertisement of the owner's prosperity. It shows that the family can afford to indulge in luxuries. Doubtless there are, at first, visions of the good times coming when the children will have advanced beyond the stages of scales and finger-exercises and are able to rattle out popular songs and catchy dance tunes, which are the only music the average household can understand and appreciate. Economies of various kinds are cheerfully inaugurated in order to meet the monthly instalments and pay for lessons, but the chances are that the victims, having no music in their souls, and loathing with all the intensity of the untrained American child anything like regular work and drudgery, the lessons are wasted and progress is so unsatisfactory that an overworked father is glad to forego the anticipated pleasure in return for present peace. It has been taken as a matter of course for at least two generations that every female child should begin the study of music somewhere about her tenth year and continue indefinitely. There is not one in a hundred who cares to touch the keys after she has passed her eighteenth birthday, and not one in a thousand who has music in her soul or sufficient dexterity in her finger-ends to put her into competition with a mechanical piano-player. Of the forty million dollars said to be expended for pianos every year, considerably more than thirty-nine millions are wasted. On the other hand, an encyclopedia is not a much more desirable acquisition. Theoretically it is an epitome of all knowledge. A good encyclopedia well bound costs money. There is precious little difference in price between a good encyclopedia and a medium piano. A set of twenty volumes makes quite a showing on shelves. It fills up quite as effectually as the piano covers floor space. The investor is quite as apt to flatter himself that he has laid up future satisfaction as is the clerk or mechanic who indulges in a musical instrument. It is a pretty picture—fireside, reading lamp, easy slippers, book and the encyclopedia at elbow—but in its realization as elusive as the other, of little daughter at the piano by and by. The encyclopedia is bulky and heavy, to begin with. It cannot be held in hand while consulted and it takes up a considerable space on a table. That is a small matter. No one grudges a little exertion to get at what is wanted, but nine times out of ten the encyclopedia fails to furnish information. If a question arises concerning some living person of prominence the big book is dumb. If it happens to be some one comparatively obscure there is no use in crying open sesame. If mechanical operations and processes are wanted the chances are that the details and descriptions are not up to date, and if the article pertaining to any subject happens to have been compiled in England it slithers lightly over the American side of the matter, while the same is true of an American encyclopedia in dealing with foreign arts and manufactures. If one wishes to add to one's store of meagre facts the chances are that the encyclopedia contains nothing not already known, and probably less. After having purchased, at a considerable cost and some sacrifices, what is supposed to be a mine of information, the deluded buyer is sure to discover that there is a yearly supplement without which he might as well have invested in a first edition as the last, and the chances are that, having fallen victim to some wily agent, he afterwards finds out that he could have got precisely the same goods at a considerable reduction had he been less in a hurry to make his bargain. Naturally the piano manufacturers are as elated over the sums invested in their commodity as the firm of book publishers is cast down over neglect of their specialty. At best it is but a choice between the wisdom of the foolish and the folly of the wise, but perhaps there is a little more to be said on behalf of the books. They do not annoy the neighbors and since the bootjack has disappeared the volumes may be handy to footing at frolicsome felines.

Personal Magnetism

"There are geniuses in trade, as well as in war," said Emerson, and Mrs. Chadwick is one of them. This remarkable woman has demonstrated that genius does not confine its operations to war, art or politics. She is a rare financial genius with lots of that vague imponderability known as personal magnetism, a force that is an immense factor in the personal affairs of life. Mrs. Chadwick is no ordinary crook, and yet her methods are not remarkable for their subtlety. Such methods as she resorted to would fail nine times out of ten. By what mysterious alchemy did she change her commonplace lies to gold? It was unquestionably her personal magnetism that enabled her to dupe experienced financiers and separate them from vast sums of money. She is evidently full of that mysterious force which radiates from people in greater or less degree, and which seems to act directly upon the reason and judgment of those with whom they come in contact. It enabled Napoleon to change the map of Europe. Lincoln possessed it to a remarkable degree, and with it he dominated the will of everybody with whom he had dealings. The successful physician owes more to his personal magnetism than to his knowledge of medicine. The orator who sways rather than convinces his hearers, who disarms and spellbinds his audience, is more indebted to his magnetism than his rhetoric. We do not know what this mysterious quality is, but we do know that it exists and captivates us, that it is radiated by good, bad and indifferent people, and that in the affairs of life it is a force to be reckoned with.

Preaches Heresy But Is No Heretic

When Rev. Dr. Samuel T. Carter was charged with being a heretic some time ago, for uttering sentiments in conflict with Presbyterian dogma as set forth in the Westminster Confession, we ventured the prediction that he would not be convicted of heresy. We explained that our prediction was based on the circumstance that few of the men by whom he would be tried approved of the old theology of the Presbyterian Church. Our prediction has come true. The Nassau Presbytery has declared that the Rev. Dr. Carter is not a heretic, and yet he declared that his religious beliefs are no longer consistent with the system of doctrine set forth in the Westminster Confession. He contends that the Church has "reformed the faith," and that the God of the new creed is a different God from the God that Calvin worshiped. At the same time he admits that the Westminster Confession is still the orthodox creed, notwithstanding the fact that the Revision Committee of the General Assembly reformed the faith in such a manner as to substitute a new theology for the old. In the same breath he says that every minister and elder on entering his office must still accept the Westminster Confession, and declares that he has rejected it as hateful, and that in his opinion there is no such God as the one that Calvin pictured. Yet he was vindicated. Where does the Presbyterian Church stand?

Their Strange Awakening

BY THEODORE BONNET.

Somewhat singular is the spasm of virtue that has seized the authorities of the Police Department. The pathology of the case involves a paradox. From newspaper accounts it appears that the commissioners are viewing with pious alarm and a succession of sanctimonious shudders the naughty, violet scented French restaurants, while contemplating with curious complaisance the launching of a mammoth bagnio the like of which was never before seen in an American city. Shades of the Pilgrim Fathers! what nice distinctions in vice have we been educated up to since breaking away from the leading-strings of the ascetics of Plymouth Rock.

Far be it from me to rush to the defense of the French restaurant, with all its droll tradition and world-wide fame for true bohemian atmosphere. I lack the courage to interpose a plea in its behalf even though my convictions were adamant, which they are not. My purpose is merely to call attention to the surprising awakening of a police commission so broad in its sympathies and so free from conventional prejudices that it has stood for a wide-open town and winked at the institution of a public brothel, the purpose of which was to safeguard vice and render it less horrific to its votaries.

It would be no easy task to vindicate the French restaurant. The whole city knows, either from personal experience or hearsay, that it is not as harmless as it seems. It is said to afford peculiarly satisfactory facilities for wanton indulgence. Refined vice stalks in the seclusion of its upper chambers. It is the scene of passionate escapades and the rendezvous of surreptitious lovers. It is well known that the proprietors of the French restaurants have long taken but a desultory interest in the patronage of the main dining-room. Their most plethoric profits come from above, and the rotisserie which was the pride and most enticing feature of the old-time French restaurants of this city was long ago abandoned. The modern French restaurant is French only in the appointments of the private dining-rooms, in the character of the hospitality, and the adroitness and discretion of the safe and sane waiters. So deeply have I deplored the passing of the old, savory rotisserie and the substitution of the modern cuisine, with its variegated combination of German and Yankee cooking, that I have not the slightest sympathy for the men who have made fortunes catering to the sybaritic appetites of the men about town. Gladly would I hail the return of the old-time French chef, skilled in the subtle gastronomic art as it was practiced in the old days before the sign of the Poodle Dog symbolized New England pastry, and the elder Marchand was satisfied with a sawdust floor.

Nevertheless I am curious to know the wherefore of the singular spasm of virtue that prompts discrimination against the luxurious resorts of clandestine lovers, conducted in a manner that shocks nobody, and in favor of a public den of vice that flaunts its shame in the teeth of the community. Possibly the Police Commissioners have been reading Lecky's "History of European Morals" and have come to the conclusion that there is a certain necessary evil which should be officially countenanced and regulated. Perhaps they are convinced that the unhappy being, the most mournful figure in society, herself the supreme type of vice, is ultimately the most efficient guardian of virtue. With Lecky, perhaps, they are prepared to argue that but for her the unchallenged purity of countless homes would be polluted. But surely they cannot cite Lecky as authority for the discrimination which it is reported they contemplate exercising against the French restaurants, those degenerate institutions that figure in the most romantic traditions of this Western metropolis. It cannot be argued that the French restaurants are essentially different from the big bagnio in Jackson street, which appears to be tolerated by the police authorities despite occasional arrests. If toleration of immorality is conducive to morality, as Lecky somewhat paradoxically argues, then French restaurants should be maintained for the public welfare, unless, of course, it is believed that veiled vice is more dangerous than the open variety. The only objection that the Police Commissioners urge against the restaurants is that they are patronized for the same purpose for which the Jackson street den exists. And yet the Jackson street institution does not shock them. The Commissioners are suspiciously illogical. They appear to be influenced by a factitious prejudice. What it was that suddenly inspired them with holy horror of the French restaurants I am unable to guess. The commissioners have long known of the character of the restaurants, but were not seized with a moral spasm until organized labor conspired against the proprietor of one of the establishments, and with their assistance succeeded in driving him out of business. The injustice of the discrimination in his case was so apparent that the announcement soon followed that the others were to be denied a renewal of their license. It is to be hoped that the threat was not in the nature of a legislative cinch bill, but it will be interesting to watch developments. A vast amount of money is invested in the French restaurants of this city, and the proprietors have considerable commercial and social pull. The closing of the French restaurants under the wide-open Schmitz administration, on high moral grounds, would be one of the funniest things that ever happened.

Open Letters to Men of Mark. No. 5.

ADDRESSED TO NICHOLAS OLDENBURG-ROMANOFF, AUTOCRAT OF ALL THE RUSSIAS EXCEPT MANCHURIA, IN RELATION TO THE EXTERIOR CRITICISM OF HIS INTERNAL POLICIES.

BY DEMOCRITUS.

My dear Nicholas,

I hope you will pardon me for not answering your last letter more promptly. As you are aware I am a very busy man, and of late I have been working over time in the effort to straighten the kinks in the affairs of other monarchs, rulers and potentates. I had you on the list for earlier consideration but the troubles of other vicereigns of the Almighty intervened, and I was forced to overlook for a time your pressing claims on my attention. Hereafter, however, I shall give you first place in my Advice to Emperors pigeon-hole.

You complain of the "gratuitous, not to say insolent interference of the American press in the conduct of your holy Empire." If you would take a few days off and travel awhile in this country you would modify your estimate of our newspapers. They are not so dangerous as you seem to imagine. Besides, they are divided in their vague and wholly irresponsible judgment concerning Russian politics and the administration of Russian affairs. They discuss Russian themes because their readers demand that these questions shall be mentioned in the editorial columns, and an American editorial is worthless unless the editor pretends to an opinion one way or the other. As a matter of fact these editors would be puzzled to define the difference between a zemstvo and zakuska. They read the despatches from St. Petersburg and the apparently learned essays on "the crisis in Russia" printed in the London newspapers and reviews, and are then ready to write anything that this reading may have suggested. All foreign affairs are treated in this way by the American press. The editor of the American newspaper is a false alarm in the night and he knows it. He is not even a good guesser and what he may say today he will contradict tomorrow. In truth, so little does the business of the outsider interest the American editor that he forgets all about it twenty-four hours after he has delivered himself of an ultimatum. When he thinks it is time for another Russian editorial he calls for the latest London papers, and with his feet on his desk proceeds to skim through them until something akin to an idea intrudes upon his mentality. Flinging aside the source of his inspiration, he grasps his fountain pen and he is off in a bunch. The result is another editorial ultimatum on Russia. So it goes from day to day, and every day something different. Don't worry, Nick, about public opinion concerning Russia in America. It is the baseless fabric of an American editor's pipe dream. I speak ex cathedra, for I am writing some of the stuff myself.

Your complaint regarding the "impertinence of the American State Department" is quite another matter. When Mr. Hay whistles Mr. Lamsdorff must dance; when Mr. Roosevelt shoots up the town the Russian tenderfoot must "sure get a move on." Therein, my dear Nicholas, you are justified in your protest. But between ourselves, Nick, the official attitude of the United States towards the Russian Empire is a hollow mockery when you come to analyze it. It is Mr. Hay's candid opinion that you ought to give the Russian people a constitutional government, and whatever Mr. Hay thinks in this matter Mr. Roosevelt thinks, and all the American sovereigns who imagine they are running this Republic are also guided by the same sapient authority. Your objection that the mujiks and peasantry of Russia are not fitted to have a voice in the government of the Empire has no weight with our State Department. That's all right as far as we are concerned. This is a land where free speech and ignorance go hand in hand and it is one of our inalienable privileges to think as we please and to express our thought upon the most trivial occasion. It doesn't matter to the free American citizen that our policy in relation to the Filipinos is the same as your policy towards the illiterate masses of the Russian Empire and that it is based on precisely the same argument, namely, the unfitness of the subject Filipino to govern himself. I don't suppose the political casuists of the American State Department, who theoretically indorse the principle that all government must be by consent of the governed, have ever taken the trouble to think of the Russian problem in the same metabolic process that evolved the idea that the Filipino is a sort of political protoplasm scarcely developed to the condition of an embryo. Inconsistent, say you? Well, not only is it inconsistent, but it is incomprehensible. To tell you the truth, Nicholas, I am not over proud of my countrymen in official authority. As a rule these little men in the big places contrive to emphasize their littleness upon the slightest provocation or without provocation.

Inconsistent! Why, only the other day we protested to you concerning the massacre of a lot of people in your empire and on the very day that we forwarded the protest we burned a nigger at the stake. You very properly resented this interference in your affairs and returned our protest unopened. On the day we received the return mail, and while we were denouncing you for a merciless, cruel tyrant, we burned another nigger. I don't remember how many niggers we burned while our protest was going and coming. Inconsistent! It's the word that most adequately describes our foreign diplomacy.

I am glad to know that you are not losing sleep by reason of Great Britain's blustering. Your surmise that the Dogger Bank incident will cost you a few rubles is probably correct. If this Pharisee of the nations had meant the business of war instead of mere business of the shop she would have ordered Admiral Beresford, the Dewey of the English navy, to knock off Admiral Rojestvensky's block and tackle. English honor certainly demanded something of this sort, but English honor seems to have subordinated itself. The Russian fleet killed only two English fishermen and damaged an English fishing smack. It wasn't worth a war. So the mighty empire that refused to brook the insolence of a few Boer farmers consents to arbitrate the cost of this Russian insult in a commercial court—like an English tradesman aggrieved by the illegal action of a rival English shopkeeper. If Great Britain could have found an ally she would have stood upon her honor in this matter. She asked the United States to stand in with her, but we are not fighting British battles, and you escaped the worst thrashing that ever fell to the lot of an absolute empire. Since the battle of Crecy Great Britain has never fought a nation of her size unaided. Ask the British Minister at your court who won the battle of Waterloo and he will insist that it was the English. Further than that he knows nothing about the battle. He never heard of Blucher and he doesn't know that the Prussians were in the fight. The English managed single-handed to sandbag the Boers and rob them of their country, but they were two years at this work, employing nearly half a million men to conquer about 70,000 Dutch farm hands. Perhaps this palpable evidence of Great Britain's poor fighting quality was largely responsible for referring the so-called "North Sea outrage" to an international investigating committee.

Your majesty is corroborated by all the circumstances in your belief that your war with Japan is really a war with Great Britain. You were in Manchuria by the same right that Great Britain is in Egypt, or Burmah, or India—by the same right that sent Colonel Younghusband into Tibet. Japan would have been willing to compromise with you by compounding your felony against the sovereignty of China, but Great Britain, in the interest of her shopkeepers who desire to monopolize the trade of the Orient, urged the Japanese to oppose your robbery, promising every assistance if they were eventually worsted in the fight. Whether Great Britain will keep this promise or not is one of the questions that can only be answered in the future, after you have worn poor little, plucky, foolish Japan down to a diet of a half ration of rice with not a shred of fish to flavor the food withal. What you have most to fear in this combat is a Japanese-Chinese coalition, incited by British diplomacy, to avoid fulfilment of the terms of the Anglo-Japanese alliance. When you have prolonged this war beyond the physical and financial endurance of Japan she will appeal to her ally, and that perfidious old schemer will suggest that since China is to be the real beneficiary of Japanese success she ought to put her shoulder to the wheel of Japan's artillery. Mark my words, Nicholas, Great Britain is the monkey in this effort to drag the Oriental chestnut out of the fire.

I thank you for your kind invitation to visit you at Gatchina during the Greek Christmas holidays, but I fear that I shall be unable to accept, owing to a previous and very pressing engagement with Menelik, King of Abyssinia, who has asked me to edit and blue-pencil a commercial treaty about to be offered by Germany. I have already advised Menelik to suspect all German overtures—to keep his hands in the pockets of his burnouse, as it were, and to see that the windows are fastened and the doors locked before he goes to bed o' nights.

Convey my kindest regards to Lamsdorff, Prince Sviatopolk-Mirski, and other inquiring friends, and believe me ever your most earnest sympathizer and well wisher.

The Power of the Past

BY HARRY COWELL.

The Past is a ghost that comes haunting us before midnight and heeds not in the least the crowing of the cock. The black magic of memory raises it in unseemly hours and the white magic of present love seeks to lay it in vain. Impious that it is, it will invade the holiest of holies and make a mockery of the sacrament of kisses. Young indeed and far withdrawn from the world must he be, the high priest of love who has no bitter knowledge thereof. O, happiness of love that was, the thought of thee overshadows the happiness of love that is and makes it one with sorrow. Which of us can kiss without remembering kisses? Not I. Can you, or you? Who, forgetting by miracle of joy, kisses as he would have kissed, did he kiss now for the first time? My word for it, no man born of woman. Nor is the Past one ghost merely, but many ghosts, making of life a churchyard wherethrough we needs must go whistling even at noonday to keep our courage up.

At five and thirty I find me—Destiny aiding; or, rather, Destiny finds me, I acquiescing—a friend, an affinity of myself that now is, not chosen for the sake of con-to him, separate soul that he really is, though at times Friendship feels and says otherwise, I am liker than to him whom I called "me" fifteen years ago. Yet, for all that, the dead self behind me dominates my life more than does the living "other self" beside me. The power of the past "me" is appalling. And here, in words written awhile back, let me ask again—ask of the world at large; nay, of a wisdom yet to be born: "In what relation do I stand, pray tell me, to my countless little outgrown selves? What have I to do with the little likes and dislikes of these ancestors of mine?" And here, too, let me add, as I did then, the Past prompting me: "Surely no just Providence will ever saddle me with their sins."

It is no light love for Paradox—that fascinating fille de joie adored of men of letters—that causes me to assert that the Past is ever present, ever powerful; a force strange and terrible, acting where it is not. No more have we prehensile feet, and long since we have lost our tails; from the forest primeval of our quadrumanous forebears to the finished redwood and cedar of our walls is a journey and a half; and yet, let but a great fear come upon us and up go the hands that would fain to the tree-tops in flight. O, for a low branch above our heads when the highwayman, unconsciously taking advantage of the now purposeless action prompted by the once all-important arboreal instinct, adds his laconic command to that of Nature! Think of the many holy horrors we might all escape were we still living in the woods. The drowning man, if you please, clutches, not at a straw, as the proverb has it, but at an overhanging bough—a bough that was or ever proverbs were.

The Past which is said to determine the instinctive throwing up of the hands of those about to drown, or in other sore fear, is unimaginably distant. But how remote soever it may be, its power over us that now are is undeniable. It may be that no progenitor of ours ever lived in trees; none the less are we the heirs of prehistoric ages. For more than three or four generations are the sins of the fathers visited upon the children. To say, "I am the master of my Fate" is a vaunting and vain thing, a reckoning without the great host, heredity, "the last of the Fates, and the most terrible." To those whose culture includes "the best that has been thought and said" in Science, it is no doubt superfluous to say that Social heredity is, no less than Individual heredity, a mighty god of known name, whose behests we all unwittingly obey; but then, at this late hour, what sayings are not superfluous—at least, to the cultured? Because the ancient Jew was as he was are we in part as we are today. And for Jew, substitute Greek or Roman, and the saying holds.

Yesterday is tyrant of today; today, of tomorrow. We spend the present, as we must, making a past that will lord it over the future. Were it not for the laugh, in this direction lies madness; but here, as elsewhere, the sense of humor saves us from insanity. "Tis a queer world," we say, with a smile and a sigh, quoting we know not what dust—and that in sober sooth it is: a queer world which we must not take too seriously; a queer world, incongruous, delightfully illogical, wherein Jew swears by Jesus, and Christian by Jupiter!

The spirit of the Present survives as the Past and is not subject to death. More than one man has spent the latter part of his life in trying to live down the Past, and in the brief interval of clear seeing that not infrequently precedes the great blindness, realized that all the while he himself had been but keeping it alive by living it over. But, though the world forget, and the evil that men do seem to die before them, a Past forgotten is by no means impotent, inoperative.

You know a woman "with a past"—a woman so wise that you cannot for the life of you imagine her capable of committing a folly. Of course, you never for a moment dream of doubting the alleged fact of folly or follies, but you just can't help wondering at it. Well, she is as utterly incapable of the least act of—unwisdom, shall we say?—as are you yourself. The woman who was so unwise was merely her mother, in the sense that "the boy is father to the man." It is for you to exemplify the power of the Past, to visit in behalf of Providence her mother's sins upon her. Bravo! Madame; you certainly do play your part to perfection! I do myself the honor of flinging you a bouquet of the flowers of forgetfulness. To think of you makes me as meditative as the dusk, and as silent as supreme sorrow; and silence is unprofitable for one whose business is speech—and meditation also; for the more a man meditates, the less he writes, the less is he read. To put th before his ink would ruin any writer in a week. Avaunt, Madame; see how you are causing me to digress. I did but make use of you for a moment, and now you are a Past that will not down.

Youth says to itself—or still more foolishly, aloud: "I will begin life de novo, as though no one had ever lived before me." Age knows how wild the words; knows that the dead dominate the living; that tongues that have long been speechless clay command us, saying: "Do this," and we do it; or, "Abstain from that," and we abstain. Alas, yes; the dead dominate the living, even as they, in their turn above ground, in the blessed light of day, were dominated. The lust of life is stronger than the grave. The generations of men will not die outright and have done with it, and let posterity be. Often when, as we flatter ourselves, we are doing just as we desire, we are but carrying out the wishes of the Mighty Unnumbered. The Past has a myriad hands to hold us in thrall. Its voices are multitudinous, mysterious and imperative; the deaf hear them and heed. And herein is the power of the Past most apparent: We cannot face it and fight it; for we are it, and it is we.

You and I are Romes that have been a-building from the beginning of time. How can we hope to escape what is behind us when all the clay at the disposal of Nature has been made into man, has crumbled, and been made over, and once more crumbled, and so on a thousand times? Each man's parentage is a past that is almost omnipotent. (Here again Heredity obtrudes itself.) I know one who is as modern as his mother is old-fashioned. Now, when he is sick, he is not himself; he is his mother. In odd ways, too, the Past extends its influence:—As is well known, I have many more ancestors than either of my parents; I have both my father's and my mother's, and themselves into the bargain. Thus come I under the dominion of more dust. Ah me, much of the past of every man, of every nation, of all that breathes, is as a cesspool that pollutes the waters of life, and will pollute for all time to come; yet are the waters sweet and delicate to drink when some Rachel draws them for you and from the sacred well.

BY MABEL PORTER PITTS.

Ferret them out—ferret them out,
Label the plunder and hawk it about,
Dip grasping fingers deep into the dark,
Draw from its cover each skeleton stark,
Secrets, and papers, and letters, long penned,
The dead would have given his blood to defend;
No incident leave to the mercy of doubt,
Ferret them out—ferret them out.

This is the work for the daughter, the wife,
Friend that the dead man has trusted in life,
Each holds some mem'ry of weakness confessed,
Confidence given when heart was distressed;
These trundle out for the crowd's curious eyes,
If sacred the trust, then the greater the prize,
Rest not in your effort till you have unfurled
All that the dead has kept close from the world.

Here is a page where his soul was laid bare,
Every word wild with a heart's great despair,
Penned here are thoughts that were never revealed
While he had life and his lips were unsealed;
Locked in the grave, lacking power to protest,
Quick-seized is the prize and for barter is dressed.
Ye merciless Vandals with talons of greed
Drag out his heart that the vultures may feed.

The Saunterer

Waiting for Colonel Mazuma

Those of our Californian statesmen who have hopes of seeing Colonel Mazuma become a factor in the Senatorial contest are very much on the qui vive for a nod of recognition from that interesting financier. The Senatorial candidates have been virtuously asserting their resolution to seek the toga with clean hands, and their professions of purity have served to amuse a few of the practical politicians who are taking an active interest in the contest. Some of them have suggested that perhaps when the holiday spirit got into the blood of the toga-chasers they would feel more like Santa Claus, and begin hunting for wide chimneys. So when the news got into circulation early in the week that Senator Bard had opened headquarters in the Mutual Bank building, and that Mr. Gerberding was there waiting to interview statesmen who were being steered by runners, the practical politicians winked the other eye, and wondered if the holiday spirit had asserted itself. But everybody knows that Senator Bard is a purist, and would not spend a cent for the toga. His friends have opened the headquarters, and are merely doing missionary work with a view of securing all the stray votes that are lying around loose and that are susceptible to argument.

The Situation Outlined

As the time for the convening of the Legislature draws near interest in the contest grows apace. All roads have been leading to this city during the week, and statesmen have been flocking to town. Frank Flint has had his glad-hand very much in evidence, and Bard's emissaries have been very active. It was learned that Oxnard would make his appearance next week, and the report came from George Knight that he was in to stay. Hitherto Knight has talked as though he intended to make no aggressive canvas, but now it is evident that he is going to do some tall hustling, and if the South fails to compromise, he will stand a good chance of capturing the plum. His being aggressively in the contest is significant. It means that the Organization has about despaired of straightening out the tangle, for Knight can no longer afford to withdraw. He will have the call on all northern votes that are not influenced by the Colonel. As for the South, there does not seem to be any possibility of a compromise between the Flint and Bard forces, and for that reason Oxnard, who is not making much noise, occupies an enviable position. It is significant that both Bard and Flint are afraid of a caucus of the Southern statesmen, a circumstance pointing to the conclusion that both men have been claiming more votes than they have been assured of. The probability is that Oxnard could cut into both camps if he desired, but he isn't saying a word or claiming anything. Meanwhile his friend, Lee Rose, is betting even money right and left that Oxnard will be the next Senator, though as a betting proposition he is entitled to odds of three to one. During the week the news drifted up from the South that Harriman would back H. E. Huntington for the job, and as it is known that Los Angeles would back the railroad magnate to a man if he got into the fight, the news caused quite a sensation. But Harriman is busy in New York arranging for the defeat of Depew and the election of ex-Governor Black, and if Huntington were put into the contest in this State the Organization would have its hands full.

Pardee's Little Club

Score one for Governor Pardee. The Supreme Court recently announced that the new Court of Appeals had been instituted by law, and that it was up to the Governor to appoint the judges. The Governor did not undertake to overrule the Supreme Court, but he called attention to the fact that no appropriation had been made for salaries, and intimated that he would defer the appointments pending the enactment of the necessary financial legislation. Of course the men who wanted the jobs are quite willing to go to work immediately, and to depend on the Legislature to provide for back salaries, but the Governor knows a thing or two about politics, and he feels that it is to his interest to keep the appointments hanging fire until the close of the session. Every member of the Legislature will take an interest in the patronage connected with the Court of Appeals, and by holding the appointments in abeyance the Governor will keep a club waving over the heads of the statesmen at Sacramento. Whenever one of his pet measures has been pigeon-holed he will summon the chairman of the responsible committee to ascertain the reason why. And then incidentally he will talk about the Court of Appeals. It may not be consistent with gubernatorial dignity to coerce the Legislature, but there never was a Governor who didn't dearly love a good stout club for the purpose of persuasion. And Pardee, it will be remembered, is a club advocate. I have a vague recollection of his endorsement of a good stout pick-handle.

An Incredulous Statesman

The much talked of Western Pacific Railroad Company, which has existed on paper for several years, and in the interest of which several lobbyists bungled badly at Sacramento last year, is again to be represented at the next session. One of its promoters met Senator Charley Shortridge the other day, and asked him if he would be friendly with the corporation next year.

"With what corporation?" he asked.

"The Western Pacific Railroad Company," was the reply.

"I don't know that there is such a railroad," said the Senator. "I've been riding all over this State for twenty-five years, on free passes, and I have never yet been on a car of the Western Pacific. I don't believe there is such a railroad."

A Surprising Contest

Great was my surprise to learn, the other day, that there was to be a contest over the will of Dr. Mariano Gonzales. The will contains a trust clause, which, it is said, in the light of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Fair case, is bound to be declared void. Reuben H. Lloyd was the attorney for Dr. Gonzales, but it is incredible that he executed that millionaire's will, for he was one of the leading attorneys in the Fair case, and knows all about trust clauses, and how they should be executed. The Gonzales will was executed as late as November of last year, and no excuse could be offered for its having been drawn in conflict with the decision rendered by the Supreme Court in the Fair case, a decision which Mr. Lloyd has probably read a hundred times. Mr. Lloyd has the reputation of being a very shrewd lawyer, and it would startle the profession to learn that he had carelessly involved the estate of his client in a hopeless contest. Mr. Lloyd is the attorney for the executor of the will, and it behooves him to fight for it, which he no doubt will. On the other side are Bishop & Wheeler, who are intimate friends of Mr. Lloyd and who will undertake to expose the fatal flaw if there is one. It will be interesting to watch developments. No doubt the bar is curious to know if there is a "bug" in the will, and if so how it happened to get there. Millionaires should also take a deep interest in the proceedings, for it is becoming clearer every day that wills are merely designed to enrich lawyers.

Criticism of the Bar Association

By the bye, the Bar Association is being severely criticised for giving too ready an ear to the grievances of lawyers who seek to injure members of the profession with whom they have quarreled. A young lawyer named Case was prosecuted before the Bar Association lately, for unprofessional conduct growing out of a dispute with a female client, and he has many sympathizers in the profession who express the sentiment that more attention should be devoted to the questionable conduct of prominent practitioners, and less to the minor delinquencies of struggling obscurities. One of the charges against Case is that he persuaded a client to invest a little money in a mine that was more productive of assessments than dividends. That is not a grievous offense in this State, for people are constantly investing in worthless mines at the request of friends who sincerely believe that they are pointing the way to wealth.

And Still they Come

Another Stevenson manuscript has been unearthed from the inexhaustible treasure house—a novel some fifteen years old or so. It is quite the matter of course that immediate steps toward publication were taken. When the backs of envelopes and postal cards have been used for illustrations, and the streets along which the author strolled or the restaurants where he is believed to have taken his meals have filled space in magazines, it is a little too much to expect a discarded manuscript to be left to oblivion. Considering that Robert Louis Stevenson was for the greater part of his life an invalid, and that he was a most prolific correspondent as well as an industrious writer of novels, the extent of the posthumous output of his pen is so extraordinary as to justify the suspicion that his relatives have employed some supernatural agency.

The Magnetic Mrs. Sheppard

That pretty, persuasive and well-groomed widow, Mrs. Maryland S. Bartlett Sheppard, who radiates magnetism for the wheedling of alms from flint-hearted business men is once more doing business at the old stand. A few days ago she inserted an advertisement in a morning paper calling for a "refined, well-groomed, energetic young lady to assist ladies with Xmas tree for poor children; salary ten dollars per week." One young woman who responded to the advertisement was told that she was best suited for soliciting alms on ten per cent commission. Mrs. Sheppard informed her that she has several society girls employed on that basis who make good wages. The young woman told her that she objected to capitalizing her social pull. Mrs. Sheppard is a woman with an eventful local career extending back over about four years. She came to this city from the East at the invitation of the Rev. J. A. B. Wilson, a very enterprising Methodist minister, who knew her as a successful charity promoter. She proved of valuable assistance to him in promoting some of his charitable affairs on a salary, and when she first beamed on the community, people sat up and took notice for she is a dashing, stylish woman with the air of a society queen. She introduced herself as the granddaughter of the celebrated Jonah Kelly, founder of the Society of Friends of Maryland. The hall-mark of the third generation is an important factor in our mushroom aristocracy, and Mrs. Sheppard, being a woman of refinement, made a favorable impression from the start.

Her Interesting Career

After successfully managing a few affairs for the Rev. J. A. B. Wilson, Mrs. Sheppard founded a charity of her own, the "Little Mothers' Home," in the interest of which she circulated pictures of the institution and its inmates, showing a bevy of tots in modern sanitary surroundings. People who visited the home said that the pictures were somewhat idealistic, but perhaps they were envious of Mrs. Sheppard's success in stimulating the flow of charity toward her coffers. For awhile her zeal was bountifully rewarded. Her gentle touch met with the generous response on all sides until some of the newspapers began to grow suspicious, and skeptics began pouring their inquiries into the secretary of the Associated Charities. To dissipate all doubt as to the character of her work Mrs. Sheppard applied to the Associated Charities for endorsement, and a committee was appointed to investigate. The committee gathered a great deal of data, but before it could get down to the milk in the cocoanut, Mrs. Sheppard withdrew her application. She probably scorned the endorsement of the Associated Charities, though that institution enjoys the confidence of the community and represents all the genuine charities in the city. Though the committee was technically deprived of the privilege of reporting on Mrs. Sheppard's application, it is only fair to the public to state that if that application had not been withdrawn the report would have been unfavorable.

Publicity Promotion

Notwithstanding the attitude of the Associated Charities Mrs. Sheppard continues as a charitable worker, having the courage of her convictions, and believing perhaps that the good she achieves justifies the commercial methods which she employs, and she still enjoys the confidence of some of the newspapers. The Examiner published an item the other day informing its readers that the Directors of her institution were about to pull off a Xmas tree function for the benefit of the home. The names of seven women, said to be directors, were given, but the officers of the Associated Charities, which is still on her trail, could find only five of the names in the directory, and the other two could not be found at the addresses given. However it may be that the ladies scorn the directory, having a preference for the Blue Book; for Mrs. Sheppard dearly loves society people, and the Blue Book is so exclusive, you know.

Her Country Home

With a view of getting reliable information on the subject of Mrs. Sheppard's philanthropic activities I communicated with her by phone, and questioned her as to the location of her home. She told me that the institution was no longer housed, but that she had lately been providing for the little ones in the country. She expects to open a home, she said, in Martinez, some time next year. When asked if she knew why the Associated Charities would not endorse her she replied that she did not care for the endorsement; that some day she would be recognized as the leading charitable institution in San Francisco. Meanwhile she preferred to go it on her own hook, and she gave me a cordial invitation to attend her Xmas tree party, at the same time expressing regret that I had written unkind notices of her work, and surprise that I had never received a communication on the subject from her attorney, Mr. George D. Collins. This being the holiday season I presume that the zealous Mrs. Sheppard is stimulating the charitable spirit at a brisk pace, and that she will accumulate sufficient money to open a very fine home in Martinez. I have no doubt that Mrs. Sheppard does considerable good, and that she has relieved distress. The main objection to her is that she makes of charity a business enterprise, but I have no authentic information on the subject. While the attitude of the Associated Charities may be significant, Mrs. Sheppard may be sincere in believing that if it is proper for charitable institutions to have salaried officers, there is no reason why she should not be the salaried officer of her own institution. While her methods are questionable her motives may be sound. Givers of charity, however, would be better satisfied if they could get satisfactory reports of her stewardship.

Fine For The Debutantes

All the young girls are saying that Mr. Redding's dinner to Miss Anita Harvey was one of the most delightful of all the debutante functions which have been given, simply because the genial host permitted the guest of honor to make her own selection of girls and men, and this without any of the responsibility of offending anyone or leaving anyone out, for the onus rested on Mr. Redding. The dinner was entirely a white one, all done in roses and chrysanthemums with the canopy which the dingy Red Room really needs. All the girls were delighted to be in the Bohemian Club which is a treat even to the older women and a wild delight to the very young ones. Mr. and Mrs. Fred Kohl chaperoned the party. By some Mrs. Kohl is considered quite a beauty. Personally I think her too plump.

Speaking of Plumpness

What a lot of avoidupois Mrs. Reginald Brooke has accumulated since she was last here! Was it that time or the time before that Mr. Phelan assisted her over the footlights at the California theatre on the occasion of our only theatrical fire? At any rate I don't believe Mrs. Brooke could make it now. And, by the bye, on that occasion the lady lost a diamond sunburst which was never found. I believe Mr. Phelan replaced it as it was found that the precipitate flight was not necessary and the gentleman host of the box-party felt culpable for having suggested it.

Not Tremendously Significant

An Eastern contemporary sees some significance in the fact that a Roman Catholic (Gelbus) recently visited a Protestant church (Grace Methodist Episcopal) to inspect a picture of Christ painted by a Jew (Max Rosenthal). This is pointed out as a sign of the times, but it needs some elucidation as to what in particular it is a sign of. There is nothing novel in the circumstance that a Catholic prelate should have an interest in painting or that he should visit a Protestant church in order to inspect a particular work that could not be seen elsewhere. Neither is there anything surprising in the fact that a Jew should make Christ the subject of his work, for Christ himself was a Jew of the Jews. Least of all should there be cause of comment in that a picture of the founder of Christianity should find place in a Christian church. Art is presumed to have no religion. It would be a much more significant fact were the case reversed and a Jew refuse to paint such a picture, a Protestant church refuse to accept it and a Catholic prelate refuse to look upon it.

The Battle Is On

Tom Lawson of Boston has achieved his purpose of smoking the tigers of Wall street out of their lair. For a time they were content to scoff, and they heeded not his stinging diatribes. His exposure of the infamous character of some of the men that control the business interests of the country, created a big sensation, but the victims of his vituperation scorned to reply or deny. It was not until he went into Wall street, and undertook to bear the market, that he succeeded in forcing them to squeal, and squeal they did horrendously. Now Lawson is being abused. No doubt he will be villainously misrepresented, for in their eagerness to vindicate themselves and minimize the effect of his accusations, the rapacious gold-brick artists of high finance will deal in slander and misrepresentation, and summon to their aid every newspaper in the country that thrives off the subsidies of the rich.

Cosgrave on Lawson

Mr. J. O'H. Cosgrave, the brilliant young editor of Everybody's, has written me anent my recent discussion of Tom Lawson, to say that the Boston millionaire who has created such a big sensation in the financial world, is one of the most lovable of men. "He isn't popular in a certain set in Boston," says Cosgrave, "but one of the best newspaper men there recently told me that although he has more enemies than any one else, he also has more friends. I have been with him for some time and am in a pretty good position to judge whether he is sincere or not. He is certainly consistent in all that he has said to me, and he takes tremendous care and pains to secure the accuracy of the various statements he puts forth. The best of the series is to come. Throughout next year we will have, every month, a story of really sensational interest, and I can assure you he will make an exposition of Wall Street piracy which will create an intense excitement in this country. This is absolutely without the slightest exaggeration. Lawson is a first-rate combination of qualities and properties that impart to his personality the manner of a Westerner rather than of a Bostonian. He has the finest horses, dogs and cattle in the world, and can beat Arthur McEwen talking."

His Gratifying Success

J. O'Hara Cosgrave has made rapid strides in the magazine world since leaving this city, where he founded the weekly Wave. As editor of Everybody's he raised that publication from obscurity to the front rank of magazines, which it had attained even before he opened its pages to Tom Lawson, whose sensational exposition of the methods of the predatory plutocrat has excited world-wide interest. Though an Australian by birth, Cosgrave has a warm affection for California, having begun his journalistic career in this city, and he keeps in touch with all the San Francisco newspaper men that settle in New York. In his letter he reports that Bill Irwin has "caught on" in the Sun office; that Wallace Irwin "is doing well and is going to make lots of money," and that Burgess and Irwin are collaborating on a new series of stories which he hopes "will fit into Everybody's."

"Poor man, he has to be truthful."

"Why?"

"He lies so badly."

DUC DE MONTEBELLO

CHAMPAGNE

FROM THE OLD VINEYARDS

OF THE DUKES OF ORLEANS

Chateau de Mareuil - sur - ay - France

This is not the story of a commonplace adventuress who contrives to seclude herself with an able but susceptible financier and then threatens to blow his good fame to the winds if he does not yield to her blackmail. Mrs. Chadwick did not resort to the common trick of her kind that involves a respectable married banker in a compromising attitude towards herself. Apparently she thought out a new scheme. She familiarized herself with the methods of modern graft and she found that the weakness of many money lenders was their greed. If she could induce them to believe that they could rob her of a fat portion of her immense wealth she could rob the robber in any amount she might see fit to name in her promissory note. Blinded by their insatiate avarice, chuckling at the thought of their easy prey, puffed with the wind of their self-esteem, confident of their ability to protect themselves against a mere woman, practiced in the arts of usury, blown with constant success in the robbery of widows, orphans and other helpless victims compelled to accept money loans at ruinous rates of interest, these rapacious Shylocks were as clay in the hands of the potter under the manipulation of this woman. Mrs. Chadwick played upon these greedy money lenders as the sawdust swindler used to play on the avarice of the unsophisticated dweller in Podunk and Oshkosh. She offered them a gold-brick as security for one-half the value of a genuine gold bar. If the Humbert swindle had been perpetrated in Cleveland or Pittsburg the money lenders of those cities would probably have been suspicious of Mrs. Chadwick and her alleged "securities," but the Humbert fraud was exposed in France and the details were perhaps unknown to the bankers of Cleveland and Pittsburg. Besides, who would have the audacity to attempt a trick of that sort on a Cleveland money lender or a Pittsburg financier? These usurers imagined that they had wit sufficient for all the emergencies of their unclean business. They find that they are but tyros in the science of graft—what they need is a clever business agent and capable advisor, and I would recommend Mrs. Cassie Chadwick for this position.

Text-Books for Usurers

I am surprised that our usurers are so pluckable. It seems no trick at all to steal their money. Adept in the processes whereby the money of other people may be absorbed through the arteries of finance, these blood-suckers are helpless to resist the subtle machinations of other crooks. They have learned the use of weapons of offense but they know little of defensive tactics. This is strange in view of the fact that usury is older—ages older than Leviticus. Every banker who deals in usury should take a course in Balzac. I would recommend as text-books that great author's works entitled "Pere Goriot," "Cesar Birotteau," "Splendors and Miseries," "The House of Nucingen" and "La Rabauilleuse." In these volumes they will find minute directions as to the conduct of a successful career in the business of lending money at exorbitant interest on double and treble the value of the money loaned. Let them study the character and methods of Jean Esther Van Gobseck, "the illustrious Gobseck, master of the Palmas, the Gigonnets, the Werbrusts, the Kellers, and the Nucingens." Any American usurer who will take old Gobseck as his model and operate his business on Gobseckian principles will eventually find himself proof against the lures and wiles of all the Humberts and Chadwicks that infest the marts of trade. Balzac has been very thorough in his analysis of the vice that is personified in the Gobsecks and Russell Sages of the money market. He has not only depicted the usurer and described his methods, but he has presented a vivid characterization of the natural enemy of the usurer in his dramatic biography of Jaques Collin, alias Vautrin, alias Carlos Herrera, alias Saint-Esteve, alias Halpertius, alias William Barker, alias Trompe-la-Mort, the most complete intellectual scoundrel that ever faced his crimes in a court of justice or stalked triumphant through the pages of fiction. If the bankers who have been so easily duped by Mrs. Chadwick will read the history of Vautrin, the galley slave and confidence operator, they will never again succumb to the crude deceptions of that sort of financiering.

From Faro to High Finance

Some years ago I heard a faro dealer remark that no self-respecting gambler could become a successful banker because his conscience was not built that way. I have come to the conclusion that he was mistaken. The other day I met, at the Palace hotel, a neatly dressed gentleman, of dignified bearing, who looked as though he might be a successful country merchant. I learned that he was Mr. Samuel A. Bonnifield, president of the German National Bank of Northern Kansas with headquarters at Beloit. By that designation it would be hard to recognize genial Sam Bonnifield, professional gambler and faro dealer of Alaska, but he is none other. Sam Bonnifield belongs to the old school of gamblers, the school in which men were trained to cherish a reputation for honor. In the fraternity in which he was a shining light promissory notes were not essential securities. The gambler's word was as good as his bond, and his bond was not of the flimsy material out of which is fabricated, according to Tom Lawson, the shadowy securities in which the surplus capital of insurance companies is invested nowadays. Miners on the Yukon put their gold dust in Sam Bonnifield's safe with as much confidence, if not more, than they would have in opening an account in a San Francisco bank. And now Sam Bonnifield, weary of the gambler's life, has settled down as an exponent of high finance in the little Kansas town in which he was raised. I wonder if the people of Beloit have as much confidence in the bank president as the miners of the Yukon had in the faro dealer.

The Charity Ball

Ned Greenway has been persuaded to give his services as director of the charity ball to be pulled off at the St. Francis next Wednesday night in aid of that most worthy charity, the Nursery for Homeless Children. The proceeds are to go toward the fund for the new Nursery at Fourteenth and Lake streets. The affair will be the real thing in charity balls, and is sure to draw a large attendance. Tickets are for sale at the information bureau of the St. Francis. The ladies having the ball in charge are: Mesdames Jacob Bertz, W. S. Leake, Frank V. Wright, William L. Gerstle, J. J. Theobald, Guy E. Manning, James L. Gould, Pelham Ames, Eugene Bresse, O. B. Burns, Albert Dernham, Henry Dernham, James Elder, Herbert E. Law, A. H. Martin, Homer E. Osborne, Edgar F. Preston, George B. Sperry, J. J. Spieker, William Thomas and W. W. Van Arsdale, Misses Maud O'Connor and Miss Adelaide Pollock.

A Burning Question

Mr. Greenway's fancy dress ball has occasioned a great deal of uneasiness in society. To wear fancy dress or not to wear fancy dress is the question that has been agitating people who would rather lose a leg than not be among those present at a Greenway function; whether 'tis worth while to invite the gibes and sneers of unsympathetic friends, or stick to plain evening dress and miss the opportunity to make spectacular display. It was easy for the ladies. They love to don epochal costumes, and achieve picturesque effects, but the men were panicky at the thought of exhibiting themselves in vari-colored costumes with queer embellishments and strange fol-de-rols. One well known club man wished to go as Romeo but he lacked the courage of his vanity, and what little courage he was possessed of oozed out when he confided his ambition to his friends, and heard their comments. As nearly all the picturesque costumes involve a display of the calves, some of our elderly society men who are loth to stack up alongside the truly classic curves of Czar Greenway, found it difficult to make a choice until it was suggested that they would look all right in soldiers' uniforms and hunting suits. It is earnestly hoped that Ethyl Hager will sustain her reputation for originality, and give both sexes a treat.

They Applaud Wheeler

When President Wheeler of Berkeley, despite the decision of Judge Ogden to the contrary, accepted the word of honor of Adolph Knopf, that he had never been criminally intimate with Mrs. Van Horn, he scored the hit of his life on the other side of the bay. Mrs. Van Horn has many friends in Oakland and vicinity, and they have absolute confidence in her. They believe that she was done a cruel injustice, and that it is not too late to compass her vindication. To that end they will seek to have the divorce case reopened. It is said that they have secured new testimony by which they can rebut the evidence introduced by Professor Van Horn. Meanwhile President Wheeler is being warmly commended for his action. He has done much toward arousing sentiment in favor of the unfortunate woman.

Insubordinate Students

President Wheeler has many enemies who view with keen delight the rebellious and turbulent conduct of the University students toward Captain J. T. Nance, Commandant of the Cadet body. It is a sad commentary on the intelligence of the students that they are incapable of appreciating the fact that their conduct reflects discredit on both the university and its executive officer. In vain does Captain Nance storm over the campus and through the college halls, vowing that he will not be lampooned, and ridiculed in song and story. But the students ignore his protests. In a recent issue of the Pelican he was gayed unmercifully. The Occident, a monthly university journal, assumes the privilege of dictating as to what Captain Nance should do, and insists that student dignity should be sustained at all hazards. Clearly the young men who are being educated at the expense of the taxpayers of this State are laboring under a delusion as to their importance.

The Rising Generation

The Saturday Night Club dances are becoming quite important social functions. A good many of the older men and women attend them, and the dancing classes of last year have really become a series of balls of the dignity of the old Fortnightlies. There are usually, however, a great many children in attendance who will have to wait five or six years before coming out at a Greenway ball. But the girls of twelve and thirteen are exceedingly precocious and scorn the attentions of boys of their own age. They prefer men in the thirties, and will often cut their dances with the youngsters to favor the more matured beaux.

Charlotte Wilson's interesting pallor is said to be one of her most attractive points, and I hear that several society girls are trying to imitate it by using powders and face bleaches.

Their Sad Regret

Rumors of the engagement of Genevieve King to a New Yorker will not down. The King girls recently returned from abroad and are now in the vortex of the social swim. Genevieve is the oldest daughter of the Homer Kings. She is a clever girl of rare mental activity. She is now studying law, a circumstance that has given rise to the suspicion among her friends that she has a lawyer for her fiancé. Both the King girls were witnesses in the Dolbeer trial, and consequently their social status is fixed. I hear that many of our ambitious society women seriously and sadly regret that they never knew the heiress over whose estate the interesting contest has been raging in Judge Coffey's court. The trial has been one series of social functions over which Judge Coffey has presided with rare eclat. It would not be surprising to learn that the social bee has entered the judge's chapeau.

Merely a Consul

About once a month the statement is published, or one hears it in the world of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, that the father of Mrs. Charles Oelrichs was Austrian Minister to the United States. Very few people in society know the difference between the rank of a Consul and that of a Minister. Mrs. Oelrichs's father, Mr. de Loosey, was the Australian Consul-General at New York, not an important position in that city, which is near Washington where the Austrian Embassy headquarters are located. The consuls are purely commercial agents and have nothing to do with diplomacy.

A Celebrated Case

The death of Eva Hamilton, last week, revived reminiscences of one of the most sensational romances and tragedies that ever startled New York society. Eva Hamilton was the wife of Robert Ray Hamilton, of the aristocratic Hamilton family, to one of whose members Gertrude Atherton dedicated her novel on Alexander of that ilk. The marriage shocked New York society, for the bride was thought to be no better than she should be, and there was some mystery as to her past. Nevertheless, for a time the Robert Ray Hamiltons gave promise of proving an ideally-mated couple and of enjoying much wedded bliss. There was never a rift in the lute until one day society was startled by a big scandal. In a fit of rage, Mrs. Hamilton had stabbed her nursemaid and the latter insisted on prosecuting her mistress. Hamilton did all he could to buy the girl off, or hush her up, but she refused all offers. Mrs. Hamilton was placed on trial and then her whole wretched past came out. It developed that she was an adventuress, and that she had once been the sport of a lumber camp. A child that Hamilton regarded as his offspring turned out to be a foundling foisted on him by his wife. At least, such was the story of the nurse, who, because of her threat to expose the fraud, was stabbed by her mistress.

The Tragic Sequel

Mrs. Hamilton suffered imprisonment or paid a large fine, I have forgotten which, and her broken-hearted husband went to Wyoming where he had a ranch, and one day his riderless horse was found saddled and bridled, and later Hamilton's body was recovered from a river bottom. In his will it was found that he had provided liberally for the child, but left nothing to Mrs. Hamilton, who embarked upon a career of dissipation and though still young in years at her death, she was a hag in appearance. With a pauper's funeral the miserable, sordid story ends.

The Sequoia Meeting

Last Tuesday evening's reunion of the Sequoia Club was a most enjoyable affair. It received the proper stimulus from a punch that had no suggestion of the pump in it. There was no lion to worship, and nobody to dote on Browning. It had been hoped that Paderewski would be lured into the green cage but he wasn't. The honors of the evening fell to Mrs. Reginald Knight Smith, Miss Georgia Spieker and Mrs. Bryan. It was a gathering of congenial spirits, and it bore no semblance of a circus or a kindergarten. The purveyors of culturine were not there, and President Aiken was elated over the success of the affair.

Reminiscences of a Summer

Mrs. Repsold, who died the other day leaving a heart-broken husband to mourn her sudden death, was a daughter of Madame Thea Sanderini, the soprano who in her prime was a grand opera prima donna and later delighted San Franciscans at occasional concerts. I remember Mrs. Repsold in the first year of her married life when, with her husband and mother, she was a guest at El Monte hotel, Sausalito. The hotel was then in its prime, and housed many well-known people. Madame Taverner-Graham and her daughter Lily, not long ago prima contralto at the Tivoli under the better known name of Frances Temple-Graham, were also guests at the hotel that summer. Miss Graham used to set the sentimental swains a-sighing with the warmth and pathos of her "Marguerite," at the impromptu drawing-room concerts, and Madame Sanderini also contributed to the program, with Mrs. Harry Curtaz and Lilian Slinkey, the daughter of the house. It was some time after this, I believe, that Madame Sanderini became the soprano of St. Luke's choir.

Mrs. D. D. Colton has returned to Washington and opened her house for the winter. Her health is much improved. Mrs. McLean-Martin is with her, and the latter's daughter Katherine is at school in Washington. The Frank Graces are in the city but are not going out much because of the death of Mr. Grace's father, and Mrs. Grace's cousin, Mrs. Schacher of Paris.

Mr. and Mrs. Richard Tully (Eleanor Gates) are expected to arrive any day from the East and they will spend a portion of the winter here, for they are both devoted to California. Mrs. Tully has been busy working on her novel. I hear that Mr. Tully has had several plays accepted by managers.

Debutantes In Flight

The usual hegira of this year's buds has already begun, and the debutantes who are not wildly the rage are all preparing for trips or a rest cure. This is an old dodge. One of the girls did it two years ago and several of this year's crop are contemplating it. Oddly enough Europe is never suggested by the girls who are great successes. It is rather pathetic, isn't it, this precipitate retreat in preference to admission of defeat. I hear that several of this year's debutantes who had counted confidently on being in the Gaiety Club and had wined and dined the members of that organization most recklessly in order to bring about the desired results found themselves left out as only three buds were elected to membership. The fact is that Cupid did not make the ravages among the Gaiety girls which it was hoped he would and so there are few vacancies, and the club must be kept down to proportions that will enable it to meet in private houses.

Miss Chesebrough's Trip

One of the girls who is going abroad because she really doesn't care a rap for society is Miss Chesebrough who flouts a tea for golf any day and couldn't even be prevailed to stay at home on the occasion of her sister's coming out. Miss Chesebrough is going to spend the winter in Egypt chaperoned by Mrs. Pinckard, who is taking her son Eyre there for the benefit of his health.

Given To Study

But the fate of this year's girls is nothing to the disaster which has overtaken the belles of yester-year. The girls who were so popular last year that their names were in the paper every night are fortunate now if they are heard of once a fortnight. Everything "goes" with them. One of them—a pretty blonde who had the most money of all last year's lot of buds and the prettiest clothes from Paris—has taken to study and says to her friends, "Oh, I'm not going out this year. I had so much of it last year. I'm studying." Verily, to say a thing like that with a straight face requires the aplomb of a Bernhardt.

Society's Blue Stockings

Everything is Intellect in society nowadays. This is as if Miss Modish said: "Of course we have money, style and position, but now just watch us be intellectual. We can do it as well as another." Oscar Wilde used to say: "Education is so vulgar—why, the middle class is educated!" And now by way of paraphrase it may be truly said: "Education is so vulgar—why, even the Four Hundred is educated!" Edith Simpson was one of the society girls who took the lectures at the summer school in Berkeley, and Florence Bailey was another. Bessie Mills delves deep into historical lore, and there are other girls who are doing their best to keep up with her. Mrs. Fred Green, Henry Crocker's sister, is attending a course of lectures at Berkeley this winter, and so is Mrs. McMullin-Belvin.

They Like Europe

Mrs. Blair returned from her European trip with Mrs. Ella Hotaling somewhat sooner than she expected. She likes life abroad and so does her daughter, but Jennie is devoted to her brother and so, against her inclination, remains in San Francisco. The O'Connor girls are also enraptured with life abroad, and have no intention of returning home for a long time. They are enjoying themselves hugely fluttering about Paris. "Jimmy" Byrne and his mother, Mrs. Irvine, will soon sail for Europe. They will go by the Mediterranean route and spend the winter on the Riviera, where their friend, Mrs. Robert Goelet, is located. Mrs. Goelet will entertain the San Franciscans on her yacht.

Homeward Bound

Everybody is delighted that Mrs. "Gus" Spreckels has decided to come West while the season is booming. She will bring Lurline with her and as the latter is such a favorite, all sorts of joyous festivities will celebrate her welcome return. The Spreckelses have an apartment at Sherry's, in New York, and Mrs. "Gus" has done a lot of entertaining this year. Her husband, however, does not go about much in the giddy whirl for he passes most of his time at his sugar factory near Yonkers.

Another Society Conspiracy

So successful was the conspiracy hatched in society for the persuading of Mrs. Eleanor Martin to give a large ball that it has been decided to resort to the same artifices and cunning suggestion, with a view of getting a similar treat out of Mrs. Will Crocker. The whisper is going the rounds that it is Mrs. Crocker's turn to give a ball or an elaborate entertainment of some kind, for the delectation of her friends. The consensus of opinion is that it should be a fancy dress affair. Hints have already been given and Mrs. Crocker has been reminded that she was to have given a large ball two years ago, which was postponed indefinitely on account of the death of a relative. Society's hopes having been raised at that time, it is suggested that Mrs. Crocker should now make good. But Mrs. Crocker's sentiments have undergone a great change in two years. One of her intimate friends told me the other day that she has lost all interest in San Francisco's provincial aristocracy, its wearisome snobs and pretentious climbers, and that she is eagerly waiting for her youngest born to get old enough to stand an ocean voyage, her intention being to leave as soon as possible for Europe. By the way, the West Oakland Home is richer by one thousand dollars, the gift of its president, Mrs. Crocker. Six months ago she sent a check for the same amount. The last donation was intended as a thank-offering for the recent stork visitation.

Blood and Beauty

One of the prettiest of the debutantes is Maizie Langhorne, with her red-brown hair and brown eyes. The bluest of blue blood courses through Miss Langhorne's veins. She is a cousin of Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, and of the other beautiful Langhorne of Virginia. Though her beauty is so pronounced and her blood so blue, Miss Langhorne is not heavily burdened with the world's goods. Her father is a lawyer and the family is not wealthy. The debutante daughter makes her own pretty frocks that she wears to the balls, I am told.

It Will Be Picturesque

Somebody asked Tom Driscoll's fiancée the other day how long her honeymoon was to last. "That's very silly," answered little Miss Bacon, "it is going to last all our lives." The young people have planned an ideal honeymoon. They will wander where fancy leads them, through Egypt, Italy, France, Spain and on to where the rainbow bends to earth. The Bacon-Driscoll wedding date has been definitely set for January nineteenth, at the old Santa Barbara Mission church. A company of monks will chant the nuptial mass and the ceremony will be performed by Archbishop Riordan. The bride is to wear a gown of rare old rose point, which was worn by her grandmother at her wedding in the same old Mission. Cornelia Kempff, daughter of Rear-Admiral Kempff, the maid of honor, will wear white chiffon cloth. The bridesmaids, Eleanor Phelps and Katharine Kutz, daughters of the Rear-Admirals, and Josephine Brown and Mabel Poett of Santa Barbara, will be in pale pink chiffon cloth. The five attendants will wear large black-plumed Gainsborough hats. After the church ceremony, a big reception is to be held at the home of Rear-Admiral and Mrs. Bacon, just out of Santa Barbara. The caterers are to go down from San Francisco and will be supplemented by those of Los Angeles and Santa Barbara.

The Suitors of Leontine

My prediction of an engagement between Leontine Blakeman and Lieutenant McMillan proved true, and the dailies announced the engagement several days after I had predicted it. It was over two years ago, in these columns, that I first remarked that Lieutenant McMillan seemed to be the favored one among Miss Blakeman's suitors. No girl in society has been so rushed by wooers as the fair Leontine, and it has been said of her that in one season she receives more proposals than the average girl may expect in a lifetime. The more vivacious society girls always wonder where Miss Blakeman's fascination lies, for she is dignified and stately with a manner that passes for cold. Her friends, however, know that she possesses a very warm heart and they all love her dearly. Clarence Follis was once her most ardent adorer, but at that time Miss Blakeman was supposed to be engaged to Lieutenant Gardiner, the gay young army officer who a little later amazed society by marrying a milliner. Miss Blakeman, by the way, always had a penchant for brass buttons, and no one was surprised that she finally decided to marry into the army.

Her Elusive Photographs

Though not a beauty, in evening dress Lieutenant McMillan's fiancée has a superb figure and dresses so well that women give her the sincerest flattery—imitation. They all try to copy her gowns but though they go to her modiste it is impossible for them to copy her style, which is identified with the individual. Indeed, she makes many of her own gowns, I have been told, and designs all of them. She has always had a horror of being pictured in the papers and has refused her counterfeit presentment to society supp. writers even when every other girl of her set had been thus exploited. At the Cunningham-Kessler wedding, when the bridal party posed for a group at a local photographer's, Leontine sent an excuse of illness, later explaining that she hated to think of her picture ever appearing in the papers. It did get in, however, even before this week, when all the dailies ran it, and that was at the marriage of Olive Holbrook and Silas Palmer. The official photographer took the bridal party, of which Miss Blakeman was a member, and the Call managed to secure and run the picture. On another occasion, one of Miss Blakeman's photos, which she had given to an army officer, found its way into newspaper hands in a curious manner. The officer lost it and a volunteer at the Presidio, so the story goes, picked it up. He later pawned his uniform, and in the pocket was found Miss Blakeman's portrait.

New Year 1905 Greetings

Through the kindness of our friends the year 1904 has been exceptionally good to us, and we desire to take this occasion to thank you all and wish you a very Happy New Year—the happiest that you have ever had. During 1905 we hope to have the pleasure of serving you further, and if given that privilege, assure you that we will do everything in our power to serve you well.

The Bonapartes in America

The grandson of Jerome Bonaparte, King of Westphalia, by his American wife, Betsy Patterson, was recently appointed by the President to make a special investigation into Indian affairs, and there are rumors that he will have a place in the next Cabinet. It is not for his pedigree but for his worth that the President thus favors the King's grandson. None of the American Bonapartes ever claimed any kind of notice on the score of their descent. Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, son of Betsy Patterson and Jerome Bonaparte, married Miss Williams of Roxbury, Massachusetts. He had two sons, Jerome Napoleon, who died in 1870, and Charles Joseph, civil service expert and eminent lawyer, who married Ellen Canning Day. The "head of the house in America" is the son of Jerome Napoleon, who lives with his mother, Caroline Appleton Bonaparte, in Washington. Had Jerome II married to please his father, the King of Westphalia, he would have received a title; both his parents were disgusted at his plebeian choice of a wife. Betsy Patterson never married again. She always hoped, it is said, either that Jerome would return to her or that she would find another husband his equal in station. She sent the lad once to his father and counseled him to be pleasant to the new wife. But the boy was evidently more Patterson than Bonaparte; he tired of court life and returned home.

This is the season of the year when the wife who wants a sealskin for Christmas complains of the severity of the winter.

Her Two Good Reasons

Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, when last heard from, was in Paris and in the best of health. The report of her ill-health, by the way, that was given out as the reason of her giving up her benevolent work, had little ground. To friends who have just returned from abroad she confided her reasons for her attitude in regard to the Berkeley students. The causes were two: One, that some mining properties in which she invested failed to turn out well; the other, that she felt that she was to an extent being imposed upon. No effort was made by those she assisted to help themselves, and she was particularly vexed that the sewing class of the U. C., which promised to be self-supporting, after it had been established for several years continued to look to her for help. Mrs. Hearst is still, however, a good fairy to the deserving; she privately aids many students on the other side who are following courses in art or music.

Caught by Cupid

Mrs. Grundy is watching pretty Doris Jeffreys out of the tail of her eye, and from the expression in Dame Grundy's eye I know she sees an engagement ring in the vicinity of Miss Jeffreys's third finger. I hear that the lucky man is a charming chap with a bundle of worldly goods that puts him outside the pale of a fortune-hunter. Since Miss Jeffreys first rode rough shod over several masculine hearts at the San Rafael paper chases she has been reported engaged several times, but the rumor was always punctured by an indignant denial. However I believe Cupid has scored a bull's-eye this time and the announcement will trip on the heels of Mrs. Jeffreys's return from the East, where she is now visiting. Miss Jeffreys did not accompany her mother.

Going To Berlin

Dr. Maude Noble will leave shortly for the East, en route to Europe, where she will remain for six months or more. She will visit New York, Washington, and the Johns Hopkins university at Baltimore before crossing the pond, and will spend most of her time while abroad in Berlin, where she will pursue her medical studies. Miss Noble took a B. A. at the State University a few years ago, and later with her brother Paul graduated from the Cooper Medical College. She is one of the best-known amateur musicians in this city, and was a member of the original Saturday Morning Orchestra, organized by Mrs. Selden S. Wright. Among the orchestra's members were the Ames sisters, Bessie and Alice, Maude and Bessie Younger, Daisy Polk, Marie Dillon, Mrs. Ivy Wandesforde Kersey and other society amateurs. Maude Noble played the trombone, and her sister Pearl was the cornetist. Anna Lyle, the flutest of the orchestra, also studied medicine and after a course at Stanford went to Paris and Vienna, whence she returned a full-fledged M. D.

The engagement is announced of Miss Belle Auerbach and Mr. Carl Greenhood of Montana. The betrothal reception will be held at Miss Auerbach's home tomorrow afternoon.

A dinner was given last week by Mr. and Mrs. Fred Jacobs at their home in Pacific avenue complimentary to Miss Potts of Savannah, Georgia, who is visiting Miss Elsie Kimble in this city. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. "Joe" Chanslor, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Kimble, Mr. and Mrs. William Watt, Miss Kimble, Miss Hopps, Dr. Raymond Russ and Washington Butts of Cleveland.

Merely Experimental

A recent betrothal recalls the man's engagement a few summers ago to a society girl, who is noted for her individuality and love of intellectual pursuits. The fiance took the engagement quite au sérieux, I believe, but the young lady was merely experimenting with a view to evolving a beautiful soul. She was studying psychology and she felt incomplete without the sensation which is experienced by one who is engaged. However, the announcement of the engagement was made, and then engagement cups and congratulations began to pour in.

The Pony Express Riders

In "Uncle" George Bromley's volume of reminiscences, he mentions the Pony Express, which very few Californians now remember. The equipment of the express rider was one dictated out of the necessities of the situation. Young men of light weight and general fitness were selected. They needed ample courage and coolness for their work, for they had to rely entirely on themselves. All rode fully armed, with rifle and revolvers at first, but the rifle was soon discarded, as its weight was not compensated for in usefulness. The horses were light and wiry, and were equipped with light riding saddles, bridles, and the saddle-bags. These were divided into four pouches. Three were locked and could be opened only at Salt Lake City and at the military posts en route. The fourth was opened at each station and was designed for local mail. The men wore no special uniform, but dressed according to individual fancy, though there was a degree of conformity growing out of the necessities of their work. The saddle bags were transferred from rider to rider, so that the same passed from one end of the route to the other. The letters were wrapped in oil silk before being placed in the pouches, to preserve them from moisture, and the original charges were five dollars for each letter of half an ounce or less, but later the rate was reduced to one-half that. The time was also reduced to eight days instead of ten. The express charge was in addition to the regular United States mail rates. The weight limit of any express was twenty pounds, but this was seldom reached, as thin paper was used and only important news was transmitted. Some of the Eastern papers tried the experiment of printing special editions on tissue paper, but there was not enough demand for them at the price to make the plan more than an advertisement. Time was never lost at stations, as every man made it a point of honor to keep up with his schedule, and beat records if possible. Two minutes was the maximum time allowed, whether to change riders or horses, and the commanders of the military posts along the route were always ready to render what assistance lay in their power, but no grant, contract or financial aid was ever given. Financially it never was a success, for, though the receipts often rose as high as a thousand dollars a trip, the expenses necessary to maintain the riders, horses, stations, agents and other employes were enormous. The Pony Express was in operation only sixteen months in all, and had it not been for the necessity of demonstrating the practicability of the Central Route during the winter, it would have been abandoned six months after its establishment.

To get something which will be useful every day and yet something which is out of the ordinary—something different enough from other possessions to recall holiday pleasures and the donor—that is the great and often unsolved problem of the Christmas purchaser. If you can not think of something, suitable for friend or relative, a visit to the Russian Art Store, 428 Sutter street, will bring you happy results.

Hotaling's Latest

Richard Hotaling is famous for a forceful wit and good mots, and he is constantly being quoted in the Bohemian Club in which there is now a dearth of wags. The latest witticism credited to Hotaling grew out of a meeting with a stranger on a car that was passing the cemeteries in San Mateo county. The stranger noting the handsome gates and lakes but not the tomb-dotted hills beyond turned to Hotaling and said:

"I beg your pardon, but is this a resort?"

"Yes, the last resort," was the reply.

Jacob Riis and His Work

A new lion has arrived here in the person of Jacob A. Riis, the distinguished writer, author of "The Making of an American," "Theodore Roosevelt the Citizen," "The Battle with the Slum," "Children of the Tenements," and other works showing how the other half lives. It is not likely that Mr. Riis will permit society to stroke his mane, but he is going to lecture before the students at Berkeley and in this city. He is a man of great individuality and has made a life study of the lower classes and their mode of living. With the exception perhaps of Elliott Flower and Lincoln Steffens no one has ever been so successful as Jacob Riis in exposing the methods of the political grafter. It was when he was a police reporter in New York that he discovered what the grafters were doing, and he started in upon his work of reformation and exposure. But until Roosevelt became Police Commissioner, Riis found himself decidedly up against it in his fight for the tenant against the landlord in the tenement districts. After Roosevelt's attention was drawn to the matter, Riis found things going his way and he kept on until about a dozen blocks of the worst tenements in the metropolis were demolished. He wrote the story of his struggle in some remarkable articles, and his fame was made. All the papers and magazines solicited articles from him, and he went deeper still into his subject. The result was "The Making of An American." It is in this book that Mr. Riis tells the humorous story about the firemen who wished to honor the memory of a dead reporter. They told the florist to design the piece and he prepared a huge wreath bearing the legend: "Admit Within Fire Lines Only."

His Romance

Fifty-five years ago Jacob Riis was born in the town of Ribe, in Denmark. His early years were spent in Ribe, save four years when he was learning his trade as a builder in Copenhagen. He loved a beautiful girl in his native town but her parents refused to let her marry an insignificant carpenter, so young Riis decided to go out into the wide world to seek his fortune. He sailed away for New York, arriving there on Whit Sunday, 1870. At first he worked as a laborer in a Welsh settlement back in the hills, then he became a coal miner, then an assistant to a truck farmer and later still a bricklayer. Finally he obtained work on a newspaper, made a success at it and went back to Denmark for his fiance. Some months after his marriage he began the police reporting that led him on to his fame and fortune. He is a brilliant reporter, with keen news sense, and vivid imagination, and a sympathy that is greater than any mere intellectual faculty. He is reporter and reformer in one.

The Redwoods Grove

The redwood canyon back of Mount Tamalpais, which the energetic ladies of the California Club are trying to have converted into a Government park, is the place where the famous Buddha jinks of the Bohemian Club was held. The jinks was the conception of Fred M. Somers, a member of the club, since deceased, and who was the founder of Current Literature. No one who attended the jinks has ever forgotten the impression made by the giant statue of Buddha, formed of white plaster, and extending clear up to the tree-tops. Mr. Somers read at the jinks an exquisite sermon, which he called "The Song of the Myriad Leaves." The redwoods canyon is one of the most pictur-

Those Cocos Island Searchers

It would be interesting to know some of the professional and business men who were duped by the Cocos Island treasure fake. They have been so ashamed of themselves for devoting their time and money in pursuit of the phantom fortune that they have carefully guarded the secret of the personnel behind and with the expedition. But one of the number has put the story of the "Secret of the Missing Millions" between book-covers, and he has succeeded in causing amazement at the credulity of the men who were duped. Modestly he has concealed his identity under the nom de plume of J. C. Wood, and he is none other, I am told, than John Chetwood, a local attorney. There were several lawyers interested in the ridiculous venture, one of whom, I believe, was Donzell Stoney. The sea captain who pretended to know the exact location of the pirate gold went to New York some months ago, and I believe that he is now luring people into another visionary enterprise. The story is being told in New York that some two hundred years ago certain pirates operated a gold mine in the State of Sonora, Mexico, and became fabulously wealthy. They were driven out of the country by Indians, but before going buried a large amount of treasure and concealed the opening of the mine. A detailed map of the location subsequently fell into the hands of Maximilian, and just before his execution he contemplated opening the mine. Later, a Californian miner got hold of the map, and visited the mine, which he found to be richer than any he had ever seen. Unfortunately he died before he could begin operations, and now the map is in the possession of a friend who is organizing a company to find and develop the property.

A Naval Engagement

My Manila correspondent writes me that John Randolph Hornberger, Paymaster U. S. N., gave a flotilla dinner at Hong Kong one day last month, during the course of which he announced to his brother officers his surrender to Cupid, and said that he would become a benedict next March. On the same day, at a luncheon in Cavite, the Paymaster's fiancée, Miss Olive McCall, gave a luncheon at which she announced her engagement. Miss McCall is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. G. McCall of Oakland. Her father was a pioneer railroad man of the State. Mr. Hornberger is attached to the torpedo flotilla in the Orient.

Pedigree vs. Cash

Mrs. Eells and the debutante daughter Dorothy are planning to take a trip abroad next year about Lenten-tide. Lieutenant and Mrs. Babcock will take the Eells' home and set up their household goods there. Miss Eells is one of the prettiest of this season's debutantes. The Eellses stand high in the Ross Valley set and the Ross Valley set considers nothing quite so exalted as its own particular crowd. Burlingame is looked upon as very nouveau by them; though they are shorter on money than the Blingumites their pedigrees are somewhat longer.

Sire Phelan Summons Bohemians

That typical bohemian of Post street, Mr. James D. Phelan, is going to sire the Christmas jinks of the Bohemian Club, and he has followed the usual custom of piquing the curiosity of the owl worshippers in a formal summons to the festivities. It opens with a quotation from Stevenson: "There is no duty we so much underrate as the duty of our being happy." After Stevenson comes Phelan:

Fledglings of the Owl—fledglings because you possess, me thinks, but the beginnings of wisdom—chasten yourselves in the Christmastide. The glad season is upon us. From the summit of the year, let us survey the extensive scene. Have you performed your Stevensonian duty? Have you no self-accusations?

Emergence from your fancied fate and leave care to the dungeons of the day—get out on habeas corpus and be with us on Saturday evening, the seventeenth, for the Christmas Jinks.

Then we may convince you of the folly of wisdom and rouse you by song and story. Life, you will learn, is measured by laughter, not by logarithms.

Are you commercial? Then know it that wisecracks are a drug on the market. Are you religious? Then believe that, in the final accounting, a joyful soul is the only commodity for which both gods and demons contend; you may have a chance. Are you artistic? Prove it and be approved.

Our temple will be decorated with fancy and lighted by wit, and against an unfeeling world its doors shall be closed.

For the night, Bohemia will be a sanctuary. St. John enjoins silence. Ministering mummers of music under Schneider, and of pantomime under Fernald and Vogt, shall wait upon your wants, but see to it that your wants are not more exacting than what has been provided. James D. Phelan, Sire.

Bohemian Club, December 11, 1904.

The usual program of following the high jinks with a burlesque on the same is not to be adhered to this year. It is to be omitted at the suggestion of Mr. Phelan who thinks that a Christmas celebration should not degenerate into buffoonery. Some of the cynics say that Mr. Phelan is thin-skinned, and objects to the low jinks because he finds it hard to smile at a burlesque on himself. At the same time they are pointing out that a pantomime has been written for the occasion by Chester Bailey Fernald, and that it is reported to be entirely devoid of the Yuletide flavor. Indeed it is said to be extremely broad, so broad in fact that a Censor Committee deemed it advisable to tone it down.

Sir Wilfred Laurier and his wife, with Mrs. Edwards, Miss Coutre and Mr. Bourdreau spent a few days of their visit here at Del Monte. The distinguished visitors from Ottawa were favored with much attention.

The De Youngs being in mourning, owing to the recent death of Mrs. De Young's brother, "Billy" Deane, they will not entertain this season.

How many lovers of "Ben Hur" know that at the time General Lew Wallace was writing that fascinating novel he was actively engaged as Governor of New Mexico in trying to rid that territory of the worst combination of "bad men" that ever infested the Southwest? The "Ben Hur" room still remains the same as when he pegged away within its historic walls, and the town still contains old-timers who discussed the characters in the novel as the noted author developed them for portrayal. All these enlivening particulars are recounted in tomorrow's (Sunday) Bulletin. Among other interesting features in the same issue are: Holiday tricks of shoplifters; the new fly that is going to save millions of dollars to California; a girl who demands a fortune for her love; machine that develops the highest degree of temperature ever attained; Peary's new ship that is expected to batter a way for him to the North Pole; Madame Bavarde's society chat; Frances Joliffe's interview with Hermann, and articles by Dorothy Dix, Grant Wallace, Lowell Otus Reece, John T. Waldorf and other well known writers.

His One Day Off

BY ROBERT MACE.

There was no question of George Hamilton's love for his wife. He was as passionately fond of her as the day of their marriage and theirs was a true love-match. He had been a gay bachelor, partial to wine and women, and up to the time of his meeting with Laura Swain, none of his friends ever thought him capable of settling down to a tame, domestic routine. He was essentially a man of the world, and his experiences with women had made him something of a cynic. He often said that the most fascinating and versatile of them took but a short time to play the repertoire of their allurements. He had never known one that did not bore in time.

But Laura Swain seemed different from any woman he had ever met. It is ever thus. The most blase of men is easily convinced that he has an affinity, especially when he gets into the thirties.

Hamilton had not the slightest difficulty in leaving the prime rose path for Laura. On his marriage day he declared that he had burned his bridges, and at no time in the succeeding two years did he once regret that their destruction had been complete.

Mrs. Hamilton was an ideal wife in the opinion of her husband; she was so innocent, and so free from the minor vices peculiar to her sex. She believed in marriage as she did in heaven and in the efficacy of prayer. Fiske was the most devoted of husbands, the most ardent of lovers. Never were two beings more happily mated.

One day as Hamilton was seated in his private office, a heavily veiled woman was ushered in and when his eyes met hers he recognized Blanche Merriam.

Of all the women in the world she was the one he least expected to see at that particular moment, and the one above all others he would rather not have seen. Yet he had once been very fond of her, and more attentive to her than the conveniences absolutely demanded. Just before his engagement to Laura Swain was announced he had a very unpleasant quarter of an hour with Blanche Merriam. They parted as friends however, and Blanche went her way with tears in her eyes. Hamilton had never heard of her whereabouts since his marriage, and he was consequently greatly surprised when she entered his office. He was also displeased, for it had always been his inexorable rule to conduct only business affairs during business hours.

"You do not appear pleased to see me," said Blanche. There was a pitifully hard mournfulness in her voice.

"Oh, yes I am," said Hamilton, affecting a tone of cordiality that sounded hollow. He approached her with a wan smile on his face and they shook hands. "But you know my rule about business hours," he said pleasantly. "However I am glad to see you, Blanche. You are looking fine."

Heeding not the compliment, she said: "I know about your rule, and I am not going to stay a minute. But I am anxious to have a chat with you, George, and came to arrange a meeting. What do you say to Marchoni's for lunch?"

The suggestion took Hamilton's breath away. He did not reply, but wrinkled his brow.

"Do you object to a little chat with me, George?" she asked with a pout, and there was a tear in her voice.

"Why no, Blanche but—" he began.

"Oh, I understand; you are married now, and there never was any real love between us." Her tone was reproachful and her eyes flashed. "It was all make-believe with you, George, but I thought you had a little tender feeling for me in your heart."

She burst into tears and sobbed hysterically, whereupon Hamilton became greatly excited. Such a scene in his office was more than he cared to have any of his clerks witness. In the circumstances he considered it discreet to overcome conscientious scruples, and though he felt that he was sinning against his wife, he put an arm affectionately round the shoulders of the weeping woman, and tried to soothe her with soft words.

"I know it was wrong for me to come here, George," she sobbed almost incoherently between the spasms of emotion that shook her frame, "but she does not love you as I do, and she should not begrudge me a harmless chat with you. I cannot go away George, unless you promise to see me just for a few minutes."

Hamilton was inclined to be firm, but the walls were thin and the sobs were loud. It was an awful dilemma. He did not like to treat coldly the woman with whom he had spent many pleasant hours, and yet his loyalty to his wife restrained him from making concession. On the other hand he was fearful of an office scandal. Quickly resolving the painful situation in his fevered mind, he came to a decision just as an hysterical outburst shook the clinging woman's frame.

"I'll meet you at Marchoni's at one," he said.

Blanche quickly dried her eyes and a few minutes later she left the office.

Promptly at one o'clock George Hamilton entered the elevator at Marchoni's and was hoisted to the third floor and ushered into a suite of rooms the atmosphere of which was sybaritic to the last degree.

Blanche greeted him on his entrance. She had removed her coat and hat, and evidently had powdered just a little and salved her rosy lips.

The beauty of outline and firmness of cultivated health were everywhere apparent. About her there was that perfect grooming that distinguishes certain women all over the world. Her hair shone like molten metal, her teeth dazzled with culture, and from her there emanated an evanescent perfume that only by suggestion defines its presence.

There was an indefinable charm about Blanche Merriam in combination with a piquant beauty that appeals to men. Her appearance that afternoon was reminiscent of other days that Hamilton had managed to forget, but after sitting down at the table, and casting his eye through the portieres that half concealed an apartment of inviting aspect, he felt for the first time since his marriage that the most effective way of resisting temptation is to avoid it.

Blanche talked of old times and asked him to forgive her for not having succeeded in crushing her love for him. She made him pour out champagne into a wide-lipped glass, and after she had sucked in the bubbling surface, insisted on his drinking where her lips had been.

He humored her even to the extent of putting his arm round her waist, but at that moment his thoughts were with his wife, and he felt ashamed of himself. However he managed to console himself with the reflection that he had done the best he could to extricate himself from an embarrassment, and he resolved that never again would he permit himself to be lured into such a compromising position.

As he glanced through the portieres again, he felt a sting of conscience.

He knew that he had sinned in thought against his innocent wife, and a feeling of revulsion came over him. He drew away from the woman.

"Blanche," he said somewhat sternly. "It is wrong for me to be here. This must be our last interview. Don't be angry, or think that I have forgotten the past, but I have turned over a new leaf."

An hysterical laugh greeted this outburst. "Then there is really one true and loyal husband in the world?" she said.

"Don't sneer, Blanche," he exclaimed. "I am not ashamed of being different from other men."

He arose to go.

"What beautiful devotion!" she said. "Well I have always heard that men of the world who have taken all the hurdles make the most devoted husbands!"

At that moment the waiter knocked lightly and entered.

"A lady to see mademoiselle," he said, "but I have not said that you are here. What shall I say?"

"Oh, I had forgotten," said Blanche, turning to Hamilton. "I told Maude that I would meet her here."

"But I do not want to be seen here," said Hamilton in alarm.

"Then step into the next room for a minute," said Blanche.

He did so and the waiter was told to show the lady in.

A moment later Mrs. Hamilton entered the room. "Are you the woman that sent for me to meet my husband here?" she asked in a tremulous voice.

"I am," was the reply, accompanied by a harsh laugh, and Blanche pointed through the portieres where Hamilton stood pale-faced and dumbfounded.

Mrs. Hamilton gave one glance at her husband and fell in a swoon to the floor.

The doctors said it was heart disease.

"Why do you call it a brilliant match?"

"Because it's a union of birth, breeding and boodle."

The Stage

"Caprice" is Still Young

It is many, many years since Mrs. Fiske, then Minnie Madern, appeared in "Caprice" at the Alcazar, and now the stock company of the theatre is producing the old play. "Caprice" is as good as ever. The story is that of a gentleman who woos and marries an ignorant country girl, whose pretty face attracts him. The effort of the country maid to adapt herself to her new environment, and her final success after many trials and tribulations, are well wrought out. The scenes are laid in the Adirondacks and New York, and the pastoral settings are very realistic, even to the cackling chickens in the farmyard. It is seldom that Harry Hilliard has been given a part so well in his line as that of Jack Henderson, the lover-husband, and Miss Lawrence is a delightful Mercy. The love scenes of Mercy and Jack are among the most charming bits in the play, which is beautifully balanced as to comedy and sentiment. A strong pathetic vein runs through the four acts, culminating in the reunion of Mercy and Jack. The comedy falls for the most part upon Maher, as Philander Potts, which role is most congenial to him. Conness has a mere caricature of a make-up as Jack's father, Osbourne, as the old farmer, Mercy's father, is artistic as usual.

The Good Central Stock

There is some magnificent scenery in the Russian play, "Lost in Siberia," at the Central. Since "Michael Strogoff" pioneered the way for playwrights in constructing Russian melodramas, there have been many good ones put upon the play market. "Siberia" was one of the best of them, and "In Darkest Russia" was almost as strong in its way as "Resurrection," the Tolstoy drama. "Lost in Siberia" is very much like the others, in that there is the usual prison and thrilling escape therefrom. The company plays its several parts with the precision and intensity that come from long practice. It would be hard to find a stock company that can do melodrama better than the Central players. Mayall, who still retains his love for Shakespearean creations in which he used to be seen, never slurs his melodramatic roles because of his higher ambition. He is all kinds of men in the Central plays. Once in awhile he gets a chance to do a fine part like D'Artagnan or Armand, but as a rule he has to be the kind of hero that rescues persecuted heroines from cruel villainy. It is to his credit that he puts his best talent into such parts, as if they were roles worthier of his art. Next to Mayall, Webster, Shumer and Howell are the best actors of the stock. The two last are usually villains, but to Webster, who is the stage manager, fall as varied characters as a stock leading lady has to play.

Her Inheritance

In "Humpty Dumpty" Maud Berri is appearing in tights, and one Eastern critic remarked thereof that "at last we see the real Maud Berri." This reminds me of the last time the Fresno prima donna appeared in California. Her father, Fulton Berry, was in a box at the Macdonough theatre, and someone remarked to him:

"How handsome Maud looks and how well she sings."

"Yes," drawled the veteran wit, "you know Maud inherited my voice and her mother's figure."

Those who have seen the long, lean form of the Fresno raisin-grower, and the shorter, chubbier one of his wife, will appreciate the pleasantry as applied to their statuesque daughter.

Henry Miller Disappointed

Though the critics of New York agreed with those of San Francisco as to the merits of "Joseph Entangled," the delightful little comedy did not catch the public fancy, and Mr. Miller left New York a sadly disappointed man. Two years ago I advised Mr. Miller to quit playing roles beneath his years, and I remarked that his loyalty to San Francisco was probably due to the fact that the theatregoers of this city were always ready to accept him in young lover roles whereas Broadway would not enthuse over him. This was news to many San Franciscans, who believed that he was a great Broadway favorite. He was in the long ago, but Broadway is fickle, and it demands that its young lovers shall look the part. Miller has blamed the coldness of Broadway on the critics, and last year he scolded them when they gayed his Armand. He said that they had hurt him in his pocket but they had not changed him in the determination to triumph in New York. So when the critics praised him in "Joseph Entangled," commended the comedy and approved the company, the issue was clearly drawn between the actor and the public. The result was not flattering to Mr. Miller's vanity. The big successes of the season in New York are John Drew in "The Duke of Killierankie," Dave Warfield in "The Music Master," Edna May in "The School Girl," Ade's "College Widow" and "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." There have been many wrecks in Broadway.

Gilmour in an American Role

I can well understand that "Mr. Potter of Texas" was a success in England. The title hero is just the type of American that our British cousins consider the real thing in Americans. He wears impossible clothes, has impossible manners, does impossible things, and is altogether the typical American of fiction. With all his faults of manner and dress, Mr. Potter of Texas is a character that appeals to the sympathy of an audience. He is so generous, so big-hearted, so ready to right wrongs, that he never fails to score. The character is admirably suited to the Majestic's leading man. Gilmour's make-up and characterization are the Gunter creation to the life. He acts the early scenes with much animation, and brings out with telling effect the parts of the play dealing with Potter's exposure of Lady Sarah Annerly's perfidy. Miss Gordon is the Lady Sarah of the cast, a part that is most congenial to her methods and manner, but she far from sounds the depths of this particular role. Miss Block's is not a personality suited to the breezy Western character of Ida Potter. It is in the men of the company that the real strength of the Majestic stock lies. There is not a bad actor among them, and they never fail to grasp their roles, even when the parts are comparatively insignificant. Mr. MacViears is a dignified Baron Lincoln. Mr. Mestayer as the Hon. Arthur, Mr. Gould as the Australian, Mr. Ingraham as Errol senior, Mr. Lambert as the New York anglomaniac, Mr. O'Hara as the harassed waiter, Mr. Woodward as the detective, Mr. Lloyd as the hotel proprietor, and Mr. Walker in the servant's little part, all do work that could scarcely be improved upon. Master Dennis wins many a laugh for his bright portrayal of the Hon. Teddy, the little English lad. And another actor who performs his part well is the fox terrier, a most knowing canine.

Paderewski Is Here

Paderewski's first concert of his trans-continental tour of 1904-05 will be given at the Alhambra this afternoon, at three o'clock. His second appearance will be made on Monday evening the nineteenth and his third and last appearance will occur on Wednesday evening, the twenty-first. There will be Paderewski concerts at the Macdonough, Oakland, on Friday afternoon, December twenty-third, Victory theatre, San Jose, on Thursday afternoon, December twenty-ninth; Barton Opera House, Fresno, Thursday evening, December twenty-eighth, and Los Angeles, December thirtieth. Paderewski's personality is extraordinary. Writers have exhausted comparisons in trying to portray him in words. Tall, thin, with strange, mysterious eyes that seem to shed no light, with prominent cheek-bones and an apologetic chin, with a marvelous nimbus of hair, with a beard that is feline in strength and grace, he excites curiosity, and begins to weave his spell before he strikes a chord. Ten years ago he began weaving in this country, and the spell is still unbroken.

Farland's Recital

The banjo became a new musical instrument to a large part of the audience who gathered together to hear Alfred Farland, the banjo virtuoso Tuesday night. It was an audience that Paderewski might have envied both as to its number and attentiveness. Mr. Farland played a varied program running from "Alice Where Art Thou" to selections from the Beethoven sonatas. The classic numbers were interpreted best, the light and shade of the different phrases being brought out with as much delicacy as on a violin. Many of the selections, especially the classic ones, were arranged by Mr. Farland, but I doubt if there will be many banjoists who will be able to master the intricacies of the more difficult numbers. Mrs. Alice Kellar-Fox, who is a pupil of Mr. Farland, assisted admirably. She played exceedingly well and was an excellent aid to Mr. Farland in the duets. She also sang in a pleasingly natural and informal way.

In The Limelight

Blanche Bates will have a new play next season, by Rudyard Kipling, entitled "The Woman Who Wouldn't."

Burton Holmes, the famous traveler, is meeting with greater success than ever in his present tour. His season here opens January tenth at Lyric hall.

Poor Nance O'Neil! She made the mistake of seeking the approbation of Boston before applying for that of Broadway. Boston gratified her, but Broadway turned her down.

Ethel Barrymore's friends are beginning to worry over her health. She has a cough which stubbornly clings to her. It is said to be the result of nervousness rather than of a serious bronchial derangement, but her friends are uneasy.

The Fischer comedians played a very short engagement in Pittsburg. The show petered out.

The annual Christmas edition of the Sunday Call which appears tomorrow, will be devoted to fiction, mainly from the pens of writers who are at present in California or who first made their name here. Many of the stories are the work of young California writers, while others are from the pens of writers more widely known. "The Madonna of the Tules," by Martha Tustin Patton of San Francisco, is the prize story for the week. Charles Tenny Jackson of Oakland has "The Masque of Jop"; A. D. McMillan of Nevada City writes a humorous yarn, "Doc Wilson's Christmas Pudding"; Madge Morris has "The Hold Up at Mirabel"; Katherine Jarboe contributes "The Oil of Blodgett's Farm," a human story of the California oil fields; John Strange Winter has "Three Inches of Snow"; Mrs. Burton Harrison, "The Last Christmas of the Confederacy," and Amelie Rives a touching little heart story, "Henny." Full page drawings are by John F. Woolrich, and R. W. Borough. In addition there are all of the regular features by Charles Dryden, Opie Reed, Anthony Hope, Nicholas Nemo, Robert W. Ritchie and Madge Moore.

THE WHITE HOUSE

Now that the infectious holiday spirit is exciting the red corpuscles of this community, all roads seem to lead to that model establishment, the "White House" in Kearny street, an institution, by the way, that is identified with the development of this city from the earliest period of its history. It is a house that in completeness of equipment, and in the character and variety of its goods, is not excelled in any city in this country. While its reputation is principally that of a dry goods establishment, it includes a department that is of especial interest at this season of the year—the department in which toys and mechanical devices that have a potent appeal to the young are exhibited. Almost every high-grade device in the toy field is to be found in this department, and many of the articles in the interesting exhibit have the virtue of rarity. It is a rare treat for the little ones to take them through this department with its wealth of mechanical contrivances many of which are of a most animated character. It is surprising to learn that the White House toys are to be had at a most reasonable figure. They are within the reach of everybody. The store throughout is inspiring to both old and young who contemplate exchanging holiday gifts. It contains a fine collection of artistic pieces of many kinds suitable for the ornamentation of parlors, halls, and libraries, including bronze-ware, porcelain vases and plaques, miniatures, lamps, clocks, cut-glass, and various articles in Dresden and Austrian ware. The White House is the exclusive agent for the Rookwood Pottery of Cincinnati, and has on hand a large variety of glazed and underglazed products. One can do all the necessary holiday purchasing within the four walls of this establishment. And though it is known as the most fashionable store in San Francisco, its prices are wonderfully reasonable. This is true of every department and is the keynote of the popularity of the house which is to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary on the thirtieth of next February.

For the connoisseurs in things beautiful there is no place in this city as perfect as the store of S. & G. Gump. The store this season seems more beautiful, if possible, than ever before. The walls of the art gallery are rich with new paintings, while the many floors are crowded with works of art and bric-a-brac. S. & G. Gump have their collectors abroad the entire year gathering art treasures for this store.

Goldstein & Co., the costumers of 733 Market street, are showing some beautiful designs in holiday costumes. They carry a complete outfit for all manner of private functions and public entertainments. They fit out completely, in costume, Xmas parties. They carry costumes for Santa Claus, Happy Hooligan, the Katzenjammer Kids, Alphonse and Gaston, etc. Goldstein & Co. have a reputation among theatrical people which extends throughout the country. They are considered among the best of official costumers.

In Financial Circles

The week's business makes a poor showing compared with transactions of some of the preceding weeks, especially regarding shares. Dealings aggregate $321,000 bonds and 6,404 shares, divided as follows: 1,050 Lighting, 890 Spring Valley Water, 1649 Miscellaneous, 115 bank shares and 2,700 Sugars. The demand for bonds has somewhat diminished. Savings banks are preparing to meet payments of interest to depositors as usual, at the close of the year. There is no change in S. F. Gas and Electric, none in Spring Valley Water. In the miscellaneous group Alaska Packers and Oceanic started on a nice little boom for themselves; in the case of the latter it was extremely short-lived. Alaska Packers, on vigorous support being given, the stock after selling down to 86 suddenly advanced fully ten points. The advance seemed to be too sudden and was followed by a decline of four points, closing strong at $12. The persistent buying orders for Oceanic, which I mentioned in last week's correspondence, culminated in a mercurial rise to $12, from which it quickly settled back to $4, closing at about $5. Quotations of sugar stocks were well maintained, though trading shows quite a falling off. Raw sugar scored another advance to 4 7-8 cents. Reports from the Islands continue encouraging.

Next Week's Bills

The Harry B. Smith and Gus Kerker spectacular musical comedy, "The Billionaire," at the Columbia, was the reigning attraction at Daly's, New York, for sixteen weeks last season. It is said to be absolutely novel in the musical comedy line. The supporting company of Thomas Q. Seabrooke will be one of the strongest ever seen here in musical farce. There will be a chorus of one hundred and the Klaw & Erlanger orchestra, under the direction of A. M. Langstaff, will be a special feature. "The Sultan of Sulu" comes next.

Sol Smith Russell's old success, "Peaceful Valley," will be at the Alcazar. For Christmas week, beginning with a special matinee Monday, December twenty-sixth, will be given "Lost River," a rustic play of very different fibre, by Joseph Arthur, whose "Blue Jeans" was so potent a holiday attraction last year. "Lost River" has never been played in San Francisco except by an indifferent traveling company, and the Alcazar will give its first stock presentation a fine cast and the most elaborate scenic equipment ever attempted on its stage.

The Majestic theatre will have "Jim Bludso" as its attraction. It is a play that has made a decided success in the East and it deserves attention from the fact that it is founded upon those three well known poems, "Little Breeches," "Jim Bludso" and "Banty Tim" by Hon. John Hay. The drama is by I. N. Morris, author of Nat Goodwin's latest hit, "The Usurper." During Christmas week Hoyt's "A Contented Woman" will be the attraction, with Richard Mansfield's great play "In Old Heidelberg" to follow.

"Two Little Waifs," Lincoln J. Carter's strong melodrama, will be on for one week at the Central. The story tells an uplifting tale, has a plot quite intricate and involved, and is replete with stirring melodramatic situations. The scenic settings and appointments are elaborate. The feature of the production is the work of the two children, who are by far the cleverest juvenile actors that will be seen here this season. The story is one of absorbing power, pathos and sentiment.

The usual matinee occurs on Saturday, and there will be extra holiday matinees on both Christmas and New Year's days, of "King Dodo," the big success of the Tivoli season.

Next is the farewell week of Williams and Walker at the Grand. Blanche Bates will open Monday night, December twenty-sixth, in Belasco's Japanese drama, "The Darling of the Gods." The seat sale for Miss Bates's engagement will begin next Thursday morning at nine o'clock.

Albertina Melich, direct from Europe, will make her first appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum with her flock of trained birds. Lucy and Viate, wire walkers, will give the performance that has electrified audiences across the pond. Aida Hemmi, a prima donna soprano of repute, will make her first San Francisco appearance, and Alfred A. Farland, the world's recognized exponent of the banjo, will make his first vaudeville appearance. The Orpheum Road Show is coming.

Beginning Sunday matinee, every afternoon and evening during the Christmas and New Year holidays, Bothwell Browne's musical extravaganza, "Princess Fan Tan," with a cast of three hundred juveniles, will be the attraction at the Chutes.

Automobile Topics

Reuben Shettler, who, with Ransom E. Olds, has organized a large automobile manufacturing company at Lansing, Michigan, to build runabout machines, has just returned to his home in Los Angeles. Mr. Shettler, in a recent interview with a representative of the Pacific Automobiling of Los Angeles, gave the information that there will be no Reo cars sold West of the Rocky Mountains before September, 1905, if as early as that. This statement coming from Mr. Shettler (vice-president of the company), will settle the matter so far as Pacific Coast dealers are concerned, and the public will be thankful for the truthful statement as to what the company will be able to do in the way of deliveries.

Advices have been received from the Winton factory that the 40 horse-power machines ordered by Chas. C. Moore, Captain E. E. Caine of Seattle, Fernando Nelson and J. H. Durst, will arrive here about the middle of January.

The Pioneer Automobile Company announces that its samples of the Oldsmobile delivery wagon and French type touring runabout arrived here last week and may be seen in their sales-rooms at any time. Every one is cordially invited to call and inspect these machines. The Pioneer Company is in receipt of a telegram from Charles B. Shanks, general sales manager of the Winton company, stating that under no circumstances will any of their agents be allowed to sell Winton touring cars for a bonus next year. This has been done heretofore by Winton agents, but will be strictly prohibited for the season of 1905.

Sherwood Aldrich, a prominent motorist of Colorado Springs, has been visiting San Francisco for a few days and is touring about the country in a Winton.

F. A. Lathe, of the Pioneer Automobile Company, has just returned from a trip to Napa, where he disposed of two Oldsmobile delivery wagons and one Oldsmobile French type touring runabout.

Walter Evans, of the Autocar Company of Ardmore, Pennsylvania, who has been here for several weeks, left on Sunday for Los Angeles, whence he will journey home. To say the Easterner is delighted with the conditions for automobiling out here would be putting it mildly. He is of the opinion that if our roads are improved this State will be the greatest in the country for horseless carriages.

Dr. J. Henry Barbat is going the rounds every day in his little Autocar runabout and is now convinced that the automobile is superior to the horse, especially for one of the medical profession.

The first long distance run made this winter was successfully completed last week by Charles D. Blaney of San Jose, who piloted a White car from this city to Los Angeles. "The five hundred mile journey was made in elegant shape," writes Mr. Blaney. The San Juan grade was climbed with perfect ease, the motorist making Del Monte the first day, without trying for any records. Before leaving Mr. Blaney's car, which is of the 1905 model, had been run something like seven hundred miles and the trip to the southern metropolis added another five hundred to its record. In all of the twelve hundred miles of travel not the slightest mishap did Mr. Blaney experience with the auto except that the dust cap of one of the front wheels came off on the run to Los Angeles.

After the recent climbing contest on Eagle Rock hill in the East, the officials, with some of the competitors and others, were the guests of Harlan W. Whipple at dinner, and there the most interesting feature of the occasion was the presentation to Wintthrop E. Scarritt of a White touring car, on behalf of the members of the Automobile Club of America, in token of their appreciation of his services while president of the club.

William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., recently purchased one of the latest model Whites, and says that for racing he will use his foreign cars, but for touring and pleasure purposes the American steam machine, in his opinion, is superior.

At a recent race meet at Waverly, New Jersey, a Thomas flyer won the ten mile free-for-all, beating all the best known machines. This car was a 1905 model.

Alexander Young, one of the most enthusiastic of the motorists in Honolulu, has ordered a 1905 model White touring car, which was shipped to the Islands last week. The arrival of the first of the new models is awaited with much interest.

Two carloads of White 1905 cars are being received and delivered every week on the Coast, and this will be increased to three carloads a week after the first of the year.

George H. Lent, who has been for some time in the East, noticed that the Packard car had nothing but friends there, and has ordered one of the new 1905 model N side entrance Packards to be delivered to him in San Francisco upon his return here some time in January. E. W. Hopkins has just returned from a trip East and says the new 1905 model N side entrance Packard has caused intense enthusiasm in automobile circles on account of its wonderful performances in all recent automobile endurance runs.

The Western Motor Car Company of Los Angeles and San Francisco has just received a telegram from the Thomas factory saying that in one day last week orders were received for forty-seven four-cylinder 40 horse-power side entrance touring cars.

Mr. Thomas, who is now in Paris attending the automobile show, reports that the demand on the continent for Thomas touring cars is far in excess of the factory's capacity to supply.

Not content with doing the largest renting business, the Auto Livery Company, one of the most prominent of the motor-car concerns in San Francisco, with headquarters in Market street near Eighth, Central Park, will after the first of the year handle the Peerless automobiles for the season of 1905. This concern has been in the auto game for some time and thoroughly understands it. It has been asked quite often why some one did not take the Peerless agency in San Francisco, and the move of the Auto Livery Company to handle the products of the Peerless Motor Car company next year is surely a wise move. The company will handle three models: The 24 h. p., 40 h. p., and the big 60 h. p. machine. The Peerless cars have achieved success on the track with Barney Oldfield driving the 50 h. p. Green Dragon and the successes of the Peerless touring cars have been equally conspicuous.

—The Chauffeur.

Melba has completed her preliminary tour with her concert company under the direction of Charles Ellis and is to join the company at the Metropolitan Opera House for four weeks under a special engagement made with Manager Conreid. Since her return to America in November Melba has appeared in a dozen concerts in the Eastern States and throughout this short tour she has been welcomed by audiences limited only by the capacity of the large auditoriums in which she has sung. Early in January she resumes her tour which will continue until the middle of March and extends far into the northwest and down the Pacific coast, and through the Southern States.

De Pachmann, the poet of the pianists, concertizes here in January.

Next Sunday go to Byron Springs. You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the Springs, and the entire expense of the trip is but $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from station to hotel and return, accommodation at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel and use of the wonderful mineral baths—all for $7.50. Try it.

The Profits of Authorship

It appears that the prize competition instituted by a firm of English publishers for authors who have not yet published a book has a condition attached. The prize winner will receive a hundred pounds, but the book must belong absolutely to the publishers, so the probabilities are that the budding geniuses will not flock in overwhelming numbers, for of course every writer expects every book to be a masterpiece, and masterpieces are worth more than a hundred pounds. And yet, viewed from a commercial standpoint, a hundred pounds is a very good return, far more than most books net and infinitely better than an unknown can count upon in royalties. The book which is adjudged to be the best of those entered will receive plenty of advertisement, and the author, if he have the stuff in him, will profit accordingly in the sale of subsequent novels, so that, all things considered, the offer is extremely liberal. Many a writer who has refused a small sum, say, one hundred or one hundred and fifty dollars down, for the copyright of his first book, but has held off for royalties, has found not only that returns were exceedingly slow, but that the expenses of publication and advertising have wiped out all the profits and even left him in debt. Once in a very long while a first book is a popular success and the royalties run up into the thousands, but as a rule when an author suddenly looms large in the foreground, and his book is listed among the best sellers, it begins to dawn upon readers that the name is by no means new but that they have been meeting it in magazine indexes for years. Sometimes the author of several successful books will collect his fugitive contributions into a volume which is eagerly bought by those who have been recently introduced, and then they discover that a large portion of the contents, if indeed not all, is made up of stories which were read appreciatively in periodicals without any note being made of their authorship. Writers seldom wake to find themselves famous unless they have worked hard for their fame. Occasionally we hear of fortunate ones who have never had a manuscript rejected, but the story is apt to be told by some one besides the one most concerned: Doubtless Mark Twain and Kipling and many others now have no need to enclose return postage, but there was a time when there was another story. Good work is never dashed off in a moment for the sake of a prize. The actual writing may take but a few minutes or hours but the subject has all been thought out in advance, subconsciously, perhaps, but there is no use in dropping a bucket down a dry well. Turning the windlass will not produce water.

Early Californian History

"Reminiscences of Across the Plains in 1846 and Early Days in California" is the lengthy title of a little volume compiled by Mrs. Luella Dickenson from the narrative of her husband, who left Missouri with his family when a lad of fifteen years and made the overland journey before the discovery of gold. Mrs. Dickenson evidently is not an experienced writer and her recital is often meagre and abrupt. She takes too much for granted on the part of her readers, and leaves the impression that she could tell much more. She probably is so familiar with the details that she forgets others have not had the same opportunities of enjoying the first-hand relation. However, let us be grateful for what she has given us. The Dickenson party, which reached California in safety, save for the inevitable losses of stock, Indian demonstrations, and deaths from disease, were road-mates of the unfortunate Donner and Reed party whose disasters have become history, and it was only the energy of Captain Dickenson, who insisted on traveling in spite of obstacles and weather, which saved them from a similar fate. There are some interesting descriptions of battles with the Mexican forces during that almost forgotten war, early stage travel between San Jose and San Francisco, Stockton before it was Stockton, and early day festivities. Mr. Dickenson had the honor of building the first house of burned bricks which was erected in California. He burned his own bricks, and the pioneer establishment still stands near the old Custom House in Monterey. He also erected the first hotel in Stockton, and was one of the earliest visitors to Yosemite Valley. The reminiscences of early settlers are especially interesting and the chief fault to be found with the author is that she has not told us more. The Pioneers are fast passing away, their descendants in the first generation are well on towards middle age, and before long the articles of household furniture which came across the plains in ox-teams, or around the Horn in clippers, will have approximately the same value as Mayflower relics, while later day history will be indebted to these casual reminiscences of the Argonauts and those who have heard their stories from their own lips, as we are now to Judge Sewell and other New England worthies for their diaries. The cover design of this little book—it is almost small enough to call a booklet—is particularly appropriate, the California poppy in gold and green on a royal purple background. #### Paul Elder's Holiday Productions

Some of the most original publications for the holidays are issued by Paul Elder and Company of this city. The oldtime Christmas card has no place in these, but the calendars and booklets and what might be called an evolved Christmas card are seen in great variety. No Eastern firm, I am sure, shows in its publications the extreme originality shown in these products of Paul Elder and Company's house. They are not put at prohibitive prices, either. For instance, there is a Christmas letter, that sells at fifty cents. It is a long parchment roll, a letter from Santa Claus, illustrated with funny little pictures. It is fastened with a seal, and comes in a neat little box. W. S. Wright is the author, and he evidently understands children. The Christmas Carol Calendar sells at one dollar, and is really worth three times that. Every page contains a Christmas carol, illustrated, and with illuminated letters. There are other things for the holidays issued by this firm that are the most charming Christmas remembrances possible to send to absent friends. The pretty "Flowers of Fate" that was issued in the spring is just as suitable for a memento of the holiday season as if it were just out.

A timely compilation of epigrams concerning women is that of G. F. Monkshood. These little booklets are in demand as souvenirs and favors and are rapidly ousting the florid Christmas, Easter and Birthday cards from the field. "Woman and Her Wits" is one of the most attractively gotten up of any that I have yet seen. It contains one hundred and seventy-five pages of aphorisms, grave and gay, kindly and cynical, selected from all the sources of supply. The print is excellent, the paper good, and the cover artistic, while for the contents there surely can be little, if anything more that could be added. It is a gift that will not be disdained by man or woman, and I would hint to harassed Christmas shoppers that they would do well to secure a copy on general principles. It was originally a London publication, and we are indebted to H. M. Caldwell of Boston and New York for the present edition.

—The Bookworm.

There's not a woman in the world who would not prefer diamonds to any other Christmas gift. #### CROWN JEWELS PAWNED BY MONARCHS.

It is a well known fact that rulers have been compelled to pawn the royal jewels in times of need to carry on affairs of state importance. The private citizen of today need not feel skeptical about doing likewise if necessary. A special department for this purpose exists at the Baldwin Jewelry Store, 906 Market street, where liberal advances can be obtained at banking rates.

The Wanrell Recital

The song recital of Signor G. S. Wanrell drew a good audience. The basso is well known from his long connection with the Tivoli, and has always been a footlight favorite. He has one of those big satisfying voices that one never grows tired of,—a true grand opera voice. The program was of unusual excellence, and embraced many operatic numbers not often heard on the concert stage. It goes without saying that Signor Wanrell's renditions were in the highest degree artistic. The audience demanded an encore for nearly every number, and the Signor was quite generous in response to its demands. Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup had several exacting numbers which she handled very well. Mrs. Northrup shows steady advance in her art. Miss Mignon Judson's voice is youthful and sympathetic and she is always a favorite with her audience. One of her best efforts was Signor Paolo La Villa's song, "Love is the Same." Rafael Meany did some lightning finger work in his two piano solos, the first movement of a Weber sonata (A flat) and Liszt's Twelfth Rhapsody. Signor Paolo La Villa accompanied the singers. The program in full was: "O Sacra Terra" (Vesperi Siciliani), Verdi, Sig. Wanrell; "Love is the Same," song (first time), La Villa, Miss Judson; Sonata (A flat) first movement, Weber, Mr. Meany; duet from "Lakme," Delibes, Mrs. Northrup and Miss Judson; Romanza (from "Simon Boccanegra"), Verdi, Sig. Wanrell; "Nay, Bid Me Not Resign" (Don Giovanni), Mozart, Mrs. Northrup and Sig. Wanrell; "Rhapsodie Hongroise" No. 12, Liszt, Mr. Meany; grand aria from Don Carlo, Verdi, Mrs. Northrup; Ballata from Pagliacci, Leoncavallo, Mrs. Northrup; "Vi Ravviso," (from Sonnambula), Bellini, Sig. Wanrell; "Love" (duet), Pin-suti, Miss Judson and Sig. Wanrell.

At the golden jubilee services of the First Baptist church of Oakland (1854-1904) the music rendered under Percy Dow's direction was of a very high order. Stainer's "Crucifixion" was rendered on the opening day, and on the closing Sabbath there were choruses from Spohr's "Last Judgment" and other interesting works. W. W. Ellis was the organist.

Mrs. Grace Davis Northrup left last Monday morning for the East, to take up special music study with the leading teachers of New York and Boston. She expects to attend the principal events of the musical season of those cities. Mrs. Northrup is away on leave of absence from her positions as solo soprano of the First Congregational church of Oakland and the Beth Israel Synagogue of this city.

Gadski's Concerts

The first of the great singers to visit us this season will be Madame Johanna Gadski, the soprano. This great artist has been here three times with the big opera companies and a few friends who have had the privilege of hearing her sing lieder predict a wonderful success for her in recitals. Her programs will be exceptionally interesting and her Saturday matinee program will be entirely Wagnerian. Gadski has just finished an engagement in Wagnerian roles at Munich and received the highest praise from Germany's best critics. Her concerts here will be given at the Alhambra under Will Greenbaum's management, Tuesday and Thursday nights and Saturday matinee, January third, fifth and seventh. Season tickets will be $4.50, $3.50 and $2.50, and will be ready Tuesday morning, December twenty-seventh. Single concerts will be $2.00, $1.50 and $1.00, and these will be ready Friday morning, December thirtieth. The box office will be at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. On Wednesday night, December twenty-eighth, Gadski will open the season of concerts to be given by the St. Francis Musical Art Society. The price for this special concert is $2.50 and seats are now on sale at the information bureau of the St. Francis hotel. The number of seats to be sold to the public for this affair is only one hundred, so early application should be made.

Una Fairweather went down to Los Angeles to sing the contralto part in the Apollo Club's rendition of the oratorio "The Messiah."

The Kopta Concert

A larger audience than usual attended the third concert of the Kopta Quartet on Sunday. Among those present were many of the most prominent of our local musicians. The Schumann string quartet op. 41 No. 1 led the program. Mr. Kopta and his associates gave this work with good effect, particularly the delicately-shaded adagio, which was played with fine feeling. The Leuchner adagio from opus 157 (first time), followed by the scherzo from Cherubini's quartet No. 1 constituted the second number. The first named is a suave and graceful movement; the second, in something of the gigue spirit, was played with neatness and precision. A piano quartet by Arensky, one of the younger Russian composers, was the novelty of the afternoon. One would have to hear this work more than once to decide upon its merits. The players hardly found themselves in the first movement, but gave full value to the broad and beautiful variations of the second movement. Mrs. Mansfeldt was admirable in the piano part. The work as a whole has no pronounced Slavic color, and leaves rather an indistinct impression upon the mind. At the next concert the Tchaikowsky piano quintet, which received such a remarkable rendition a few weeks ago, will be repeated.

The Fickenscher Recital

The recital given by the pupils of Mr. Arthur Fickenscher on December eighth attracted a large audience. The program began with the first movement of Mozart's concerto in D major, Suzanne Pasmore at the piano, quintet accompaniment by Lillian M. Spink, Mary Pasmore, H. B. Pasmore, Dorothy Pasmore and Louis I. Prevati. The number was given with true classical spirit. Suzanne Pasmore is an easy pianiste. She has repose, and her technique never becomes too obvious. Her solos later in the evening were Chaminade's concert study "Antoinette" and Moszkowski's "Etincelles." Miss Aldanita Wolf-skill contributed three vocal solos. She has a rich mellow contralto and at a later stage of her progress will no doubt invest the page's aria "Nobil Signor," with more of the archness and spirit it demands. J. C. Lacy has a good voice, full of natural feeling; all he needs is more confidence in himself. He deserves credit for his three numbers, Schubert's "Am Meer," Jensen's "Margareth" and Schumann's "Thou Art So Like a Flower." Miss Louise Smith was at her best in the aria from "Carmen." She sang it very beautifully, in sweet clear tones and with much feeling. Miss Jessie Burns gave a successful rendition of the Schubert-Taussig "Marche Militaire" and also sustained the brilliant piano part in the closing number, the first movement of Beethoven's E flat concerto, with Mr. Fickenscher at the second piano and quintet accompaniment. The movement was performed smoothly and in good time. Miss Daisy Fickenscher accompanied the vocalists.

A Naughty Rodent

An innocent mouse on the floor of the auditorium of Lyric hall created some consternation at the Fickenscher recital. Many of the ladies gathered up their skirts and sat on their feet, while some became so frightened that they left the hall. Others became affected with hysterical giggling which, however, they did their best to suppress. Altogether it was very amusing for those who are not affected by fear of the tiny animals.

Joan Baldwin's Recital

Besides a really wonderful technique Miss Joan Baldwin has many other qualifications that lead to success in her art. What she lacks will no doubt be added to her as time goes by. Her program of December the sixth was interesting throughout and consisted of works by four composers, Schumann, Albert Elkus, Chopin, and Liszt. Her Liszt group was the best, particularly the "Carnival of Pesh," played in a sure and brilliant style. It speaks well for Albert Elkus that his four compositions did not suffer by comparison with those of more famous composers. Miss Baldwin played them with delicacy and feeling. The two Chopin preludes and the two etudes are among that master's most difficult compositions. The sixteenth prelude is the boldest of the set, quite in contrast to the dreamy one in C sharp minor. So also is the nocturne-like C sharp minor, the "Winter Wind," with its great sweeps of tone. Miss Baldwin showed good mastery of both these works and their great technical difficulties.

NOTICE OF SALE.

OFFICE OF TAX COLLECTOR, CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Notice of sale of property of the State, pursuant to Section 3897 of the Political Code.

Whereas, On the 10th day of November, 1904, there was received by me and filed in my office a written authorization, under the hand and seal of the Controller of the State of California, which said authorization was and is in the words and figures following, to wit: Controller's Department, State of California—To the Tax Collector of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California:

Whereas, On various dates there were filed and recorded in the Controller's office of the State of California certain deeds conveying to the People of the State of California the title to those certain lots and parcels of land hereinafter described;

And whereas, Said deeds recite the fact that said property hereinafter described was struck off and sold to the People of the State of California for the non-payment of State and county taxes, penalties and costs, and all charges levied and assessed against the said property for the years 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897 and 1898;

And whereas, Five years have elapsed since the date of said sale, and no redemption, according to law, has been made of said property, or any part thereof;

Now, therefore, in pursuance of the laws in such cases made and provided, I, E. P. Colgan, Controller of the State of California, by virtue of the authority in me vested by the laws of this State, do by these presents authorize, empower and direct you, the said Tax Collector, to sell at public auction, in separate lots or parcels, the property hereinafter described, in the manner following: Public notice shall first be given of such sale by publication for at least three weeks in some newspaper published in the County, or City and County, or if there be no newspaper published therein, then by posting a notice in three conspicuous places in the County, or City and County, for the same period, which notices must state specifically the place of, and the day and hour of sale, and shall contain a description of the property to be sold, and shall also embody a copy of this authorization.

The property above referred to and hereby authorized to be sold is situate, lying and being in the County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit:

The Poem He'd Like to Forget

"Jim Bludso," the play never before given in San Francisco, is named after one of the three poems written by Secretary of State Hay, the others being "Banty Tim" and "Little Breeches." It is the third of these that won such popularity that when Mr. Hay was sent abroad as an Ambassador, the papers all referred to him as "the famous author of 'Little Breeches.'" Mr. Hay said to a friend then that he wished he had never written the poem. "I imagined myself a poet for just three weeks," he said, and his friend retorted: "In three weeks you gained immortality." But the Ambassador didn't agree with him. It is a long time since a copy of the poem has appeared in print. But I have a copy of it and at this time its reprint might be of interest:

LITTLE BREECHES.

I don't go much on religion,
I never ain't had no show;
But I've got a middlin' tight grip, sir,
On the hundred of things I know
I don't pan out on the prophets
And free-will, and that sort of thing,
But I b'lieve in God and the angels,
Ever sence one night last spring.

I came into town with some turnips,
And my little Gabe came along—
No four-year-old in the country
Could beat him for pretty and strong,
Peart and chipper and sassy.
Always ready to swear and fight—
And I'd larnt him to chew terbacker
Just to keep his milk teeth white.

The snow came down like a blanket
As I passed by Taggart's store,
I went for a jug of molasses,
And left the team at the door.
They scared at something and started,
I heard one little squall,
And hell-to-split over the prairie
Went team, Little Breeches, and all.

Hell-to-split over the prairie,
I was almost froze with skeer;
But we roused up some torches
And sarched for 'em far and near,
At last we struck hosses and waggon,
Snowed under a soft white mound,
Upsot, dead beat, but of little Gabe
No hide nor hair was found.

And here all hope s'ured on me
Of my fellow-critters' aid—
I jest flopped down on my marrow-bones
Crotch-deep in the snow, and prayed.
By this the torches was played out,
And me and Sam! Parr!
Went off for some wood to a sheep fold
That he said was somewhar thar.

We found it at last, and a little shed
Where they shut up the lambs at night,
We looked in and seen them huddled thar,
So warm, and sleepy, and white;
And thar sat Little Breeches and chipper,
As peart as ever you see,
"I want a chaw of terbacker,
And that's what's the matter of me."

How did he get thar? Angels!
He could never have walked in that storm,
They just scooped down and toted him
To whar it was safe and warm.
And I think that saving a little child,
And bringing him to his own,
Is a derned sight better business
Than loafing round the Throne.

MINNIE C. MILLS,
Plaintiff.

vs.

CHARLES E. MILLS,
Defendant.

D. E. MCKINLAY,
Plaintiff's Attorney.

The People of the State of California send greeting to:

CHARLES E. MILLS, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful neglect, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

GIVEN under my hand and Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 30th day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four.

MAY HARVEY ELY,
vs.
FRANCIS H. B. ELY,
Plaintiff.
Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the Complaint filed in said County in the office of the Clerk of the said Superior Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to:
FRANCIS H. B. ELY, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the Complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, upon the ground of Defendant's willful desertion of Plaintiff for the period of more than one year continuously, next immediately preceding the date of the commencement of this action, and also upon the ground of Defendant's failure to provide for Plaintiff the common necessities of life he having the ability so to do, for the period of more than one year continuously next preceding the date of the commencement of this action; also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the Complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the Complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to appear and answer the said Complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

GIVEN under my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 7th day of October in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four.

Plaintiff.

vs.

JOHN V. VREDENBERGH,
HENRY H. HULL and JOHN DOE ARNAIZ, also all other persons unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint, adverse to the Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto,
Defendants.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

GOODFELLOW & EELLS,
Attorneys for Plaintiff.

The People of the State of California send greeting to:

JOHN V. VREDENBERGH, HENRY H. HULL and JOHN DOE
ARNAIZ, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint, adverse to the Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto, Defendants.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in the action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff, in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after service upon you of this summons, if served within said City and County; if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to so appear and answer, the Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Said action is brought to quiet Plaintiff's title and to determine all adverse claims of any of the defendants in and to that certain parcel of land situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which is bounded and described as follows, to-wit:—

Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Greenwich street distant thereon 272.265 feet easterly from the easterly line of Gough street, and running thence easterly and along said southerly line of Greenwich street to a point distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet and six (6) inches westerly from the westerly line of Franklin street; thence at a right angle southerly, parallel with said westerly line of Franklin street, to the intersection of the northeasterly line of the northwest quarter (1/4) of Lot No. Four (4) of the Laguna Survey; thence northwesterly along said line of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4) to the northerly corner of the northwest quarter (1/4) of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4); thence northeasterly to the point of commencement.

Being a part of Western Addition Block No. 115, and being also a part of the northeast quarter (1/4) of said Lot No. Four (4) of the Laguna Survey.

WITNESS my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of October, in the year 1904.

JOHN J. GREIF, Clerk.

CHRISTMAS REFLECTIONS

BY THEODORE BONNET

Not satisfied that the pleasing Santa Claus myth is nowadays dispelled in the mind of the up-to-date child, at an earlier age than that at which the children of a few generations ago were taken into the secret, the smug Pharisee demands that the delicious fiction be no longer associated with the Christmas festival. This ruthless iconoclast is a stickler for truth. With a tendency atavistic he is impelled by a puritanical sentiment to revive the rigid morals of an earlier Christianity, at a time when we should be rejoicing that the Christ of the fierce Old Theology no longer haunts us. It is because we are not now oppressed with a false sense of the philosophy of life or of the ethics founded on Christian principles that we are able to enter into the spirit of the feast without a sneaking horror of the Christ of Calvinism and of the Puritan Fathers, the Christ who was indirectly responsible for the stake and the rack and the Blue Laws of New England. The Pharisee who thinks that the Santa Claus fiction is destructive of morals has too many of the corpuscles that predominated in the blood of those exponents of the old, cruel theology who never did enjoy Christmas. Theirs were strange conceptions of the sweet-tempered Gentleman of Nazareth and of His teachings.

Instead of affecting an ultra-rectitudinous air at this season, and worrying ourselves over the improbable effect of mild and joy-giving deception on the immature mind, let us apply Christmas sentiment and Christmas thought to matters of live interest. To celebrate this feast aright we should cast pride and hypocrisy out of our heart, and scorn a sanctimonious air.

The Christmas spirit is the spirit that should move us to tender sympathy with our fellow men, and to a self-confession of shortcomings that makes for a realization of our sameness with those whom we are fatuously pleased to regard as our moral and social inferiors. It is not a time to sermonize dolorously or to seek to restrict the joys of those little ones whom Christ loved. Christmas is the feast of childhood, and poor indeed is the child who is not gladdened by the glorious anniversary. Far from merry is the Christmas of those children whom Santa Claus has neglected. Christ be praised! say I, for the genuinely childish children animated by an abiding faith in the mythical saint, for they are as the breath of heaven in their sweetness. From them we of mature years may learn of the blessings of faith, and the joys of that simple life of which Christ was the propagandist, and which is now being ardently advocated by statesmen, sociologists and ministers of God. This, by the way, is the time for us to revert to the simplicities of life that are emphasized in the feast of the Babe in the Manger. His was the simple spirit of brotherliness. The severe simplicity of His life is full of the pathos of human existence; the son of a carpenter, born in obscurity, he preached naught but sacrifices, urged renunciation of earthly pomp, pleasure and power, and preferred the slave to the master, the poor to the rich. Christ was the first to preach the charms and beauties of the simple life, and breathing naught but the love of God and man, He brought the world to revere a cross while holding up suffering humanity and persecuted virtue as objects of veneration to mankind.

How far more pleasant as a place of residence would this mundane sphere be if a little of that spirit which animated Him who never spoke in scorn of others, and was never wrathful save against those who defiled the temple in their greed of gold, were spread through all our years to chasten us and make us better men and better citizens of our country. How unfortunate it is that so little heed is paid to those simple life precepts with which the Savior triumphed over the religion of the Cæsars! How mordant is the irony of this "Merry Christmas" of a mercenary age to those who by reason of their poverty are bowed down by a melancholy accentuated by the contrast of their misery and others' joy! The almighty dollar, symbolic of all that was most despised by the Founder of Christianity, exercises a tremendous influence at this time of year. If the dollar is yours, why then you are merry: if you have it not, the heaviness of your heart is oppressive. The joys of Yuletide are no illusion with some but to many they are the mockery of their dreams. Eat, drink and be merry is not a sentiment that finds quick response among those who are harnessed to the wheel of duty with sorrow dragging at their heels. Despite the infectiousness of the Christmas spirit it is hard for them to let loose the bonds of weariness and fling off the habiliments of their woes. A more universal appreciation of the full significance of the festival is a consummation sincerely to be wished, for then there would be less occasion to complain of the intimacy between joy and despair at Yuletide. Meanwhile we may content ourselves with preaching the cultivation of an altruistic attitude toward our fellows, and contemptuous of the Pharisee, continue to illude the little ones, hoping that they at least will take Christmas as it should be, entering into the festivities with merry heart and eager enjoyment.

RUTH ALLEN

A very striking type of Californian beauty is afforded in Ruth Allen, whose artistic work at the Alcazar ranges from the fine emotional quality shown in "The Prisoner of Zenda" to the broad humor of the Cockney maid in "The Christian". Miss Allen has brains as well as beauty, and the combination is somewhat unusual.

Xavier Martinez—An Appreciation

BY PORTER GARNETT.

In the appraisal of creative works, whatever may be the medium of expression, there are two general methods of treatment, two grand avenues of approach, two points of view. Whether the thing considered be art, literature or music, the measure of judgment must be based either upon a purely æsthetic standard, or upon its appeal to popular approval. The choice of view is ever inherent in the work itself, which either arrogantly demands the higher criticism or timidly begs for a mercy of lesser ideals. In the painting of Xavier Martinez the mandate is unmistakable. It is unequivocally for the stricter appreciation—the severer test. He scorns to be popular even in his flippant moods and lighter essays, while in his more serious work he always displays an exalted sincerity.

Martinez is a modern: but to be called a Modern is to be indicted as a Decadent. Yet, in painting, the rebellion against classic standards is by no means a thing of recent times. It is a far cry from Mozart to Richard Strauss, from Praxiteles to Rodin, from Milton to Arthur Symonds, and we may question seriously if music, sculpture and poetry have been advantaged by these decrements from classic ideals. In painting, however, we must first determine what constitutes the classic standard before we discuss its impairment. This is rather fortunate than otherwise,

I take it. We have no knowledge of the painting of the Greeks. Apelles is no more than a tradition. The very diversity of the "Old Masters" inhibits the establishment of a pure type of excellence. Shall the measure be Da Vinci, Michelangelo, Raphael? or shall we look to the impeccable Greuse, or to David, the neo-Hellenic? Yet we must oppose to these the great Velasquez himself, the most modern of passed masters. And after him Goya and Fortuny, Spaniards, too, and revolutionists as independent of "classical" influence as Manet or Whistler or De Chavannes or Segantini. Martinez is not a master—yet; but in the achievements and potentialities of this young Mexican, striving for his ideals with the sincerity of the true poet, may we not trace an atavism, a racial heritage from Valasques, Goya and Fortuny, these three monumental figures in the artistic civilization of Spain and of the world?

Martinez is an Individualist. His idiom is ultramodern, even anarchistic. It is daring, but never baroque except by intent. It is strong with the strength of boldness and depth, but it cannot be called vigorous because it is always tempered with sentiment, with poetic reserve. Indeed the poetic quality is detectable in all of Martinez's serious canvases. Low in key and subtle in value, they express in tone and color what Verlaine expresses in the nuances of his musical verbiage, that charm of sheer beauty of sound which must ever be the despair of the poets in our grosser tongue. Artists like Martinez achieve in tone that which Verlaine and De Regnier achieve in euphony.

Martinez is never literal. His interpretations of Nature present Nature plus his individuality—I had almost said genius. His expression, to use a phrase of Alfred Austin in defining Poetry, is "the imaginative transfiguration" of what he sees and feels.

His paintings, made in Paris, where he studied in the Atelier Gerome, and even his sketches of the same period, are inevitably interesting in the charm of their color and quality of their tone. His composition is always adroit; his brushwork—his technique, governed always by the high demands of pure impressionism, is dexterous and intelligent. It is not surprising, therefore, that his work should have been, as it was, admired by masters like Whistler and Carrier. His notes and caricatures have deftness and esprit. They are always more than merely clever. He appears in them as a poet at play. But it is, after all, his "high seriousness" that we must reckon with; that phase of his work that is instinct with the Desire of Beauty; his feeling, his imagination, his poetry. With these qualities Martinez has done much and it is safe to predict that he will do more.

OUR OPINION

Every year, as the holiday season approaches, we are treated to the same old discussion of the morality of Santa Claus and the propriety of making gifts. The agitation affects especially those Sunday-schools connected with mission chapels where the children are too apt to be in need of warm clothing, proper food and other physical comforts, and it would seem as if the sums donated toward dressing Christmas trees and providing penny trumpets might be expended with greater discretion. It is also urged that children are induced to become attendants solely for the things they expect to get, and that some of the more clever among them manage to be enrolled at several schools at once. The ministers and teachers complain that parents attempt to make bargains with them, asking what they will receive in return for sending their offspring to the Episcopal, the Methodist or some other denominational class, and that they weigh judicially the comparative merits of blankets, warm underwear, a Christmas dinner and a ton of coal. Again, it is argued that the children have their jealousies aroused by seeing that those in better social position receive more and costlier gifts, and that the poorer they are the less regard is had for them by supernatural powers. In all this there is much truth. Children are born egotistical little animals, and they need so much watchful care in their earlier, helpless years that it is a matter of course for them to expect much for small return. That they will manifest a sudden and surprising interest in their souls' welfare is no greater mark of depravity in the winter, when Santa Claus is supposed to be watching their conduct, than it is that they attend Sunday-school in the spring when the annual picnic is under discussion. It is the fault of the religious bodies themselves, quite as much as it is that of those with whom they come into contact, that the loaves and fishes play so large a part in filling their pews. It is an undeniable fact that for years a system of proselytizing was carried on in the large cities, charitable ladies visiting the poor districts and offering inducements in the way of employment, food, clothing and other preferments, not for the benefit of the neglected waifs who received no religious instruction at all, but for the "brands plucked from the burning"—the little "Papists" and Jews who could be induced to change their religion. An evil may be incubated in one generation, but it will require at least two to stamp it out. As to the jealousies of children, they are inevitable. And as to the morality of Santa Claus, there is less to worry about in that connection than adults can be brought to see. Most of those who are concerned about the truth or advisability of the myth had their own season of credulity. Let them ask themselves whether they were any the worse for it. There are few children of normal intelligence above the age of eight who have not at least grave doubts. They are fairly well able to canvass the probabilities and to draw their own conclusions, but they would rather believe it, just as the little girls like to make-believe that dollie is alive and conscious, or the little boys to lose sight of proportion and play with their railroad trains, dragging them hither and thither by a string, whistling and ringing bells and going through the whole performance in the delightful make-believe that it all "goes itself." As to the matter of an impersonation of Santa Claus, dressed in the conventional garb and appearing among the children to distribute gifts, that is another matter altogether. It is more than doubtful if anything has been gained by the practice. At best it is a foolish and inadequate bit of acting which deceives nobody and only brings the good saint into contempt among the irreverent youngsters, some of whom are sure to penetrate the disguise. Moreover, it is an extremely dangerous piece of folly. Scarcely a year but what there is some disaster growing directly out of the buffoonery of Santa Claus, who, in wig and whiskers of tow, and inflammable cotton batting and flimsy garments, dances too near a lighted candle. The spirit of Christmas should not be interpreted to mean foolish and indiscriminate giving nor ostentatious display. It is natural to manifest our affection for children by making gifts, but at the same time it is both possible and obviously necessary to teach them not to be always looking forward to material accumulations. They can early be told the reasons why Christmas is celebrated, and why St. Nicholas is regarded as the patron saint of children, as well as the day of the martyrdom of the Holy Innocents, all of which are factors in making the winter solstice peculiarly the season for the children's holiday. As to the problem of substituting a purely religious observance of Christmas instead of the purely secular one, that has its amusing side. For years it was the supreme effort of the reformed churches to cast Christmas out of religion. Every device of ecclesiastical and civil law was brought to bear in the matter, and punishment even to the extent of excommunication was meted out to the recalcitrants who would not perform their heaviest labors and eat their most sparing meals on that day. Now, behold, instead of rejoicing at a religion without Christmas, there is lamentation over a Christmas without religion.

The Accusation Against Wittman

Judge Fritz has once more complained that the police are trifling with justice. The charge that Judge Fritz makes and reiterates is one that Chief Wittman has never satisfactorily answered. It is an accusation against the integrity of that official, and the ignoring of it by the Police Commission implies collusion between that body and the executive officer of the department. The gist of the matter is that Wittman acquiesces in the commission of crime, but seeks to deceive the public and Grand Juries by arresting the criminals without obtaining evidence at hand, thereby rendering impossible the conviction of the culprits. The charge implies conspiracy between the Chief of Police and a lawless element in this community, a conspiracy to which Town Talk has pointed on more than one occasion. Police Judge Fritz is a man whose integrity is beyond question, and he has had such experience with the police department as to justify the opinion that he knows whereof he speaks. He thoroughly appreciates the gravity of the charge that he has made, a charge that was uttered by him months ago when he discovered that the police were arresting people without essential evidence which he knew could be procured and which he offered to procure in company with any police officer. His expose of the deception at that time was commented on in Town Talk, but neither the Police Commissioners nor the Mayor took cognizance of the matter. The Chief of Police, however, took good care to keep out of Judge Fritz's court thereafter with the cases of the offenders who were being arrested by way of proof of police vigilance. In the circumstances it seems quite clear that there is either collusion between the Chief of Police, the Police Commissioners and the Mayor, or inexcusable indifference to public welfare on the part of those officials who are responsible for the Chief's faithful performance of duty.

Some Absurd Rumors

If Chief of Police Wittman is in collusion with any set of criminals in this city his removal from office becomes a matter of urgent necessity. If he is in collusion with one set what assurance may we have that he is not in collusion with all classes of law-breakers? Judge Fritz has charged him with having protected gamblers and brothel keepers, and it has been demonstrated that the lawless element of Chinatown enjoys police protection. Chief Wittman indignantly denies that he is responsible for a wide-open Chinatown or that he participates in the graft incident to Chinese lawlessness, but in view of his failure to enforce the laws against crime, and of the apparent immunity enjoyed by criminals, we feel that nothing short of stupendous ignorance could gladden his heart with the expectation of public confidence. There have been rumors that Abe Ruef and Mayor Schmitz contemplated the removal of Chief Wittman, but we believe they are without foundation. We believe that Chief Wittman is the type of man that appeals to the admiration of the Mayor and his thrifty factotum. We believe that they would find it difficult to replace him with a man better equipped morally and mentally for the administration of Police Department affairs to their satisfaction. We are of the opinion that Chief Wittman will continue to administer the affairs of that department unless the Grand Jury investigates the charges made by Judge Fritz, and calls upon the Police Commissioners to explain their suspicious complaisance.

Deception Charged

It is to be hoped that those zealous members of the Bar Association who are animated by a desire to sustain the dignity and honor of the legal profession will take cognizance of the deception alleged to have been practiced the other day by Mr. George Collins. According to Judge Fritz Mr. Collins informed him that Judge Sloss had requested that certain Chinese cases pending in the Police Court be postponed a few days. Judge Fritz communicated with Judge Sloss and learned that the conversation recounted by Attorney Collins had not taken place. Therefore Judge Fritz forfeited the bail of Mr. Collins's clients. Mr. Collins was recently tried by the Bar Association on charges of unprofessional conduct preferred by members of the profession with whom he had a quarrel. He pleaded that the complainants were moved by prejudices engendered in the heat of legal controversy, and it did seem as though he was prosecuted with a good deal of acrimony. However, the Bar Association decided to present him to the Supreme Court for disbarment. He has been practicing law ever since, and now we are told that in the interest of his Chinese clients he has been guilty of misrepresentation to a court. This is one of the most serious offenses to be charged against an attorney. Lawyers are sworn officers of the court, and they are presumed to enjoy the confidence of the court. A lawyer that has no hesitation in abusing that confidence is an exceedingly dangerous individual. Judge Fritz may have misunderstood the representations made by Attorney Collins, but the matter is of sufficient importance to arouse the Bar Association and incite its zealous members to inquiry. If there has been some mistake the public should not be permitted to have the impression that to deceive the court is one of the inalienable rights of members of the bar.

A Pneumonia Cure

And now comes a French physician who says that he has discovered a sure cure for pneumonia. Science is playing havoc with the bacilli of dread diseases, but oddly enough the death rate continues brisk. Experience teaches that medicines and prophylactics are not half so efficacious in prolonging life as a hungry attention to sanitary rules. However, new remedies for old diseases are always welcome, and it is to be hoped that the French physician is not bidding for fame with counterfeit capital after the manner of many of his profession. He says he has used with success weak silver solutions administered hypodermically. The preparation is not a chemical salt nor a compound from silver, but is composed of finely-divided particles of the silver itself, called colloidal silver. An injection of one per cent solution of this preparation under the skin causes a quick drop of temperature and the convalescence of all patients upon whom it was tried. The remedy acts as a germicide, and is also supposed to be efficacious in typhoid, erysipelas and other bacterial diseases. Pneumonia has long been recognized as a disease for which there was no prophylactic or cure, and to stay the ravages of which the physician could only fortify the patient's powers of resistance. It is therefore one of the most serious diseases, and the report of the discovery of an infallible cure will no doubt arouse the interest of the medical world.

Phelan's Boom

Mr. Grant Wallace, war correspondent, artist and philosopher, has been having a fine time hitting the bull's eye of municipal corruption in the shooting gallery of criticism. He is writing the chapter omitted by Lincoln Steffens, in that interesting serial story, "The Shame of Cities," and at the same time, naively and ingenuously inflating the perennial boom of that immaculate statesman, Mr. James D. Phelan. The indictment of the Schmitz-rueffian maladministration is a work of supererogation, but Mr. Wallace doesn't like the moss to grow on his literary club which, by the way, he handles more skilfully than he does the hot-air pump. In the interest of Mr. Phelan it should be urged that he be not kept persistently in the public eye. If he is to be run for Mayor he should be sprung at the eleventh hour. Panegyrics bore in time, and they do not subserve their purpose if they lead to controversy and end in apology. Mr. Phelan is an honest man in the sense of his being beyond the influence of graft, and his moral training has been such that in all probability he would be honest if poor. But he is not the great statesman that his friends would have us believe. He inflicted the charter on this city, meaning well, no doubt, but erring egregiously. The charter made Schmitz graft possible. Its most sacred and alluring provisions were those dealing with civil service and Mr. Phelan violated them ruthlessly for the upbuilding of his political machine. He was responsible for Wittman. He appointed a Police Commission at the instance of a newspaper editor for the purpose of making a friend of the editor Chief of Police, and then when justly censured by the Bulletin he went back on his friend. Mr. Phelan appealed to the labor vote by appointing P. H. McCarthy, a carpenter, a member of the Civil Service Commission. He appealed to the Jewish vote by appointing to the Election Commission a brother of Rabbi Voorsanger who was accused by a Grand Jury of criminal misconduct. He gave us a Board of Public Works that spent all the money in sight in salaries. He appointed Joe Howell a member of the Police Commission, and the latter has publicly announced that San Francisco was more of a wide-open town under Phelan than it is under Schmitz. However Mr. Phelan accomplished a great deal of good, but he could have accomplished a great deal more if he had been loyal to the people's interests and less mindful of his own. We believe that he deeply deplores the mistakes that he made, and that he longs for another opportunity to merit public esteem.

Lawson And His Critics

It is wise to take with a grain of allowance anything that you read in the newspapers these days about Mr. Tom Lawson of Boston. He is and will continue to be for some time the victim of gross misrepresentation. Every newspaper open to subsidies from the people whose infamous practices he is exposing, and every newspaper and magazine publisher whose envy has been aroused by the enormous growth of Everybody's, will deal in misrepresentation and sneers at the expense of the Boston millionaire. If Lawson is a faker, as his enemies would have us believe; if his attack on the pirates of Wall street was inspired by the hope of facilitating the manipulation of the stock market for his own aggrandizement and profit, then he is a monumental fool, and we do not believe that such is the opinion of the exponents of frenzied finance. Throughout his career Lawson's salient characteristics were courage, independence, stubbornness and sincerity. He has never posed as the incarnation of all the virtues, but he has always dealt squarely with his business associates, and though a lover of the limelight he has never betrayed the shallowness of the mountebank. He has frequently exhibited a sympathetic mind of the kind that exults in the happiness of others. If his was a scarred past his enemies would long ago have held it up to the scorn of the people. He says that he is inspired partly by revenge, a passion that was aroused when the Rockefellers robbed those whom he had advised to invest in Amalgamated Copper. But he denies that revenge is his only motive. He says that he wishes to reform the financial system that sanctions the predaceous practices of the financial magnates. He has certainly shown that it is an infamous system, and the people are indebted to him for the light that he has shed into those mysterious recesses of Wall street where millions are made by resolution.

Dress Reform in Germany

The dress reform associations of this country are taking a deep interest in the anti-corset crusade now being waged in Germany. A woman's society in Berlin composed of some very influential matrons has petitioned the Minister of Education to issue a peremptory order forbidding the wearing of corsets in girls' schools. The Minister is clothed with autocratic power, and if he chooses to exercise it he can compel the abandonment of the corset forthwith in every institution in Germany devoted to the instruction of young women. There is consequently much alarm among mothers who know the importance of corsets, and they have brought tremendous pressure to bear on the advocates of reform, but have not received any encouragement. The anti-corset matrons have reached the age at which corsets are valueless in preventing the spread of anatomical lines and they have turned a deaf ear to the entreaties of the mothers.

An Outrageous Project

Certain politicians with a Federal pull have projected a scheme for relinquishing to the National Government the management of the Yosemite Park, the pride and glory of the State. The Examiner is justly indignant and in stentorian tones summons the Native Sons and Pioneers to repel the attack of the politicians, and defend the magnificent park from the rapacious marauders who threaten to despoil the State of the glory of ownership. The proposition of the politicians is an outrageous one. It is also cowardly for well do they know that gallant Jack Wilson, Yosemite Park Commissioner, is now far away in the jungles of Paris. What would the Yosemite be without a Jack Wilson to guard it from predatory tourists, and careless campers? Scat! you scheming politicians that would dare publish to the world that California is so lacking in civic pride as to neglect the management of the magnificent park, discovered by the pioneers and left by them as a heritage to their sons and daughters. Would Uncle Sam, if he ever assumed the management, go to the expense of illuminating the park with incandescent lights, as Jack Wilson wanted to do?

The Awakening of Suy Chung

BY LUELLA GREEN HARTON.

Suy Chung was the flower of Chinatown. She was only sixteen, and the fine glow on her cheeks, like a full-blown hot-house carnation, and the even riper red of her lips, were not due alone to the paint which all Chinese women wear, but to a natural color which made the false hardly an exaggeration. The rouging of Suy Chung was as unnecessary as the sweetening of sugar. Unlike the stolid women of her race, she was as effervescent as champagne. Sparkle and bubble were in her eyes and on her lips, and gurgled in every motion, from the jingling of her ear-rings and bangles to the impatient tapping of her tiny embroidered shoes, which gave out music to the time of her light steps, for the soles were rimmed with silver and set with precious stones. She was aglitter from her feet up to the gold combs, jeweled with rubies and emeralds and topaz, that held in sleek precision her well-stiffened black hair. Her gown, which extended only to the knees and there revealed loose silk pantaloons, was a marvel of needle work. On it wonderful cranes stood on one leg or stalked solemnly after marvelous bright-hued butterflies.

With all her finery and graceful lightness, Suy Chung was only a slave girl. In her light-hearted way, all jingle and glitter, she had one day wandered into the Christian mission. A woman, not pretty, but one that seemed to Suy Chung like a sober cooing dove, had told her a story about a God, who long ago had become a little baby and had grown up, and been crucified because he loved mankind, and he had to do that to save them.

Suy Chung's teeth gleamed in her radiant smile, and her laughter chimed with the tinkling of her ear-rings and bracelets.

"Dear, dear, the white man's God was very foolish!" The women who accompanied her turned with her, clapping their hands in imitation of her gesture, and tapping their loose-heeled slippers on the uncarpeted floor as they passed out.

Now the bright gown was laid over a chair and the little shoes were under it, very still, as though bemoaning the absence of restless feet.

Something new was lighting and searching the depths within Suy Chung. She was lying on a mattressless bench-like affair of carved teak. Its four legs were monster dragons with flaring tails and open mouths, and her pillow a block curved to fit the neck. A wrinkled yellow nurse hovered over her, and the air was heavy with the burning of punks. All of the Chinese devils had been banished, and the gods were being invoked by a mumbling saffron priest, whose wizened form seemed all clothes, and whose countenance was like a withered potato with black-head eyes.

Gee Kim, Suy Chung's master, entered, and looked at the girl with the interest that a racing man might display in a fine colt, and tossed the obsequious, kneeling priest a gold piece. The priest caught it in long, lean fingers which sickened fevered and fanciful Suy Chung, they were so clutching. He appeared more like a grasping fiend. Grasping for what? The newly born perhaps.

"Send him away," she pleaded.

The wrinkled, yellow nurse, not much more human looking than the priest, protested. But Gee Kim, who was imbued with much of the white man's unfear of the supernatural, told him to begone.

The priest backed out with vicious eyes on the girl, and his breath exhaled sulphurous fumes which mixed readily with the other abundant odors. But Suy Chung detected it and it made her more afraid. She buried her head under the padded silk quilt, covered with reptiles and flying things. Through her poor little brain, which was not used to thinking, ran the memory of the God who had become a humble baby. He, the teacher said, loved all races and was an eternal fountain of love and kindness. His hands were full of mercy and commiseration, and he never closed them, but allowed the gifts, which were constantly renewed, to pour off without ceasing.

Her master went out. The wrinkled yellow nurse and the girl were alone when the feeble cries of Suy Chung's first born thrilled her like delicious music. It unlocked the gates of heaven, and all the joys of maternity fell out. The frivolous, soulless girl in Suy Chung crept away in the darkness, abashed. A woman floated in an ether of completeness, of rare and celestial delight, as she felt baby lips drawing a new life from her heart.

Gee Kim returned with the soft movements of the Chinese, as noiseless as that of disembodied spirits. With a laugh that made not even a grimace on her face and was the sound of crackling parchment, the nurse took the baby from the mother and held it out. With Gee Kim was a wealthy heathen, known among the whites as Big Jim. He was fat and flabby, and wickedness glinted from the narrow slits from which peered his eyes, opaque and green as jade. In Chinese the woman said:

"It's a girl." There was contempt in the tone.

"That's good," grunted Big Jim, and poked the little red mite with a long-nailed finger as though to feel how fat it was.

"Weigh her," he said to Gee Kim. "I will give you her weight in gold and pay for her keep till she is nine years old."

"We will wait till she has grown a little. She will weigh more then," responded Gee Kim shrewdly.

The little mother's arms yearned to her child, and the little one made a slight sound of contentment as it was placed in them. Suy Chung cuddled it close and turned her face to the wall. The man departed. Suy Chung listened till their footsteps became fainter and fainter and then were lost.

She knew nothing about right and wrong. To murder was bad, and that was her whole vocabulary of wickedness. Something new was stirring within her, it was the instinctive purity of womanhood, aroused by motherhood. She had never consciously done wrong, but the small reproduction of herself must be different from her. The God of the white people had become a baby himself. Perhaps on that account He could understand better than a god who had never been a baby.

The wrinkled yellow nurse, seeing that all was well, pattered away. The thumping of her slippers told of her upward progress, for Suy Chung's chamber was stories underground. When the last footfall had died away, Suy Chung got on her tottering little feet, slipped on the gorgeous clothes, and with the baby in her arms began the dreary ascent. Evil-smelling lamps flickered and made bright spots surrounded by deep shadows, so it was easy to hide from the few who passed. At last the fresh air was reached. She was invigorated, and her tiny feet had large wings as she sped to the mission, to Miss Barrett, who had told her of the God who had taken the form of a baby and had even died for human beings — for all human beings.

It was late and the mission was locked. With hands strengthened by despair she shook the doors. They groaned and creaked, but no living presence answered. Far down the street a light glimmered in front of the white man's Joss house. She had peeped in one day for fun, and had seen a man in splendid garments, making obeisance before a Joss and flinging to and fro a smoking thing fastened to a gold chain. Perhaps the priest had prayed to the Joss who had been a baby. She would seek him; he would tell her where to find Miss Barrett.

Suy Chung felt that her strength was going. She had hot flashes when all the street lamps nodded to one another and whirled about and the earth under her feet came up in hills. All the time she kept telling herself that she must be careful not to be seen, and she jumped like a cat from shadow to shadow, sometimes crouching, sometimes stiffening against a wall. Her bosom was exposed to the cold night air; it was a furnace by which she could keep the baby warm.

The doors of the white man's Joss house were unlocked. She staggered in. Only one light, a solitary red eye, burned. She could see the shadowy forms of gods standing about. She went forward. Her eyes, which, like a bat's, were used to underground and dark places, made out the figure of a woman with a baby clasped in her arms. She gave a little cry under her breath. Never had she expected anything so wonderful. Among the gods there was a woman, a mother! Suy Chung's heart was bursting with the joyous revelation. She sat on a step in front of the woman. She knew nothing of prayer, but she whispered, first in pidgin English and then as she became more ardent lapsing into her own language. She told the woman of all the wonderful thoughts that had been born with her baby. What if the other was a god! She was a mother, and all mothers speak the same language.

She grew very cold. For herself she did not care; she was concerned only for the wonderful little life to which she had given light.

When she felt the warmth of her breast giving out, she became frightened for the little one, and crept inside the railing that had separated her from the woman, and fell at her feet, begging that fire be sent. A delirium came, and in it all of the church was her home, and the little red light grew and spread till gradually it filled the whole place. The woman came from her pedestal and they showed their babies to each other, and chattered over the joys and anxieties of motherhood.

In the morning when the priest came to say Mass, he heard an infantile voice, not feeble cries, but lusty, healthy ones. He followed the sound. It led him to the statue of the Blessed Virgin.

A heap of rich silk embroidered with gorgeous butterflies was on the floor. Two wee feet in dainty slippers were very still. From under the rich silk came the noise, and something made the embroidered butterflies flutter. He uncovered a baby, which in awful anger sank its flat nose and ugly face into the unyielding breast and kicked and cried out its protest against placid, imperturbable fate.

Peter's Present

'Twas the night before Christmas in kingdom come,
The saints were in bed and their harps were all dumb,
Their halos turned out to economize gas
And their stockings hung up on the gateway of brass.

Said Peter, "I'll just run around for a minute
To look at my stocking and see what is in it;
The good little angels are all fast asleep
And none will know I have taken a peep."

And lo and behold, in the morning light dim
His stocking, apparently full to the brim!
He took it down quickly, and there if you please
Was a little toy rooster that crows as you squeeze.

As the saint hurried off in undignified haste,
He was overheard muttering, "Confounded bad taste"—
And somehow the story got round the next day;
Now Pete doesn't hang up his stockings they say.

The Itinerant Preacher

BY THEODORE BONNET.

The men in the lumber mill at Rainbow had been paid off the day before Christmas, and the usual number of spendthrifts drifted into the little town of Sisson that nestles close to the base of snow-capped Shasta. The main attraction at Sisson was the stud-horse poker games that are always in full blast there immediately after payday at any of the lumber mills operated in the vicinity. It had been snowing in the Sierras that day, and Sisson was deeply carpeted in white. The main thoroughfare was slushy, and the board-walk running in front of the single row of stores and saloons was thronged with people who shunned the muck of the street. Most of them were men from the lumber mills, rude, rough persons very much of the character of the men that predominate in mining camps. They are men of little ambition and with no serious thought of the morrow. When they have money in their pockets, it is an incentive to idleness, and when it is spent they go back to work until they earn enough to justify another holiday.

The society of such men is always attractive to professional gamblers, and for a small town Sisson includes among its citizens quite a large number of that nimble-fingered fraternity. They were not among the throng that moved along the village promenade that gloomy December afternoon, for the hour was late, and the music of the clicking poker chips could be heard in a few of the saloons.

It was just before sundown when the attention of the throng was attracted by a queer-looking personage who was trudging through the snow from the direction of the railroad track. His peculiar, swinging gait was not recognized by any of the men on the board-walk, and as no train had passed through for several hours they wondered whence he had come through the storm. When he reached the board-walk he glanced neither to the right nor to the left, but seemingly oblivious to the gaping yokels, rustics and hardy mountaineers, he strode through the swinging doors of a saloon at the end of the street. It was with considerable momentum that he collided with the counter, rousing the bar-tender from a reverie. The mixologist seemed to be scared out of his senses as he beheld what seemed to him a weird apparition. The stranger was indeed a queer figure. He was over six feet in height, of massive though agile frame, exceedingly quick of movement, pale, furrowed, with reddish hair and an ugly, fascinating face. His broad shoulders stooped a little, but his muscular frame was suggestive of the powerful athlete. His forehead was abnormal in breadth, the space of his intellectual faculties was vast and beautifully developed, and bushy eyebrows overhung deep-set eyes, the irritable flashes of which told the story of a restless soul.

When he spoke his voice was mellow and his tone affable.

"A little whisky if you please," he said to the bar-keeper.

The latter quickly reached for a bottle, and placed it on the counter alongside a glass.

The stranger eyed the bottle a few moments and muttered something as though he were addressing it. At the same time his fascinatingly ugly face was distorted as though he were in great pain.

"Never mind the whisky," he said, never taking his eye off the bottle; "give me a glass of ginger ale."

"That's good whisky," said the barkeeper, who inferred that the stranger was suspicious of the quality of the goods.

"No whisky is good, young man, except for medicinal purposes, and I'm not an invalid."

The bar-keeper smiled and put out a glass of ginger ale, which the stranger gulped. Then he sauntered into the adjoining room that opened into the bar and stood by the stove, and peered out from under the broad brim of his slouch hat at the men engaged in the stud-horse poker game.

A group of men were watching the game, and all turned to survey the queer-looking figure at the stove. A few were inclined to laugh, but there was something in the ugly, melancholy and stern face that restrained them.

It was not a face to be laughed at with impunity.

Presently, after the warm fire had dried his damp clothing, the stranger sauntered over to the table.

"I am a minister of God," he began in a commanding tone, and the players turned with one accord and waited. "I have come a long way through the snow to find shelter here, and it has just occurred to me that this is Christmas Eve; that tomorrow will be celebrated the birth of Him who came on earth to scatter the seeds of grace, to uplift the lowly, to teach men the blessings of charity and to impress upon them that they who are without charity have become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. I find—"

"Say, young feller," said Sandy McNaught, the expugilist who was presiding over the game in the interest of the house, "I think you've made a mistake. This ain't no church, and we ain't any Sunday class."

"No I'm not laboring under a delusion," said the preacher; "this is an ordinary cheap gambling hell, and it has become a stinking savour in the nostrils of the Lord. But I'm not here to revile, though I find that there are sheep here in the midst of wolves."

Several of the group standing round the table began to laugh, but their mirth was quickly suppressed.

The big athlete's face was distorted in a frown, and his piercing eyes burnt into the flesh of the scoffers.

Sandy McNaught threw down his cards angrily, and started from his chair as though intent on resorting to aggressive measures.

Half way out of his seat he felt the heavy hand of the preacher on his shoulder, and an irresistible force put him back into the chair with such violence that the whole building trembled. So quickly had that powerful hand shot out, and with such little effort had the stranger forced the gambler back into his seat, that Sandy was dumb-founded with surprise and those who observed the incident looked at the tall, broad-shouldered personage in mingled amazement and admiration.

McNaught was acknowledged the strongest and most pugnacious man in Sisson, and it was quite apparent that the stranger was his master.

"If I have to make my meaning more clear by doing a little scrapping in this place, I shall regret it very much. That was my game at college, but I haven't had any practice since becoming a clergyman."

There was no reply from the ex-pugilist.

"Now the suggestion I have to make is this: that we adjourn this game to the town hall and have a Christmas tree festival for about an hour. There must be some poor people in this hamlet and their hearts should be cheered on Christmas Eve. Grace be unto you that gladden the hearts of the needy. Give and it shall be given to you. Do you know of nobody in need of cheer and comfort this Christmas Eve?"

"The widow Folsom and her six children," said a voice near the stove.

"Who is the widow Folsom?" asked the preacher.

"Her husband was killed in the saw-mill at McCloud a year ago, and she supports her children by taking in washing."

"Then," said the preacher, "let's give them a helping hand. Go into the stores, and buy presents for the children, toys if there are any, and things to wear, and get flour and bacon and potatoes for the widow, and bring them to the town hall, and escort me down there, and I'll preach a sermon for you."

Never before was the power of personal magnetism so clearly demonstrated. Those rough foresters, mill-men and gamblers, who had not been in church for years, who scoffed at parsons and cared naught for the Word of God, were brought under the spell of that weird-looking individual as though they had been enchanted. Some of them applauded when he finished his appeal, and all spoke words of approval, at the same time breaking for the door. The proprietor of the saloon joined them, saying that he owned the town hall and would escort the preacher there.

Out under the stars the man stood with bared head, and without warning his deep baritone, sweet and resonant, and with an art that revealed high cultivation, pealed forth like a tuneful bell:

Raise me Jesus to Thy bosom, from this world of sin and woes, Let me feel Thine arms around me, then my soul may know repose.

I am weary with my burden, and I come to Thee for rest;
Kneeling at Thy feet I pray Thee, lift me, Jesus, to Thy breast.

The people in front of the saloon stood spellbound, and when the singer finished, all joined in the procession that followed him to the town hall. Arriving there the preacher mounted the platform, and watched the people entering. They poured into the hall—those rough men of the mountain forests—and in a little while every seat was taken, and a hush fell upon the assemblage. Soon that odd-visaged stranger began his address, and from the first word that fell from his lips until the end, there was absolute quiet in the audience. It was no ordinary sermon that he preached. It was in the nature of a heart-to-heart talk, but he spoke with all the dignity which becomes an ambassador of Christ, and with a manly sincerity and eloquence that went straight to the heart and emotions of his audience. He first spoke of the appearance of the Redeemer of Mankind on earth. He told of the new star in the East, of the chorus of blessed spirits singing at night from on high, "Glory! to God, peace to men of good will!" and then he spoke of the Saviour's coming into the world not in purple, but in the humble abode of indigence. Briefly he sketched the life of the Messiah, and then he told the tale of his own life, a life blighted by folly, by sin, by a passion that seemed an irresistible hereditary impulse, but to which he had given reign when he should have been mortifying the flesh. He bared his soul to that audience, and painted a picture of mental anguish that filled every eye with tears. It was a pathetic tale full of phrases that made the blood of those hardy mountain men tingle in their veins. Then he painted the moral, and told of the sweet consolation that came from the charity that he had always practiced. As he rounded the last period there came through the door a man bearing a large basket full of toys. He was followed by a man bearing a sack of flour on his shoulder and a string of others freighted with various provisions.

The preacher then announced that he would pass the hat for the widow Folsom, which he did, and it was soon heavy with silver. Then with his friend the saloon-keeper he led the provision-bearers to the widow Folsom's humble cot, and the mistress of that modest abode was the most surprised and glad-hearted person in the world when she learned why she had been roused from slumber.

The errand of mercy at an end the people soon dispersed to their homes, and the preacher went back to the saloon. His nerves seemed all unstrung after his noble efforts of the evening, and he fell into a chair and called for a glass of whisky. It was given him and he gulped it down. He called for another and his eyes glittered as he poured it down.

Turning to the saloon-keeper he said, "As Paul wrestled with the beasts at Ephesus, so have I wrestled with the demon in my blood. I have prayed for succor but in vain. The sins of the father are visited upon his children. Forgive me Father, for I have sinned."

* * * * *

On Christmas morning the bell of the little church in Sisson rang out the old, old tune of "Peace on earth, good will to men," but the preacher who brought joy to the heart of the widow Folsom heard it not. Yet he was within a stone's throw of the sacred edifice. He had found the peace that endures in the warm embrace of the snow. His hands clutched an empty flask.

Reflections on Society

The year drawing to a close has been a very calm, quiet and satisfying one in Society. It has been a delightful year for the debutante, and for the young woman now in her second year, for the young man fresh from college and the hobbledehoy scions of the new-rich. The puppets of fashion have danced a merry measure, and the faded matrons of many winter campaigns and the fat dowagers have strenuously kept in the forefront even at midnight rout and feast, greeting the dim, gray dawn with wrinkles that defy cosmetics and massage. San Francisco society has been trying hard to iron out the tell-tale creases of provincialism, and it has made some headway as a result of the journeyings to foreign parts of some of our younger matrons and sensible belles who took pains to profit by close observation. But there is still a large benighted element in our fashionable herd. Snobbery is far more conspicuous than genius or taste. Possession of wealth is a pre-requisite to any standing among the gilded elite. Affected savoir faire is as acceptable as the innate article, and there are few able to distinguish the artificial from the counterfeit. Society is still an agglomeration of those who give and receive entertainment. But it is becoming more blase and unconventional. A circumstance significant of an awakening was the interest taken in the Sequoia Club, an institution which affords the fashionable opportunity to affect appreciation of culture and indulge pretension. The club is in good hands and may succeed in weeding out the pedants and snobs, and encouraging the intellectual in and out of society.

Effect of Newspaper Gossip

The daily papers have been responsible for much of the social activity of the year. They have been giving more space than ever to the doings of the high social push, thereby inciting people to win publicity. The papers are pretty well stuffed with flattering paragraphs anent the fetes and movements of those they term the best. They are of great assistance to the climbers, and lend generous encouragement to blatant show and arrogant display. From perusal of the columns of the dailies it appears that society is expanding at a terrific pace; but the dailies are not reliable in such matters. However society is getting new blood, though seeking it not. This is a small community in which self-interest dictates, at times, that social intercourse should be permitted to grow out of commercial relations. Hence it sometimes seems that we are in the dawn of a spirit of democracy; that the former morals of this person or that have nothing to do with the question of eligibility, and that past history is a bore.

Society's Evolution

And apropos of past history, I am reminded that the element that predominates in San Francisco's elite of today is composed of people who were obscurities in the middle class of this same community of a quarter of a century ago. There has been a great change in the personnel of San Francisco's society in a quarter of a century. Some of the social lights in early San Francisco history have suffered financial eclipse that put them out of the glimmering, and others hold themselves aloof through a silly sense of superiority. It is interesting to turn back the pages of San Francisco social history, and glance over the names of those that were formerly in the limelight. Where are the belles and buds of yesteryear? How many of our contemporary elite attended the wedding of Miss Cecilia Coleman and Dr. Fred May, of Baltimore, at St. Mary's Cathedral in the early eighties? Lilly Rosecrans, Edith Blanding and Florence Atherton were the bridesmaids, and Carleton Coleman, David Beck, Edward Greenway, Arthur Page and John Twiggs were the ushers. How many of the hostesses of today were there? Then there was the wedding of Minnie Donahue and John Parrott Jr., at which Isabel, Grace and Daisy Parrott, Fanny Doyle, May O'Connor and Daisy Casserly were the bridesmaids; also, the wedding of Edith Blanding and Carleton Coleman, when Harry Tevis was best man; also, the wedding of Bessie Slade and W. Mayo Newhall, with Flora Low, Nettie Tubbs, Kate Felton, Hattie Crocker, Lucia Kittle and Kate Bancroft as bridesmaids; also, the wedding of Colonel Fred Crocker and Jennie Easton; also, of Flora Sharon and Sir Thomas Hesketh; also, of Isabel Parrott and Douglass Dick. How many of the fashionable herd of today were invited to any of those weddings? The personnel of the high social push has indeed been metamorphosed.

Dull But Decorous

But society in San Francisco is in process of readjustment, and if the late arrivals have the cash with which to entertain and splurge there is no reason why they should be sneered at. Our pioneer society had no traditions to preen itself on and it had no family pride to boast. It was a half-baked aristocracy out of a quick oven. We are not old enough to have a society of hereditary refinement, and being aware of that fact it is to smile at the ludicrous pretensions of those of our quality who are trying to ape the Vere de Vere repose. However, our little smart set gives promise of assuming an individuality in time. Though it is somewhat dull it is also decorous and has a horror of divorce suits. It does not devote all its leisure time to frivolity, having come to regard the bearing of children as a polite pastime, and though the kind of success that is symbolized by the dollar sign is the shibboleth of the day in Eastern centres, we of San Francisco are beginning to pay homage to moral and intellectual achievement. Perhaps in time our fashionables will not appraise so highly as they do now the importance of extravagance. Educated out of the vulgarity and emptiness of blatant display they will be immune to shocks of the nature of the one inflicted by Mrs. Peter Martin when she rebuked them for holding up their trains in the dance and betraying too deep regard for their chiffons.

Cupid And His Snare

Cupid did some brave shooting this year. The army gained several brides, and civil life its contingent. A few of Cupid's darts did not stay where they fell, or at least the puncture soon healed. Ruth McNutt broke her engagement with Lieutenant Lee. Elena Robinson broke hers with Martin Kay. Susie Blanding was betrothed to Knox Maddox, only to call it off a short time later. Pearl Landers' engagement with young Whittell was announced but theirs was an ephemeral heart affair. The engagement of Gertrude Dutton and "Joe" Howell stands, and that of Bessie Mills and "Charlie" Tripler. The latter couple will have to wait awhile, that's all, until they are a year or two older.

Festivities of a Week

In the opening of the new year society will devote itself to Terpsichore. The first ball will be given by Miss Helen Chesebrough at her home. Miss Chesebrough was one of last year's buds and she was the first one to entertain the Gaiety Club. On the fourth the William G. Irwins will throw open their new ball-room to society. The ball-room, like that of the J. D. Spreckelses, is in the basement of the big stone mansion. The affair is to be in honor of Charlotte Wilson, Anita Harvey and Margaret Hyde-Smith. Helene Irwin, who has not yet made her debut, will be permitted to get another glimpse of society on that evening. She is one of the members of the Saturday Night Club, and at the last ball, I am told, led the cotillion very cleverly. She expects to make her debut in two years. On the fifth of January Ned Greenway will entertain in honor of the Gaiety Club. I am told that his list for the affair will determine more or less who's who in the younger set. The ball will take place at the Palace, and is to be quite a splurge. The decorations are to surpass anything heretofore attempted. On the sixth the John I. Sabins will give a ball for their debutante daughter in the ball-room of their big wooden house out in California street. Irene Sabin has become almost as popular, I hear, as her sister Pearl, since her coming out a few weeks ago. It will be remarkable if the girls who attend all these balls together, with all the day-time entertainments, are not wrecks before the close of the first week in January.

Another One Bored

Pearl Landers is the latest belle to confess that she is bored by society. This is no joke. Neither is it believed to be an affectation. Her friends say that she has wearied of the stupid monotony, and has developed a fondness for the companionship of artists and writers. No girl was ever made so much of by society as was Pearl Landers, a circumstance due to her pretty wit and her magnetic personality. But two seasons of strenuous fashionable society life have dulled the edge of her appetite and now she is finding diversion in the ultra-bohemian set, in which, by the bye, she is as keenly sought after as she was by the Quality. But society thinks that she is foolish because she is minimizing her chances of making a brilliant match.

Next Assembly Dance

The next Assembly dance will be held on the evening of the twenty-seventh. Mrs. Malcolm Henry, who had a great deal to do with the management of the dances, fell ill a few days before the first one was given, and is still confined to the house, much to every one's disappointment. One of the bavardes, I see, refers to Mrs. Henry as "the attractive little invalid." Any one who has seen Mrs. Henry will know how well this description fits her.

"Why is old Croesus looking so sad today?"

"He cannot think of anything to give his friends for Christmas that money won't buy."

An Embarrassing Situation

"Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation," said Christ, when the Pharisees asserted that it was not He but Beelzebub who had cast out the devils. Of which I have been reminded by the complications that have arisen in the Republican Organization. The Organization was never before in such a flourishing condition or so well safeguarded from enemies without. It has triumphed over all its enemies, and its leaders have been feeling as secure as did Nabonadius of Babylon before Cyrus crossed the Tigris. But the organization is rapidly becoming divided against itself and there appears to be trouble ahead. It includes so many ambitious men that it is impossible to supply loaves for all of them. Though Prescott is now the Organization choice for Speaker of the Assembly, as I predicted he would be long before any of the dailies thought of him as a possibility, neither Walsh nor Stanton has withdrawn, and both are Organization men. In the Senatorial fight there are two Organization men—Knight and Flint—and the former told me the other day that if a program was formulated against him there would be trouble; and it is not prudent to rile the man that seconded the nomination of both McKinley and Roosevelt. It would not be so difficult perhaps to conciliate Frank Flint, but the situation is such that it would not be safe to crowd him out of the fight; there would be danger of his votes being switched to Bard, and that anaemic statesman is to be beaten at all hazards.

Bard's "Latent" Strength

As there are several programmers who have absolutely committed themselves either to Knight or to Flint, and as there are many who think that Bard has "latent" strength of yellowish tinge, the situation is far from being satisfactory to the Organization. Bard has not yet indicated a disposition to summon that "latent" strength, but he is doing a great deal of claiming. If he had any personal following he would be a very dangerous man, but nearly all his votes are those of men who have been instructed for him, and who are eager for a pretext to break away. His newest ally is United States District Attorney Woodworth, who has come to the conclusion that his reappointment will be opposed by the Organization, and therefore that it behooves him to tie up with the uitlanders. Woodworth is without any following, but Bard thinks that he might corral a few votes with the aid of Congressman McKinlay of the Woodworth camp. But McKinlay isn't eager to mix up in factional fights. He was swept into Congress by the Roosevelt tidal wave, which will not be a factor at the next election. His late antagonist, Congressman Bell, is already doing missionary work in the McKinlay district, and to wise politicians it is apparent that the Congressman-elect cannot afford to fight the Organization. If he is wise he will profit by the experience of Frank Coombs, who was thought to have a cinch on that district, but who foolishly mixed up in the gubernatorial fight, sympathizing as he did with Tom Flint, and the result was the speedy sidetracking of "Gloomy Gus."

The Views of Shortridge

That quaint philosopher and candid statesman, Charley Shortridge, is becoming quite uneasy over the complications in the Senatorial contest. He presumes that, as usual, he will comply with the dictates of the Organization, but he is earnestly hoping that he will not be called on to vote for an unworthy person. His first choice is Arthur Fisk, but he will gladly vote for George Knight, believing that the latter is in every way equipped for the high office. He draws the line at Bard, as a mere millionaire, a pointless political joke, and he declines to take Frank Flint seriously. Flint, according to Shortridge, was a Democrat four years ago, and he is not yet sufficiently familiar with Republican doctrine to qualify for Senatorial honors.

Bob—What did your sweetheart give you for Christmas?

Jack—Well, I have not quite made up my mind on the subject. At first I thought it was a muffler, and then it occurred to me that perhaps it was a handkerchief case, but now I'm inclined to the opinion that it is a tobacco pouch.

By Whom Publicity Is Abhorred

Some of our society people who are always in the newspaper spotlight are to be heard occasionally deploring the publicity to which they are exposed every time they do anything. They pretend that it grieves them to see their names in print every day, but their pretensions are not sincere. They would have no trouble in keeping out of print if they so desired. I have noticed that very few of the functions given in honor of those two exclusive debutantes, Dorothy Eells and Natalie Coffin, are written up by the dailies. Yet they have been entertained a great deal in the set which is composed largely of their relatives, and which includes the Kittles, the Thurstons, the Livermores and the Babcocks. I believe those are about the only people in society who really do not care for newspaper notoriety.

The Progressive Laws

The Laws—Herbert E. and Dr. Hartland Law—are the only members of the Adornment Association of San Francisco who have taken to the practice of what they preach. They have done much toward the adornment of this city, and they are going to do a great deal more. It was Dr. Hartland Law who remodeled the Crossley building into one of the handsomest structures in town, and Herbert E. Law was the builder of the beautiful Rialto building. One of the brothers contemplates the erection of a handsome hotel in Pine street, and Herbert Law has had plans drawn for a big building in Market street to be called the Monadnock, which for architectural beauty will surpass anything on the coast. The construction of this building will be superintended by L. B. Dutton, who was selected by Architect Burnham of Chicago, and who is considered by the latter the most expert builder in the country. He has had a great deal to do with the outlining of the building.

"Don't you think," asked Mrs. Swelle of the decorator who was arranging the greenery in her drawing-room for her Christmas dinner-dance, "that you are making a mistake in hanging the mistletoe so low? You know all the buds this season are so tall."

"I know that, madame," answered the man, "but did you not notice the dancing men this year are all very short?"

A Californian Girl's Match

I hear that it was when Lieutenant von Breden was an attache at the German Embassy at Washington that he met Frances Newlands, who was a debutante and exceedingly pretty. She is a dashing and fearless horsewoman, and that sport is the favorite exercise of the doughty lieutenant with the noble name, so what wonder that they met under circumstances that permitted them to become well acquainted? Miss Newlands was a constant attendant on the hunts out at famous Chevy Chase, where she did some very daring riding. She is a niece of Mr. and Mrs. William S. Sharon, of Piedmont, and was with them for some months last summer.

I hear that Lawrence Scott is very ill from pulmonary trouble, and that he is confined to the house on account of his delicate health. Jim Follis is also said to be a sufferer from the same malady.

A Convict Author

Mrs. Maybrick has written a book with a double purpose: (1) To tell the American people that she was unjustly convicted upon an accusation of murdering her husband by poison; (2) To make some money. Mrs. Maybrick is getting tiresome—she is a serial story that fails to hold the interest of the reader. She has been too long under the spot light. Her book is superfluous so far as it may have any bearing on her case but she will probably put money in the purse of her publisher, filched from the pockets of credulous women and vindictive grass widows. If Mrs. Botkin were an Englishwoman and if a lot of sentimental fools in England had finally harried the Prison Directors of California into paroling her on condition that she leave the State, the two cases would exactly parallel, for, undoubtedly, Mrs. Botkin would write a book with a double purpose: (1) To tell the English people that she was unjustly convicted of murder by poison; (2) To make some money.

"And what did you find in your stocking?" asked the professor of the clever young co-ed.

"Nothing," she sighed, "but a big, big hole."

Their Purpose Is Noble

I have long been puzzled to explain for my own satisfaction the raison d'être, as the Chaperon or Madame Bavarde would say, of the Sequoia Club. Originally I thought it was something in relation to the forestry interests of the State—it certainly sounds that way; then I imagined it might be a social organization after the manner of the Laurel Leaf Club or the Sugar Pine Debating Society. When people band together under some designation culled from the vegetable kingdom they are open to all sorts of accusations. I have ascertained after diligent inquiry that the Sequoia is definitely committed to a nobler purpose than the preservation of our forests or mere sociability. The basic idea of the founders was to promote closer communion among these men and women who feel that they are gifted with the artistic temperament—workers in the literary, graphic, plastic and musical crafts, in conjunction with those who have the ability to appreciate that sort of thing without the ability or training for its practical and profitable application. It was the intention of the organizers and charter members to cross the purposes of the Century, the Papyrus, the Forum, the Bohemian, and the University Clubs, hoping to evolve a Burbank product—something in the genera of clubs like the Shasta daisy or the ever-blooming jimson weed, or the Burbank potato.... The masculine element was to be admitted on equal terms with the feminine to the end that the interchange of ideas might blossom to perfect fruitage on the tree of knowledge. The men were to be permitted to smoke cigarettes or good cigars in every salon of the club and only the tiring room of the dames and damosels was denied to the men members. Of course it was entirely a woman's idea—envious detractors say that it was the conception of a coterie of old maids, spinsters and widows whose hope of male companionship was so long deferred that their hearts had grown sick. All noble purposes, however, are thus maligned. Personally I approve of the noble purposes of the Sequoia Club.

Rough On Lions

In fear that I may be accused of lauding the nobility of purpose of the Sequoia Club without discrimination, thereby overlooking some obvious tendencies of the organization that ought to be censored or even censured, I hasten to add that lion hunting is a somewhat ignoble purpose and should be prohibited in the club preserves. It is said that the officers and some of "the leading members" of the Sequoia Club are very keen on the scent of "big game" and some complaint has been made that a certain literary lioness was hunted into the official corral, there fed to repletion, and then turned loose among the ordinary members of the club. Of course, it is admitted, if the ordinary members of the club had been willing to pay the price of admission to the private battue they could have participated in the pleasures of the chase; but, it is argued, the club should not be used to further the personal activities of the lion hunters. Many of the members cannot afford the expense. If lions are to be hunted let the club treasury pay for the sport and let everybody line up for the drive. In the Bohemian Club lions are hunted in the Red Room and some millionaire pays the bill—just as he would have done if he had hunted in the Poodle Dog, Marchand's or the Pup, wholly without reference to the club. Critics of this phase of Sequoia functions insist that if the rich members of the club desire to hunt lions they should pursue the beasts on other feeding grounds. However, it is not a vital issue and the Sequoia will probably survive in spite of the vanity of some of the members. As the organization gains in strength and experience its nobler purposes will steadily dominate the trivial pastimes of its dilettante.

"You'd better order your own present from me this year," said old Skinflint to his wife.

"All right, dear," she said, and went out and blithely chose a two thousand dollar string of pearls.

He felt quite depressed about it, and regretted his liberality, until the bill was sent him for his gift from Mrs. Skinflint. It was just ninety-eight cents, for a bargain golf jacket, and balanced the string of pearls to his perfect satisfaction.

A Burlingame Anecdote

The Greenway fancy dress ball reminds me that the most successful and enjoyable function of that kind given in this State in recent years was the bal masque at Burlingame, of which Mrs. Carolan and Mrs. McCreery were hostesses. On the arrival of the guests they paid their respects to the two hostesses standing in the hall, beautifully gowned and bejeweled. "Good evening Mrs. Carolan," and "How d'ye do Mrs. McCreery," they said, but their greetings drew no response. Presently they discovered that the two figures were effigies in wax of the hostesses.

A Parody by Burgess

And now comes the indefatigable Gelett Burgess with a parody on the immortal Rubaiyat. The latest work of the sprightly Californian humorist, entitled "The Rubaiyat of Omar Cayenne," came to me the other day in a brochure from the publishing house of the Frederick Stokes Company. The Burgess Rubaiyat consists of nonsensical rhyms, somewhat satirical, dealing with the ephemeral book and magazine trash of the day. He guys prominent authors for writing rot, swats publishers for publishing it, and blames the public for demanding it. But his verses are not such hot stuff as the titular pun suggests. There is a cynical vein running through them that might prompt the inquiry whether the studiously eccentric Burgess is really not without honor away from his own home. Thus, for instance:

Ah, my Beloved, write the Book that clears
Today of dreary Debt and sad Arrears;
Tomorrow!—why, Tomorrow I may see
My Nonsense popular as Edward Lear's.

Writing's a trade where Newspapers pay best;
Le Gallienne this Verity confessed;
So join the Union like the rest of us—
Who strikes for Art is looked at as a jest.

Waste not your Ink and don't attempt to use
That Subtle Touch which editors refuse;
Better be jocund at two cents a word
Than, starving, court an ill-requited Muse!

You know, my Friends, I've done with Purple Cows,
And long to sober Fiction paid my Vows;
Spontaneous Glee is mighty hard to Sell—
'Twas Carolyn Wells that shot across my Bows.

Oh, threats of Failure, hopes of Royalties!
One thing at least I've sold—these Parodies;
One thing is certain, Satire always sells;
The Roast is read, no matter where it is.

The Benighted Public

The rhymester pays his respects to the public in these lines:

The Scribe no question makes of Verse or Prose,
But what the Editor demands he shows;
And he who buys three thousand words of Drule,
He knows what People want; you Bet he knows!

And though you wring your hands and wonder why
Such slipshod Work the Magazines will buy, Don't grumble at the Editor for he Must serve the Public, e'en as You and I.

The World's Best

The best verse in the string, in my opinion, is this:
Ah, Love! could you and I perchance succeed
In boiling down the million books we read
Into one Book, and edit that a Bit—
There'd be a World's Best Literature, indeed!

Invitations to a select number were issued by the Century Club for Friday night of this week, when a new play based on Spanish-Californian life is to be produced. Mrs. Elizabeth Sears Gerberding is the author of the play.

No de Young Vaudeville

Now that the de Youngs are in mourning and not entertaining a number of superior but not less interesting entertainments for the festive New Year's eve are being planned. Usually the de Young vaudeville is the thing for that evening, but this year friends will divide themselves into congenial groups and contrive to hasten the hours of the vanishing year.

Our Immortal Soul

That eminent exponent of the pagan philosophy as interpreted at the State University, Professor George H. Howison, has been telling the First Congregationalists of Berkeley why he believes in the immortality of the soul. The learned Theban does not say that the soul is immortal—he is too wise for that—he merely announces his belief in the theory on the hypothesis that our bodies and minds are common with the entire universe, the former being the doorway through which each enters into relations with the cosmos. This is very admirable fooling with the unknowable. Coming from the solemn lips of Professor Howison it sounds like wisdom, but the premiss is false and the deduction so flimsy that a babe in science could destroy it with a breath. I will undertake to prove in words of learned length that Professor Howison is himself an accident of nature—that when the protoplasmic yeast began to ferment out of which was evolved the palinogenesis that ultimately developed a Howison, the odds were billions to nothing that there would be no Howison. Moreover, if there was a beginning of the Howison soul there must be an end. It is not Professor Howison's belief that warps his judgment to the conclusion that he has an immortal soul; it is his egotism. He says there is a consciousness in us that we transcend mere nature and that, therefore, because of this consciousness, we are imperishable. Mirabile dictu! So might anything else sentient and dependent upon the energy of nature for existence argue. How does Professor Howison know that the potato bug is not similarly convinced of the possession of an immortal soul? Has Professor Howison ever discussed the subject with the potato bug? This is not the place to confront Professor Howison with the opinions of the potato bug regarding the immortality of the soul, but I hope some day to arrange a conference between the learned philosopher and one of the Doryphora decemlineata (a beetle of unusual mentality within the comparatively narrow scope of a mere beetle's understanding). I think the bug can convince Professor Howison that belief in the immortality of the soul is not a monopoly of those whose consciousness advises them that they transcend mere nature.

The Harvey Tea

Thursday of last week saw two of the largest and most fashionable teas of the season at which Mrs. H. M. A. Miller and Mrs. J. Downey Harvey were the hostesses. Mrs. Harvey's was exceedingly swell. All the fashionables were present, and the refreshments and decorations were most elaborate. Mrs. Harvey, Miss Harvey and Mrs. Eleanor Martin received in the order mentioned in the large red living room, which was aglow with poinsettias and American Beauties. Mrs. Harvey and her daughter were in white, and Mrs. Martin was in black. Mrs. Harvey adopted the sensible custom of having only matrons and the older girls as her assistants in receiving. Not a single young girl was in the room except as a guest. The prettiest gown at Mrs. Harvey's was worn by Mrs. William Hineckley Taylor. It was of pale blue cloth, set off with a turquoise necklace, and was worn with a Corday hat of white lace and blue feathers.

Mrs. Miller's Tea

Mrs. H. M. A. Miller's tea in honor of Mrs. C. O. G. Miller was one of the prettiest ever given in San Francisco. It was crowded, there being a large contingent of Oakland people to swell the throng. Mrs. Miller accomplished the difficult task of making a club house look homelike. The reception rooms of the Century Club were beautifully decorated and Mrs. Miller and her guest of honor stood together to receive their guests. Scattered about the rooms were about forty other ladies without their hats and a few of this year's debutantes, notably Miss Charlotte Wilson and Miss Carol Moore. The delightful feature was the tea room, which was the ordinarily cold-looking Century hall made picturesque by huge stands of woodwardia ferns which broke up the room. At the foot of each bunch of ferns was a tete-a-tete table, where friends sat and gossiped together over strictly New York four o'clock refreshments—toast and sandwiches and tea. At a raised table at the end of the room, decorated with beautiful silver tea-things and candelabra, Mrs. Herbert Moffitt and Mrs. Montalgre poured tea and coffee. Of the receiving party the most stunningly gowned was Mrs. W. S. Wood in a princess gown of white satin brocaded with large pink rose wreaths. Of the younger women the most beautifully dressed was Miss Florence Bailey in a calling costume of light tan, the skirt of cloth, the coat of a darker shade of velvet. A plumed Gainsborough hat in brown and shrimp pink completed the lovely costume.

The Vogue of Jerome Landfield

San Francisco, always faddy, and always short on men, is at present lionizing Jerome Landfield, one of the younger of the University of California professors. Mr. Landfield is most attractive in manner, is in request for dinners and entertains quite a bit himself at the Faculty Club in Berkeley and also at the new Claremont Country Club across the bay.

Miss Shaw Entertained

Miss Mary Shaw, the interesting actress who has just closed her season at the Orpheum, was entertained on Thursday afternoon at an informal tea-drinking by Miss Frances Joliffe, and on Friday night was a guest with Jack London, Sterling and some other of the literati at Luna's.

One of Uncle George Bromley's early Christmas gifts was from "Jimmie" Hamilton, who wrote: "I send you this jack-knife to cut the coupons resulting from the sale of your book."

Dutton-Howell

Invitations have been issued for the marriage of Gertrude Dutton, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Dutton, and Joseph Rowland Howell. The wedding will take place in Trinity church on Wednesday evening, January eleventh.

Importance of Climax

Nowhere are the dramatic unities more carefully observed than in the court-room. Every trial is a drama to be played with a sense of the importance of climax, for it is the lawyer who knows how to achieve theatric effects, and appeal to the emotions, that impresses juries and wins cases. A well prepared case is one that has its acts properly arranged, its situations deftly constructed, its dialogue suitable to the theme, and its curtains timely. The other day I almost applauded Sam Shortridge when he was defending a young man charged with having bribed a juror. Sam was trying to break down the testimony of the complainant and he asked a witness if he would believe the man under oath. Thereupon Assistant District Attorney Ferral exploded with indignation. He pronounced the question improper and demanded that Shortridge be rebuked. He sputtered around quite awhile and Judge Wells of Contra Costa, who was trying the case for Judge Lawlor, seemed inclined to agree with him and rule the question out. Calmly Shortridge arose after Ferral had subsided, and meekly called for the twelfth Californian report. It was brought. Shortridge read, and showed that according to a ruling of the Supreme Court, his question was eminently proper. Ferral was staggered for a moment, but presently he got on another head of steam and sloshed around again. He pointed out that the twelfth Californian report was printed in 1859, and he suggested somewhat sneeringly that Mr. Shortridge should not go so far back for his law; that the Supreme Court had set forth new rules since that remote period. Shortridge modestly suggested that a decision should not be ignored merely on account of its antiquity. But Ferral argued noisily that the law of 1859 was not the law today. Shortridge waited until Ferral had again exhausted himself and Judge Wells had intimated once more that he was inclined to agree with the prosecuting officer. Then theatrical Samuel arose and in his best baritone called for the hundred and something Californian report. "This is somewhat more modern," he said; and he read, and showed that the rule for which he contended still obtained, and that only a few years ago the Supreme Court had expressly approved the decision of 1859. It was clear that Shortridge had the later decision up his sleeve, metaphorically speaking, all the time. But he wanted to work up to his climax, and he did it most effectively.

Coming Events Cast Their Shadows

Theatregoers may feel confident that Edna Wallace Hopper will soon appear at a local playhouse. According to one of my daily contemporaries, "Now that the fight over the Dunsmuir millions is nearing a close the actress has been permitted to return to the stage," and further, says my contemporary, "It was while she was starring in 'Florodora' two years ago, receiving fifteen hundred a week, that the contest was precipitated." All of which makes it clear that the wily press agent has once more been gold-bricking the press. Those Dunsmuir millions have been the source of a great deal of advertising for the little actress, whose greatest professional achievement was her marriage with De Wolf Hopper. The salary of fifteen hundred dollars a week was of course paid in stage money. Even Lillian Russell's advertised salary on Broadway never reached that figure, and Edna has yet to reach the Russell class. But the press agent must exaggerate, fatuously exciting incredibility where there is no occasion for doing so, and implying that the person boosted has not sufficient merit to get along without the assistance of hyperbole. That is the way of the press agent. The Dunsmuir contest did not keep Edna Wallace off the stage. She has been on the stage since the opening of that contest. She has adventured in vaudeville, and not on Broadway but in Harlem. Broadway is fickle, and Edna Wallace, the dainty and clever Lady Holyrood of the original American "Florodora" company, recently opened an engagement in despised provincial Chicago. So I opine that she is coming this way. Now that she is doing the provinces we shall be glad to give her a warm greeting providing that she makes good, and by the way we do not want to be reminded of that contest. If it had not been commenced, and the actress had not aired the pathetic tale of her mother's career in the courts, we would be more inclined to applaud her professional efforts.

The holiday season arrives appropriately to remind us that the best use of money is to spend it.

Wallace's Lecture

One of the most remarkable exhibitions of professional interest and zeal that I have observed for some time was given a few nights ago at the Press Club by officers of the army. The occasion was an informal chat by Grant Wallace, war correspondent in the Orient for the London Illustrated News and the San Francisco Bulletin, on the Manchurian campaign and the battle of Liao-Yang, of which he was an eye-witness. In view of the opportunity thus afforded for acquiring information regarding details that would hardly be available for ordinary journalistic work, the club thoughtfully invited the officers of the army stationed in and around San Francisco to attend the lecture. It was in the glad acceptance of the invitation that the army showed its sincere devotion to its calling, and I am hearing yet the compliments paid the service on its professional zeal, its earnest desire to add to its military information. The army attendance was a pleasing surprise to the directors. Fully seventy-five, not only from the city proper and the Presidio, but from Alcatraz and even far away Angel island, were on hand. Generals Moore and McArthur were represented by their adjutants-general and personal staffs. Every grade, from second lieutenant to colonel, was there in force. Happily, Wallace gave an extremely interesting address, and the affair, carried out with the utmost bonhomie, was as agreeable to hosts as to guests.

Apropos the Press Club, it would appear that it has recently entered upon a career of unusual vivacity. In addition to the periodic bohemian dinners that are given from time to time in the jinks room, there is hardly a week that passes without some entertainment of peculiar attractiveness. Whether it be a lecture on the Russo-Japanese war, a talk on sociology, a musicale, or a midnight reception to the theatrical profession, there is always something on the tapis at this cosy club.

"How is your daughter getting on with her music?"

"Pretty well. Not more than ten neighbors have registered kicks in the last few days."

Gallant Lieutenant Cole

Lieutenant William Carey Cole, U. S. Navy, the young officer who was seriously scalded in the recent unfortunate mishap in the fire-room of the battleship Massachusetts, has quite a number of friends on this coast, although most of his cruising has been in the Atlantic. It was no surprise to the friends who know his character to learn that his injuries resulted from a gallant effort on his part to rescue the men under him. Cole has a record for bravery, in the navy, but he has never advertised himself à la Hobson. He had charge of the leading steam launch in the hazardous mine-lifting expedition in Guantanamo bay during the Spanish war, and was ever among the first to volunteer when volunteers for dangerous duty were called for. He won great admiration years ago by championing the cause of a man whom he greatly disliked, but against whom he would not suffer injustice.

Competing Buds

The younger set of society is certainly being feted this year as it never was before, and the unusual activity is said to be due to the competition among the debutantes. So far Anita Harvey leads in the number of affairs given in her honor. Her two friends, Margaret Hyde-Smith and Charlotte Wilson, are running neck and neck. The rivalry is of a friendly nature, and these three buds are invited to the same affairs.

Petronius Phelan's Symposium

By special request (preferred by himself) James D. Phelan sired the Christmas Jinks of the Bohemian Club. If the members of the club had thought of it Mr. Phelan would not have been forced to petition for the distinction. They didn't think of it, however, and Mr. Phelan, fearing, perhaps, that they would think of somebody else, put in his application. It was granted without protest—the newspapers say it was received with enthusiasm. As soon as the honor had been conferred Mr. Phelan announced that there would be no Low Jinks. His reason for prohibiting the usual parody on the High Jinks has been badly set forth in a statement to the effect that Mr. Phelan was apprehensive of personal allusion to himself in the manner of the Low Jinks of the Bohemian Club from time immemorial. He feared, it is said, that the gibe of the scoffer and the jeer of the irreverent would lower the tone of the higher revelry—for be it remembered, the Bohemian Club has elevated the jinks to a plane far above that on which Mr. Counsellor Pleydell conducted them, speaking in passion and doing it in King Cambyse's vein. If Colonel Mannering could happen in on a Phelan High Jinks he would more readily adjust himself to the environment than he did on that memorable occasion when he and Dandie Dinmont came to Cleirhugh's tavern in the ancient city of Edinburgh. To caricature one of the classical vaudevilles of the Bohemian Club sired by James D. Phelan would be like travestyng Cynthia's Revels or making a mock of a "comical satire" by Beaumont and Fletcher. A low jinks is mere buffoonery, something to make Falstaff merry, an aggregation of Bardolphs singing bawdy songs and pranking to the lascivious pleasing of lutes and dulcimers in consonance with the antic humor of those who order high balls at two o'clock in the morning. A high jinks of the Phelan order is refined comedy flavored with attic wit and savouring of Terence, Martial and Pindar. This sort of entertainment has form and purpose and is educational withal—it teaches Macaenas of Battery street to appreciate Horace of the uptown boarding house district; it inculcates a literary sense in the moneyed members of the club that discovers value in the contents of books almost equal to the price of the best binding. The humor of these Phelan revelries is the humor of the salon of the ancient regime—inducing an effort of the mind to fully comprehend and appreciate its subtle force. To jest with this Phelanesque jinks would be sacrilege comparable with a burlesque upon the solemnities of the Eleusinian mysteries. Petronius was the arbiter of Nero's elegant revels but he expressly forbade the orgie as a postlude—and to parody the verse of the Caesar was sudden death for the parodist. All of which is in explanation and substantiation of Mr. Phelan's edict against a Christmas Low Jinks in the Bohemian Club.

Joullin Did It

Since the foregoing was printed I have learned that Mr. Phelan has disclaimed responsibility for the ignoring of club tradition. He has passed the buck to Amadee Joullin, the broad shouldered artist, a wise selection for onus bearing inasmuch as there is no question of his bohemianism. Evidently for the purpose of silencing the croakers the following note was printed at the bottom of the program of the Pantomime: "The substitution of this refined spectacle for the Lower Jinks of former days was the suggestion of Amadee Joullin." Why that note? Was it deemed advisable to apologize for the Fernald pantomime? It was surely not refined, but it was side-splitting and served the purpose. At the High Jinks Joe Redding was in a most serious mood, and undertook to tell the members for what the Bohemian Club stands and for what it should stand. They all agreed with him.

Palette—It's an awful bore, achieving a reputation as an artist by playing at bohemianism.

Dauber—How do you do it?

Palette—Well, the hardest part of the game is eating in one of those stuffy, cheap French restaurants in Montgomery street, and pretending to like the awful cooking.

When Paderewski Plays

Much to the surprise of some people who have confounded the spectacular musician with the artist, Paderewski at the piano is never frenzied. His repose is a revelation. He does not go through any muscular contortions as do many of the restless fakirs. He never frets an anxious audience by swaying upon his chair, but sanely keeps his balance thereon. His head never makes mad and totally unnecessary dips into the keyboard. Neither does he wobble it to show that he is deeply moved. Nor yet does he make wiggley motions with a finger on one defenseless key which has already done its utmost. His hands sometimes rise to the level of his head and remain poised there a moment preparatory to a dashing parlando. You see occasionally his graceful fingers wave an arm's length into melodious space after a rippling run ending in a delicate staccato; and his feet, yes, even his legs are kept busy attending to that marvelous pedaling which assists so much in bringing out those wonderful singing tones. But his torso is always in repose and his majestic head stays where it belongs, while the splendid brain within is attending strictly to business, directing the dumb instrument to give forth its glorious messages, sometimes sobbing and throbbing with tragic import and sometimes soothing with voluptuous rhythm, or joyful strain. And yet—take heed, oh you piano-pounding fakirs!—whether there is joy or sorrow in his art, he is ever sane and calm, ever emanating magnetism, his poetic face full of understanding and kindness, and there alone are depicted the emotions that move his soul.

Hearst's Return to Sanity

Joy was unconfined in the Examiner editorial rooms when the news came over the wire that William R. Hearst had resolved to become a private citizen and curb his political ambition. The men on the Examiner are eager to have the bars down as they were in the old days before Hearst thought of switching his throne from the editorial sanctum to the Executive Mansion, for in that halcyon period the news was the thing without any strings on it, and the young men on the Hearst pay-roll were not expected to pause and consider the possible effect on the Hearst boom every time they had a story worth a scare head. Political ambition is an editorial muzzle, as Hearst has discovered to his sorrow. How often, I wonder, has he regretted that Eugene Schmitz was invited to take the stump for him in New York? In New York today Hearst's dailies are making such a record in their crusade against municipal corruption that there has been talk of nominating him for Mayor. But in San Francisco, reeking with municipal corruption, the Examiner is protesting against the alienation of the management of the Yosemite Park. No wonder Hearst has decided to quit politics. In justice to him, however, it should be said that when he placed himself under obligations to Schmitz he had no reason to expect the carnival of graft now at its height in this city.

The Sable in Society

Sable having become the favorite fur of the very wealthy, it is now to be seen quite often in society, and as the thermometer seldom falls low enough in San Francisco to render furs comfortable, society women with sables will no doubt sacrifice comfort occasionally for the pleasure of display. It has been ever thus in San Francisco. From time immemorial San Francisco women have sweltered along the highway in midsummer sealskins. One of the handsomest sable coats worn in this city is the property of Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels. It comes considerably below the waist line. With this Mrs. Spreckels carries a beautiful muff and wears a fur hat. Jennie Blair is also wearing a sable coat somewhat shorter than that of Mrs. Spreckels. She too boasts a sable muff. Mrs. Oxnard has a beautiful sable Eton and muff, and Mrs. Gus Taylor has a sable mantle in which she envelops herself for drives in her victoria. Mrs. Sterling Postley, who lately returned from New York, has very rich sables.

Tame Flirtations Only

I hear that Charles Oelrichs and his friend Mr. Eldridge were very much surprised to find that society in San Francisco is virtuous. They had been laboring under the delusion that our society matrons were very gay, but to their amazement the only flirtations encouraged were of the milk-and-water variety. They found society extremely stupid and they were obliged to seek diversion on the marshes where the ducks are wont to congregate.

Howard Gets a Hearing

Shafter Howard is in New York with his musical comedy, "His Majesty." A number of society and musical people gathered in the New York Theatre last week to hear an orchestral rehearsal of the piece. Mr. Howard conducted, and professionals, soloists and chorus sang the numbers. The consensus of opinion was that they were not strikingly original but were tuneful and catching, particularly the Hebrew lullaby, "Little Ikey," and a plantation dance. The most ambitious number is the intermezzo, a gavotte which seems graceful and dainty, but was badly botched by the brasses.

A kiss on the cheek is worth a score under the mistletoe.

The Sequoia Club has the call on all the new lions that come this way. The latest to be roped for exhibition purposes was Hallie Erminie Rives and Professor Tichnor of Boston. They were the joint attraction last Tuesday evening. Miss Rives wore a handsome black princess gown trimmed with real lace, and with this she had a large black beplumed picture hat. Miss Ednah Robinson was the hostess of the evening, in a soft creamy gown. Among the lionizers were Mr. and Mrs. Warren Gregory, Mrs. Will Irwin, Mrs. David Bixler, Mrs. Johnstone, Miss Sexton, Miss Anna Strunsky, Miss Rose Strunsky, Mr. and Mrs. McNaught, Dr. and Mrs. Dennis Arnold, Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Peixotto, the French Consul, Mr. Lanel, Mr. Phelan, Mr. Hicks and Mr. Ventura.

An Oscar Wilde Revival

There is to be an Oscar Wilde revival in London. The solemn humbugs who but recently blushed at mention of the unfortunate poet's name are now discussing his genius in the drawing-room, and a theatrical manager has decided to revive "Lady Windermere's Fan" and print the author's name on the playbills. It was not long ago that "The Importance of Being Earnest" was produced in London, but the manager cautiously suppressed the author's name, fearing that if he reminded the highly moral Britishers that Wilde wrote the play they would shun the theatre. The characteristic attitude of the Briton in such matters would be amusing if its insincerity were not so nauseating. Because Wilde was a degenerate the people of London pretend to fear contamination from the children of his genius, but they are not shocked by the splendid strumpets and gilded belswaggers with which their decadent stage is peopled. If the drama of a nation is an accurate reflex of its manners and morals, then the Britishers were guilty of rank hypocrisy in drawing the line at the Wilde personality. England's foremost playwrights occupy themselves almost exclusively with themes of licentiousness, they chaff at woman's chastity and deal pleasantly and approvingly with adultery as a social diversion, so why should they have flouted poor Wilde, who was a sinner against himself rather than against society?

The Poet's Works

Now that the reign of hypocrisy is over, so far as the memory of Wilde is concerned, some London publisher will have the courage to collect those of his works that are out of print and republish them. In his early life Oscar Wilde wrote many beautiful poems and essays on noble and inspiring themes. I treasure some of them that were published many years ago in the "Seaside Library." One is a beautiful sonnet written by Wilde on hearing the Dies Irae sung in the Sistine Chapel:

"Nay, Lord, not thus! white lilies in the spring,
Sad olive groves, or silver-breasted dove,
Teach me more clearly of thy life and love
Than terrors of red flame and thundering.
The empurpled vines dear memories of Thee bring;
A bird at evening flying to its nest,
Tells me of one who had no place of rest;
I think it is of thee the sparrows sing.
Come rather on some autumn afternoon,
When red and brown are burnished on the leaves,
And the fields echo to the gleaners' song.
Come when the splendid fullness of the moon
Looks down upon the rows of golden sheaves,
And reap Thy harvest: we have waited long.

Here is another sonnet in characteristic vein which might well serve for an epitaph on the poet's grave:

To stab my youth with desperate knives, to wear
This paltry age's gaudy livery,
To let each base hand filch my treasury,
To mesh my soul within a woman's hair,
And be mere Fortune's lackeyed groom—I swear
I love it not! these things are less to me
Than the thin foam that frets upon the sea,
Less than the thistle down of summer air
Which hath no seed; better to stand aloof
Far from these slanderous fools, who mock my life
Knowing me not, better the lowliest roof
Fit for the meanest hind to sojourn in,
Than to go back to that hoarse cave of strife
Where my white soul first kissed the mouth of sin.

A Lecture by Oscar Wilde

Oscar Wilde once delivered a lecture on the English Renaissance which contained much that should be read with interest by the critical Pharisees of London. He said, among other things: "It is not an increased moral sense or moral supervision that your literature needs. Indeed one should never talk of a moral or immoral poem. Poems are either well written or badly written; that is all. Any element of morals or implied reference to a standard of good or evil in art is often a sign of a certain incompleteness of vision. All good work aims at a purely artistic effect. But as in your cities so in your literature, it is an increased sensibility to beauty that is lacking. Spiritual freedom your own generous lives and liberal air will give you. Love art for its own sake and then all things that you need will be added to you." In that lecture Oscar Wilde gave a hint to that genius for epigram which had its efflorescence in his plays. Here are a few that I have culled: "To know nothing about their great men is one of the necessary elements of English education." "Satire pays the usual homage which mediocrity yields to genius." "To disagree with three-fourths of England on all points is one of the first elements of vanity, which is a deep source of consolation in all moments of spiritual doubt." "I think that the first duty of an art critic is to hold his tongue at all times and upon all subjects."

"Our new religion," said Miss Culture, "does not approve of kissing."

"My," returned Miss Frivolle, "if I were you I'd change my church."

His Great Achievement

Rev. Father Doyle, the eloquent priest who is now in town, is quite a wag. Some time ago he joined the Society of Californians in New York, to membership in which only those are eligible who have reflected credit on their native State. Shortly after his election to membership he was approached by the reporter of a New York paper who wanted a story from him on what he had done for California.

"I don't know of anything I have done for California except to come away from it," said the priest.

The Joseph Belleau Coryells have closed their Menlo home for the winter, and have taken Mrs. W. R. Wheeler's house at 2101 California street for the season.

Leitering The British Peerage

The British Jobberwock is chortling through the brujious wood and the British Boojum snuckles mucktiously anent the probability that all the Leiter millions, barring a few that the male scion of the Chicago tradesman will squander in the wheat and other pits, will come to the British aristocracy. The latest announcement concerning the matrimonial intentions of the Leiters involves the engagement of Miss Nannie Leiter to the Duke of Suffolk. Only a few days ago Miss Daisy Leiter was married to a rising young British person now clerking in the office of Lord Curzon, Viceroy of India, through whose political influence it is hoped that he will attain to some sort of a peerage. Thus the daughters of the Chicago millionaire have been grafted on the stock of outworn British families and the result will be apples of Hesperides — or dead sea fruit. Socially Miss Nannie will make the better match. She will go down to dinner far in the lead of her sister, the untitled wife of the Viceroy of India; and her sister, Mrs. Colin-Campbell, the wife of the clerk in Lord Curzon's office, will not go down to dinner at all. As the Duchess of Suffolk Miss Nannie will trace her title as far back as 1603. Mrs. Curzon's husband was created a lord in 1898. Miss Nannie will marry into a family with titled ancestors galore. Her elder sister must be content with the prospect of being merely a maternal ancestor herself — the very first of the line. Mrs. Colin-Campbell ought to make anything she may please out of the raw material she has purchased. Old man Leiter's money and the combined pull of Lord Curzon and the Duke of Suffolk should be sufficient to swing the young Scotchman well up in the peerage. Perhaps eventually these lovely sisters may all go down to dinner together.

Of Jacob Riis, who is now on a lecturing tour of the West, Lincoln Steffens, himself in the same line of work, said:

"Riis is the only reformer that doesn't himself need to be reformed."

A Master of The "Heavy Obscure"

I wish I could write like William Dean Howells. There is a charm in the Howells essay style that baffles imitation and incites envy in the hearts of lesser writers. Its chief quality as manifested in his contribution to the December number of Harper's is in the heavy obscure order. There is nothing flippant or obvious in the article and the sense is not readily excavated even with the help of a dictionary. That it is something pertaining to modern American literature seems to be the major bow-wow of it — not a bow-wow as big as Dr. Johnson's perhaps, but certainly of the St. Bernard variety nevertheless. The only fault I find with it arises from the circumstance that it is printed in a popular magazine. The young women who buy the periodical for the love stories it contains are not mentally fitted to pore and ponder the cryptic utterances of Mr. Howells, and not one in a thousand of these would understand that Mr. Howells is writing about the very thing that most interests her in the magazine. Others who buy the magazine to read the descriptive articles and to look at the pictures will probably stagger along through a few sentences and with a broad yawn turn to the very entertaining advertisement section of the publication. Mr. Howells is unquestionably throwing his pearls before swine — in a metaphorical sense. He should save this sort of thing for the college address and the literary numbers of a women's club program. Women will endure these assaults upon their understanding in the open but they resent them or are bored by them in the meditation of their closets. They will listen attentively to Mr. Howells in the presence of the multitude and after it is all over they will comment in womanly superlatives, but Mr. Howells knows that it is only their vanity that compels them and that they would rather hear the amateur diva sing or listen to a recitation from the young woman who is "thinking seriously of going on the stage." Still I would like to write like Mr. Howells. I believe that the heavy obscure in letters is conducive to fame. It was a celebrated French author who, when taken to task by an intimate friend for writing something in one of his books that was out of the reach of the ordinary reader answered: "My dear fellow you overrate my ability. That stuff is not too profound. It is not even plain, everyday sense. It is absolutely meaningless, and I so intended it. Others, like yourself, will try to read it understandingly and they, like you, will give it up in despair, but all of them will say: 'What a great man is ————!'" Let us substitute the name of William Dean Howells for that of the celebrated French author.

An Informal Wedding

There was no formality about the marriage of Miss Nichols, the Bishop's daughter, with Mr. Lansdale last Thursday. I hear that the invitations were delivered over the phone in the most democratic manner. The wedding was solemnized in the little Episcopal church in San Mateo and only relatives and very intimate friends of the family were present.

A Love Match

The marriage of Mary Evelyn Cowing and Robert Brotherton Valleau, on Tuesday in Oakland, was the fitting termination of a romance begun in childhood's days. They attended the same schools and belonged to the same dancing classes. When school days were over, Mrs. Cowing, believing that her daughter might do better for herself than fall in love with "Bobby," said that she would withhold her consent to their marriage until both had seen more of the world. But after the world had been seen, the two met again on the tennis court. After the game, "Bobby" approached Mrs. Cowing. "I'm almost afraid to tell you what I won at tennis this afternoon," quoth he, gayly. "Did you get a high score?" asked Mrs. Cowing, unsuspecting any guile. "Love," was the terse reply. "And you, Evelyn?" "Love-two," cried Miss Evelyn, "and you might as well get out the announcement cards, mumsy, dear."

She Will Not Serve

Anita Oliver, the dearest friend of Cordelia Bishop, whose betrothal to Dr. Harry Alderson has just been announced, has positively refused to be a bridesmaid at the wedding. She has already served five times as bridesmaid and she says that only the uneven number takes the curse off and she will not tempt Providence again. Miss Bishop says she will not marry at all unless Miss Oliver is her attendant, but the Oakland bavardes hint that possibly the latter has another reason for refusing to serve—that Cordelia may have an opportunity to be bridesmaid herself to Anita, before her own wedding is pulled off. Miss Bishop is one of the most traveled girls over the bay, having been abroad twice, East many times and to Honolulu. She graduated from a school in New York and has friends all over the United States.

Cornelia Kempff, daughter of Rear-Admiral Kempff, is to join a house-party at the Bacon home in Santa Barbara early in January, and will remain until after the wedding of Miss Bacon and Tom Driscoll. She will be accompanied to Southern California by Eleanor Phelps, daughter of Admiral Phelps.

There Never Was Such a Boy!

If the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. John Henry Dieckmann is not thoroughly spoiled it will be because of his fine disposition. The Dieckmanns make their home with Mrs. Dieckmann's mother, Mrs. Remi Chabot, the best loved woman over the bay. Mrs. Dunn is also there to spoil the little nephew, and I hear that Claire Chabot has almost given up society for the pleasure of worshipping at the shrine of "Kate's" baby.

Keeler's Muse

Charles Keeler has written a morality play, "The Festival of the Midwinter Sun," for the Unitarian church of Berkeley. It will be produced on New Year's night in the church, and the author will attend to the staging and costuming. Fifty people will be in the cast. The play is based on the Saturnalia that marked the holiday season before the dawn of Christianity. It opens with the voice of Morality, wailing in the darkness, Night being expressed with solemnly-chanted choruses, and the Spirits of California, representing the flowers, birds, and air of the Golden State.

Wicked Mr. Morris

"Berkeley is the most unfortunate town in her citizens," said a prominent official, the other night, apropos of Anthony Morris's denunciation of the university town, through articles printed over his signature in Eastern papers. The headlines, as shown in the Register and Leader of Des Moines, Iowa, run: "Beware of Berkeley." So bitter is the feeling against Mr. Morris in the burg that it has been suggested that he be asked to leave. He says boldly that he has been warning Easterners against coming to Berkeley because they cannot get their children into the schools. He declares that certain children are obliged to be kept out of school for want of room while other children who are in are clamoring for a department of physical training, which will undoubtedly be added, and for which addition the poor youngsters who are crowded out must pay by their growing ignorance.

Machine-Made Logic

Carlyle called political economy "the dismal science." Dr. Charles H. Rieber, assistant professor of logic at the State University, promises to demonstrate that the science of which he is assistant professor is mechanical—as mechanical as mathematics. Professor Rieber has invented a complicated apparatus for solving problems in logic by "eliminating the errors in the consideration of syllogistic propositions." I quote from the report of the undergraduate reporter of the Examiner. Professor Rieber hopes to fill a long felt want with his logic register and I have not the slightest doubt that his hope is founded upon a premise that must inevitably evolve a logical conclusion. He has probably dumped this hope into the hopper of his machine and turned the crank thereby eliminating all doubts and errors from his syllogism. One of the long felt wants that Professor Rieber's machine will fill has existed in the editorial departments of the daily newspapers. Instead of writing their editorials on a typewriter the editors of the Chronicle and the Call, for instance, would simply insert the proposition they wished to demonstrate in the Rieber Eliminator, pull the stop marked "major" or "minor," set the time gauge, and wait for the wheels to go round. The logical conclusion would be an editorial to convince the public opinion of a graven image. A Rieber machine would be useless in the editorial department of the Examiner for two sufficient reasons: In the first place the editorial department of the Examiner doesn't write editorials; and in the second place logic is not deemed necessary to any argument that may be advanced by the editorial policy of the Examiner.

Some Uses of The Apparatus

Attached to a well-constructed gramophone the Rieber apparatus would serve all ordinary purposes of a law practice in the local courts. For family use the Rieber must eventually operate side by side with the dictionary, settling all disputes and family jars upon a logical basis as the lexicon settles arguments on etymology, orthography and definition. Many varieties of bets might be submitted to the machine with a certainty that the decisions would be logical even if they were not otherwise satisfying. Thus the Rieber apparatus would occupy a place on the counters of the cigar stores and the saloons alongside the slot machines. The machine would not materially assist the politicians whose logic is chiefly concerned with a sophis-try technically classified as "graft." An ordinary cash register would amply serve this purpose. I hope the Rieber machine has come to stay.

Society Amateurs to Appear in Drama

Mrs. McCalla, who is such an indefatigable worker for the Sailors' Home at Vallejo, is preparing for the next benefit entertainment which is to be given in January. This time "The Liars" is to be produced with a society cast. Jack Lowndes is to take Morgan's part and Frances Joliffe will have the Anglin part. They are the only professionals who will appear. Jack Shiels is one of the amateurs who has promised to fill in. Lowndes is a nephew of the late Mrs. Shillaber. He is an Oxford man and was on the stage several years. He came out here about a year ago to secure a fortune that had been left him, and he will soon go back to England. Miss Joliffe had several years' stage experience, too, and was very fond of the profession in which she met with only indifferent success. But she had courage and grit and would have struggled on had it not been for the importunities of her family. Mrs. McCalla is the fairy godmother of the Sailors' Home. She gave ten thousand dollars to the institution, and Admiral McCalla contributed his prize money. They want to raise thirty thousand more.

To get something which will be useful every day and yet something which is out of the ordinary—something different enough from other possessions to recall holiday pleasures and the donor—that is the great and often unsolved problem of the Christmas purchaser. If you can not think of something, suitable for friend or relative, a visit to the Russian Art Store, 428 Sutter street, will bring you happy results.

Christmas at Quicksilver Camp

BY THE PIONEER.

There is a stereotyped form of Christmas story which makes its annual appearance at the appropriate season. It is modeled after the plan of Brete Harte's famous "How Santa Claus Came to Simpson's Bar," and represents the rough but kind-hearted miners as putting forth extraordinary exertions in order to make one glorious memory for the solitary juvenile, golden-haired Blossom, or snub-nosed and freckle-faced Jim who, by some felicitous oversight, has never before heard of the holiday nor the patron saint of good children, and is ready, with receptive and untainted mind, to give full credence to the first miracle. There is always a soft blanket of spotless snow resting lightly on the boughs of fir and cedar and everything is as conventionally perfect as a Prang's Christmas card. But Santa Claus does not always find his way to the Simpson's Bars, even though the inducements in the way of empty stockings may be seventy and seven times the orthodox pair. Whenever I read one of these fairy tales of the Christmas scribe my mind wanders back to one Yuletide spent perforce in a "busted" cinnabar camp not much more than a hundred miles from San Francisco as the crow flies. It was at best as Godforsaken a looking place as could be found on the map of California, one of those localities which "the Almighty had forgotten and no one else ever heard of." I used often to say to myself that if anyone were to spend an uninterrupted twelve-month in Quicksilver, he would forget the everyday aspect of common things beyond its confines. My impression was graphically confirmed on the day of my departure, when I was occupying the box-seat of the stage along with the driver, who was a character well deserving of a chapter in the history of the stage days of California. As we were passing a newly-sprouted wheat field, a tobacco-stained finger at the end of a length of blue flannel sleeve shot outward and upward from the interior of the Concord, and pointed towards a flock of turkeys, while an excited and anxious voice called out: "I sa-ay, McCue, what sort of a burr'd is that in there beyant, in the grass, wid the lo-ong neck?" And having been duly supplied with the desired information the miner settled back contentedly, muttering to himself, "Ah, yis, 'tis—a turrkey, so it is!"

The road which led one to this lost corner was by no means an aerial bee-line. For a large stretch of the way it was a shelf cut out of the side of the mountain and so narrow that the etiquette of the wayfarer demanded a warning shout before entering on the narrowest portions, lest some other traveler had already left the last turn-out. After the harvest, by mutual agreement, all the farmers sent their produce of wool, hay or grain out to market on the same days, in order that the heavy teams should not meet and come into conflict by acting independently of each other. In winter there was no necessity for such arrangement, for the road had an amiable trick of sliding bodily down into the canyons, and where it did not it was a bog of soft adobe, practically impassable. Anyone who has encountered "stick-tight" in the proper season has an unforgettable experience. Those who have not may thank the gods. Adobe mud takes on the consistency of stiff dough and every effort to rid one's self of the accumulation only adds to the mass. It turns the wheels of vehicles into solid slabs to which every turn adds a layer, and pedestrian locomotion becomes a special accomplishment possible only to the experienced. Neither rubbers nor gum-boots avail against it. In the summer the same soil opens deep and wide fissures and it is one of the stock jokes of the sections where it abounds to warn new-comers to be careful lest the small children fall in and drop to the central fires. Freightage then practically came to an end with the opening of the rainy season. If the road obligingly remained intact it could be continued at intervals, whenever a week of sunny weather dried out the mud so that a double team could pull an ordinary load.

Our mine was entitled to three mails a week, on Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays, the stage going out the following morning. In the winter months the schedule was maintained with a fair degree of regularity by substituting a pack mule for the coach. As to passenger traffic, "if you were in you were in and if you were out you were out."

As to the camp itself, it was situated at the head of a canyon bordered by low foothills. Through the centre, in the summer, was the dry bed of a creek into which the refuse of melted ore was dumped. In the rainy season it was a raging torrent crossed by a substantial footbridge. On one side was the company's store, a substantial brick building, which also housed the local office of the corporation and Wells, Fargo's express. Further back on the small plain lay the "kitchen," or boarding house for the unattached employees, and the "capitol," which will be recognized under the more familiar title of bunk-house, while but a short distance from the store and immediately facing the settlement were the furnaces, engine-room and other "shops." As the furnaces ran day and night, Sundays and holidays, all the year round, there never was surcease from the rattle of machinery, the sharp blast of the whistle every two hours when the charges were drawn, and the clatter of the red-hot cinders dumped from the car into the creek bed.

A company store deserves a word in explanation. When a mining corporation erects a commercial emporium it is, of course, a great convenience, not only to the employees, but to the settlers in the surrounding country. Ostensibly it is with this object in view that the store is built and stocked, and in effect the results would probably be the same. In fact the store is a machine which acts almost automatically in drawing back all that the miners earn into the hands of the corporation, for though the courts have decided time and again that the companies have no right to compel employees to rent their dwellings or purchase all their stores from the company, there are many ways by which a poor man with a large family dependent on his earnings can be made to see the expediency of not being too particular about his legal privileges. Moreover, the store is often the only one for fifty miles or more, unless there are other mines with similar institutions. Each man then, is provided with a pass-book and at the end of the month his account is made out, so much to his credit, or so much debit which he must of course work out. The company purchases what it pleases in quantity, a bolt of gaudy calico, a case of shoes, a few score of straw hats, blue, or butter-nut overalls and jumpers, and so on. Cards of buttons and such minor commodities are brought in by wholesale, and there is no loophole left for individual taste. The baby in arms and its grandmother, and all the generation between, of both sexes are garbed from the same piece of goods. Hats are differentiated by their trimmings, and if one happens to wear a number four shoe and there are none in stock one must make the best of it and take a five or even a six, for until the next stock of goods comes in there is no help for it. Rarely does the miner have sufficient coin in his purse to afford the luxury of sending out by secret agreement with the stage driver for his individual wants. Moreover, it is not the policy of these corporations to permit such independence and the huckster who penetrates into the wilderness with his vegetables or fruit, and the farmwife with eggs or butter, are given to understand that they may take their provisions to the store or else keep off the company's premises. I myself knew of one occasion where a farmer who had been depending on the mine for a market for his hay was notified that he must take his wife to account for peddling fruit. The woman happened to be passing through the camp and had handed to some urchins a few loose apples which she happened to have with her. The man who transgresses rules may "take his time"; in other words, leave the company's employ. The company manifests a preference for men with families, on the published theory that they make more dependable workmen and that as their needs are greater they should be given the most opportunity. In discharging men in a dull time only the indispensable of the bachelors are retained on the time-book for the same reason. There is a shrewd suspicion, however, that the store account of the father of a family foots up to a higher figure than that of his single brother, so that out of the same wage paid to both the profit is much larger.

The same rule held good with provisions as with other commodities. While there was any of the old stock on hand or anything which would answer as a substitute nothing more was brought in. When fresh meat was provided what was not sold immediately was pickled, and there was no use in pining for beefsteak when corned pork was the only provender available, nor in sighing for lamb chops when the remnants of the last steer still occupied the barrel. One had choice of what there was or nothing at all, and of course no one was permitted to keep as much as a solitary hen, much less a flock of poultry. In this particular winter the company had made a contract with a farmer to supply animal food in the shape of goat meat and corned goat mutton was the nearest approach to Christmas turkey that anyone was able to compass. Though there was no danger of starvation or even of privation in the matter of actual rations, variety had long ceased to be a factor in the culinary departments. Something to eat was about all anyone expected. On Christmas Eve there was not a pound of sugar, much less candy, raisins, nuts or fresh fruit. Coffee was out of reach, rice exhausted and most of the family gatherings were held around a tallow candle instead of the evening lamp. Beans were available, and wilted cabbage at strawberry price. Milk had always been a memory, so was not missed. Such butter as was ever furnished was currently asserted to be old enough to vote and strong enough to push an ore car, so there was no special deprivation in its absence. Toilet soap was always unattainable. That was one of the things you brought with you or did without, but laundry soap and other accessories were also minus quantities just about then. Needless to say anything in the way of toys or fancy goods was as far away as the moon.

As I have already mentioned, this particular camp, at the time of my sojourn, was "busted." Not only was the vein in sight worked out, but the company was in financial difficulties as well. Ore which at one time had been considered of too low grade to smelt was now better than what the mine was yielding, and in consequence the miscellaneous "dumps" were being worked over. A pile of sand and cinnabar which had stood for so long unmolested as to become a camp landmark would disappear in a day, and a new mound of loose material appear within half a dozen feet of its old location, while the ertswile mountain gave way to a pond, so that it became impossible to pick one's steps even in the most familiar locality after dark and the voice of exasperated profanity could be heard at all hours of the night.

The outlook on the day before Christmas was on bare, brown hills down which coursed miniature rivers, while the creek rose so that the footbridge which formed the sole link between the works and store and the dwelling houses was secured by stout ropes to timbers driven some distance from the bank. The water spread so that it lapped the doorsteps and preliminary precautions were taken to prevent the lower row of houses from taking passage for the bay. Then the wind rose and blew a howling gale, and the draft found its way beneath window frames and doors and through cracks, and the shingles rattled on the roofs. Towards midnight the great smokestack at the furnace became loosened and after clattering down some fifty feet of roofing, bounded to the ground, rolled over the intervening space, through the cinder bed and with a tremendous slash landed in the creek. There was a moment of profound silence immediately afterward, when a frightened voice penetrated to the farthest corner of the flimsy hotel: "My God! if this keeps on we'll be all blown down to the bay before morning," an opinion which was shared by most of the inhabitants. However, no such system of relief was inaugurated and we remained high, if not dry, where we were. That was the climax of the storm, and though it still rained all night and all day, the wind fell and the water rose no higher. It was a dreary time, with absolutely nothing to do, and no possibility of going anywhere. Every particle of print had been read and re-read, card-playing and checkers and dominoes had exhausted their power to amuse or distract, and the camp of Quicksilver settled down to wait. Late in the evening of Christmas, the mail carrier came in on horseback with the letter mail, three days behind time, so mud-bespattered that he almost needed to be dug out of his clothing, himself and his riding-horse, as well as his pack animal, all but exhausted, and a tale of woe to which his appearance furnished ample corroboration. He had swum creeks, waded through seas of mud, pioneered trails over the mountains where the road was washed out, and had more than one narrow escape, having made three separate attempts to ford one stream, being carried down himself in one effort and nearly losing his pack-mule with the mail in another. But "all's well that ends well," and those of us who had correspondents in the outer world who remembered the day and ourselves had a little glimpse of Christmas cheer at the last. No doubt there were many Christmas angels in disguise amongst the Quicksilverites, but there are circumstances which defy even Santa Claus.

IDEAL PLACE FOR LUNCHEON

Swain's, in Post street, is the ideal place for lunch when shopping. Everything is so new and neat and clean. They have one of the best chefs in town here. This, combined with perfect service, gives one comfort at one's meals. The prices are moderate and while the place is quiet and unostentatious it still has the homelike, refined atmosphere that elevates it above the plane of the ordinary restaurant. Ladies meet here when down town and lunch as quietly and comfortably as in their own homes.

Next Sunday go to Byron Springs. You can leave Friday afternoon or Saturday morning, returning Sunday afternoon or Monday morning. Two days at the Springs, and the entire expense of the trip is but $7.50. This includes the railway fare, transportation from station to hotel and return, accommodation at the beautiful Byron Hot Springs Hotel and use of the wonderful mineral baths—all for $7.50. Try it.

For decorative taste and beautiful flowers Manning's, at Post and Stockton streets, stands in the lead. The flowers here are beautiful. The writer saw there today fresh strawberry plants with the ripe and green fruit on them; also magnificent English holly wreaths, and was told that they were shipped from British Columbia.

The Barber

BY OLIVER WHITE.

A cold snowy day in Mertzdale, Michigan, is unlike anything ever described. The description might follow this statement but for one difficulty—the day of the action of this story chances to be Sunday, and as it happens that only one man capable of describing anything ever stayed there over Sunday—and that one man happens to be a traveling salesman, who fears his truthfulness might be questioned—the Mertzdale Sunday must be content to slumber on in dreamy oblivion. The population was said to be one hundred and twenty-four;; this was in ninety-eight, when the last census was taken by a thin, pale-faced stranger, who, it is said, ate three pies at "The Merchants' Hotel" and two hours later was seen going north towards Wohoo, a suburb of Mertzdale, where the wealthier Mertzdalers live during the summer months.

Let us try and picture then, a dingy platform twenty feet in diameter, covered with four feet of snow and creaking 'neath the weight of it. The wind is moaning over the hard fate of having to do business in such a burg—and the sky is gray, a melancholy gray. The platform is the station, and one Sunday morning at nine o'clock an unhappy little engine panted its way up to the platform and stopped. There was a brief pause, as if an altercation was taking place. The door of the one dismal-looking coach opened, and a dressy gentleman of the New York traveling man type stepped out and looked about in a dazed dreamy manner. The door of the coach slammed and the eager little engine puffed away and disappeared behind a hill. The traveling man watched it until this happened, even longer, for he was hoping against railway guides that some one was mistaken and that the conductor would come back and take him to the town of Mertzdale, but the train had gone, his feet were freezing in the wet snow, and his face was being nipped by the shrieking wind.

"Is this Mertzdale?" he asked the wind. The wind shrieked something into his ear and he started on a run. He was being literally blown up the road, and all the time it was blowing him the wind kept shrieking the something into his ear, and the something was:

"Yes, this is Mertzdale, and you've got to Sunday here, you've got to stay here—alone—in this dreary punk town, far away from home, friends and Sunday magazine sections, and you'll have not a soul to talk with, and the chances are ten to one that you can't get a drink in the town."

The wind seemed to take particular delight in screaming this into his ear. The poor traveling salesman heard it with never a whimper. His red, cold face told of his agitation.

"Merchants' Hotel," whispered the wind, and with a parting shove at his snow-covered back, and a farewell nip at his thin red ears, the traveling man was sent flying through the door of the dismal one-story frame, whose only relation to other hotels was a rate of two dollars per.

For a few minutes the traveling salesman's mind was a numb blank, his eyes and ears ached and his legs seemed bloodless. He picked up a pen to register in a yellow memorandum that lay on a battered, three-legged table, but his fingers were so lifeless that he laughed sillily at them. Slowly warmth came to them and he scrawled his name:

"P. Harrow, New York."

He heard a voice say, "Over night?"

"I am afraid so," he replied, and then looked for the man behind the voice.

The hotel clerk was reading an almanac—and was deeply interested. It was three minutes before he spoke again.

"Want to go up?"

"No," said Mr. Harrow, "No, I have no overwhelming desire to go up. I can imagine what it's like. Have you a sample room?"

"What's your line?"

"Safety pins," said Mr. Harrow.

"You can spread 'em out here," and he swept the frayed-edged memorandum from the table. "Nobody'll touch 'em, no body'll even look at 'em; nobody ever comes here."

"Don't you get lonesome?"

"No; I'm readin' all the time."

"What do you read?"

"Almanacs," said the clerk, "I'm readin' this one for the third time."

It was at this moment that Mr. Harrow noticed that one of the clerk's eyes was gone, his left one, and this so surprised Mr. Harrow that for a minute he said nothing. Finally when he did speak, he made the mistake of interrupting the clerk's reading.

"Look here," said the clerk, "you're paying for entertainment; the hotel gives you that. I'm only the clerk, so keep quiet. I hate a noisy Sunday."

A wood fire was crackling in the fire-place and a big chair was before it. Mr. Harrow sat in the chair and was very quiet. He toasted his feet and scorched his shins, and acted out stories in the fire. There was no sound but the ticking of the clock and the tinkling of snow as the wind drove it against the window. He listened for the sound of turning leaves (his back was toward the clerk). But the clerk's reading was noiseless, so noiseless as to arouse suspicion in Mr. Harrow's mind.

"What was the clerk doing?" he asked himself.

The clerk acted strangely and that one eye looked dangerous. Perhaps he was planning a murder. Perhaps he was creeping up step by step toward the chair with a knife in his hand and crime in his heart. (Mr. Harrow was of a nervous temperament). Perhaps the clerk was even now on the verge of springing. These thoughts kept jingling through Mr. Harrow's mind till he could bear them no longer. He turned quickly. The clerk was smiling at a joke, and the smile was not a pretty thing to see. Mr. Harrow didn't look long. He turned toward the fire.

"Very odd," he said to himself. Without knowing what it was, he knew something was very odd but could not identify it.

Just above the mantel was a sign. He had been looking at it for five minutes before he realized what a peculiar sign it was. It was in a black frame and it said:

DIFFENDORFER BARBER
OPEN ALL HOURS OF THE DAY AND NIGHT
CORPSES DESIRED

Mr. Harrow read it four times without knowing what he read. Then half to himself he said "strange" and read it again. He rubbed his hand over his face and felt a three-hour growth of whiskers. He read the sign twice more. One line in particular haunted his mind and he found himself repeating it over and over until it set itself to a dismal little melody: "Corpses desired—Corpses desired—Diffendorfer, Barber—Corpses desired." Soon the melody grew insistent. He tried to put it out of his mind, but it kept on, "Diffendorfer—Barber—Corpses desired."

He jumped from the chair into the middle of the room.

"Tell me," he cried, "tell me the meaning of that sign."

The clerk looked up from the almanac. His face was white, his lips blue threads, his one eye blazed, but his voice was soft.

"It means what it says. Can't you read? 'Diffendorfer—Barber. Open day and night.'"

"Well—well, go on—the rest of it."

A strange smile flitted across the clerk's face. The smile had cleansing properties for it left the face whiter than ever.

"'Corpses desired.' Ain't it plain enough for you?"

Mr. Harrow shivered "yes" and then: "It's a strange sign, isn't it?"

"You ought to see him."

"What kind of a man is he?"

The clerk's voice trembled a little.

"Don't talk about him, that's all; don't talk about him, I tell you."

"Is he a good barber?"

"They say he is."

"Will you recommend him?"

"Good God, no."

The clerk had thrown his almanac behind him. It slapped the wall. Then throwing himself forward on the table he trembled and shivered till the rickety affair almost toppled over.

Mr. Harrow was alone. He had nothing to read or drink and not a soul to talk to. He was morbid and despondent, and he needed a shave. He drew on his overcoat, buttoned it up and walked to the door.

"I am going," he said, "to see Diffendorfer."

The clerk looked up and stared at him.

"If I am not back in an hour remember I went to see Diffendorfer."

Still the clerk stared.

"Very odd," said Mr. Harrow, and remembered he had made the remark before. This time he knew what it was that was odd. The clerk's eye had changed places. It was his right eye that was gone.

The wind was as glad to see him as before. It put its cold hand on his back and again started to shove him. Mr. Harrow resisted. He fought and even lay back in its arms but he was scurried along in spite of his struggling and again the wind whispered something into his ear:

"You're all alone. Even the conductor has forgotten where you got off. You're going to see the strangest creature in Michigan, a mad man perhaps, you're going to be alone with him and if you never leave his room no one but myself will be any the wiser, for the stare in that clerk's eye was his last stare; do you understand? Do you understand?"

Then he felt himself shoved up against a door and looking up he saw the words, painted in black:

"DIFFENDORFER, BARBER
CORPSES DESIRED."

He didn't hesitate. He pushed open the door and walked in, and the wind, as if rejoicing in the release from its load (Mr. Harrow was a heavy man) swept down the street and was silent. It was the silence that a heavy paneled door will give one. As this door swung closed, a new steel lock snapped. There was no fear the door would open of its own accord.

A gas stove hummed in the centre of the room. It was a cheering sight. A modern barber chair stood in the rear of the room. It had a red cushion for a man to sit on. This was also cheering. An electric light hung a few feet above the chair, otherwise the room was a succession of shadows. Not a sound was heard but the creak of his own shoes. The room was that of a modern barber and was even more attractive than some city shops. Red was the predominant color. Signs were hung about the room—

"Diffendorfer's Hair Restorer."

"Diff's Own Massage."

"Diffy's Wrinkle Eradicator."

All these Mr. Harrow read. While he was reading them a well-modulated voice accosted him.

"How—do—you—do?" it said.

"How—how are you?" said Mr. Harrow.

"Want a shave?"

"Yes," said Mr. Harrow.

From out a shadowed corner came a florid-looking gentleman of perhaps forty years of age. He was clean shaven and fashionably dressed. His hands were as white and soft as a woman's. His nails were manicured.

"Sit down," he said, "I'll finish you in a very few minutes."

It was after Mr. Harrow had seated himself in the chair that he thought of the strangeness of the words. He was thinking of them seriously when something tight was drawn over his body, and something tighter over his legs, and when he tried to move his arms, he discovered that they too had been strapped down.

"A little precaution," said the barber in a pleasant voice. "After I am finished with you the straps will be taken off."

He could not turn his head and knew nothing of what was happening until he felt something cold on his face.

"What's that?" he said hoarsely.

"Lather," said the barber, "only lather—my own make."

"Oh," said Mr. Harrow, "it's the finest lather in the world, believe me."

"I do," said the barber, "I do, because I like you." He ran his soft fingers over the unshaven face. "I like you so much that I'm going to tell you a little story if," he said, smiling, "if you'll listen."

"Considering that I am here and you're there," said Mr. Harrow, "I don't think my objections would make any material difference."

"No," said the barber, after a pause, "I don't think so either." He laughed loudly. "I don't see how they could." And at this they both laughed—Mr. Harrow not quite so loudly as the other.

"I was a married man once," said the barber. "My wife was beautiful and I loved her. Do you wish a close shave?"

"A quick one," said Mr. Harrow, "I'm in a hurry."

"Oh," said the barber, "I'll be through with you soon. I loved her and she cared for me after a fashion and let me know it by allowing me to kiss her at meal times. We lived in a flat in New York and were happy until one day—does the razor scratch?—until one day I became conscious that her love was failing. She did not kiss me at breakfast—I am sure this razor scratches, better let me sharpen it—no? Very well.—The next day the dinner kiss was not forthcoming; a week later I missed one whole meal ticket of kisses, and it spoiled my appetite. I spoke to her of it but she was moody. One night I heard her talk in her sleep. 'Phil, my love,' she said. My name is not Phil, so I felt slighted. Then I found love letters, a packet of them, signed 'Phil,' so I began to grow suspicious—I really must sharpen this razor. . . . One afternoon I came to the conclusion that some one else was getting the benefit of my dining-room affection, so I resolved to discover him. I hid behind a screen and waited. The door opened and a handsome fellow entered. My wife greeted him and they discussed many things, among them, me. Finally he suggested that they run away; she agreed and wrote a note. She read it aloud and he said it was cleverly written, and I am bound to admit that it was. Well, they left me alone, and I felt badly, very badly, because I loved my wife—as much as she'd let me. I am a barber by trade, as you see, and New York was too small for me, so I drifted here, because—well—because at heart I am a fatalist and I couldn't get it out of my mind that some day this fellow would enter my shop and I'd get a chance to shave him. Remember, he was a handsome fellow who prided—who prided himself on his appearance.—What do you say?—I cut you? Oh! I beg your pardon; it will soon stop bleeding.—One day when I was alone the door opened and he came in. I was not surprised for I knew it was bound to happen that this fellow who prided himself on his appearance should some day come to the shop of the best barber in the world. He was plainly nervous, but I was calm. He got into my chair and I started to shave him and as I shaved him I told him a story; his story, our story, and as I told him the last of it—now I want you to be very quiet, for I am at your neck—and the thought of what he had done to me, what he had robbed me of, came back to me."

"Good God," said Mr. Harrow, "let me out of here."

"Certainly," said the barber, "you are free to go."

At the door Mr. Harrow turned curiously.

"Did you kill him?"

"No," said the barber, playfully, handing him a mirror, "no, but I gave him a damn bad shave."

"I am single from choice," said Mamie.

"Whose choice?" asked her dearest friend.

They no longer speak.

HIS SADDEST NIGHT.

"To me this is the saddest night of all the year," soliloquized the bachelor in his club on Christmas Eve. "This is the night on which I cannot avoid the haunting reflection that from some source there is coming to me a pair of embroidered suspenders."

—The Mourner.

In the Art World

BY THE ART CRITIC.

The several art exhibitions have attracted society to a large degree. The Bohemian Club exhibition closed Wednesday night. L. P. Latimer's two receptions last week in Maple hall, in connection with his annual pupils' exhibition, drew a fashionable crush on both occasions. Sir Henry Heyman was on the program the first night, Mrs. Richard Rees sang the second night, and there were other musical numbers that interested. Among the best things shown by the pupils were an "Alameda Shore" by O. H. Hansen and a "Tea Kettle" by the same artist; "On Soquel Creek" by J. E. Wison; a study of the Chain of Lakes by Pearl Weisbrod; Marechal Neil roses by M. L. Leffler; a Mill Valley redwoods scene by F. Mairance Boyere; Meadowland by Norma L. Castle, Russian River scenes by Alice V. Meyers and a landscape by Edith Whitefield. Charlotte F. Williams is doing admirable work as are many of the other young women artists. Latimer showed several of his own water colors, a Guerneville scene and a bit of Sierras being perhaps the best.

Members of the Ceramic Club are showing some fine examples of their work this year, and the other porcelain artists are not far behindhand. Marie Thompson, a sister of Charlotte the playwright, had two receptions at her Taylor street studio, when she showed some of her dainty porcelains, and Mrs. Dorn, at her McAllister street studio, gave exhibitions. Mrs. Dorn's pyrographic work is also very artistic.

Some artists at Coppa's the other night were reminiscing about oldtime San Francisco painters, and one mentioned Sam Brookes. Brookes, dead these many years, used to paint an occasional portrait but his specialty was still life, fish and game pieces. He lived up on Bernal Heights and, like that other typical bohemian, Dan O'Connell, had a large family. Once Brookes painted a large fish piece, a salmon and some other varieties, and his children said they lived on fish during the entire progress of the painting. They ate the models.

Christmas Superstitions

The black hellebore, known as the Christmas rose, in some places is believed to be possessed of magical powers. In Devonshire it is placed over the doorway or in some conspicuous position, with devotions and the singing of hymns to purify the dwelling. It also protects cattle from the spells of evil workers. A circle must be drawn with a sword and a prayer to the East addressed to Apollo as a preliminary to obtaining permission to dig the root.

The Jericho rose is believed to have sprouted in the footsteps of the Virgin when she fled into Egypt. The marigold (Mary's gold) is popularly credited with being in blossom on all the Virgin's festivals, a pretty theory which like so many is contradicted by fact.

Christmas greens kept after Candlemas are believed to bring death into the household. Another superstition in connection with the Christmas decorations is that for every leaf which remains in the house after Candlemas (February second) a goblin will domicile itself. If a berry or leaf of the church decoration is left in the pew one of the family will die within the year.

In Yorkshire, contrary to the usual belief, it is accounted sinful to burn the Christmas greens.

In Worcestershire the Christmas mistletoe is fed to the cow which calves first after the New Year. It will insure luck to the whole dairy.

What King?

BY MABEL PORTER PITTS.

What king have we today; the one whose blood
Dark-stained the aspen cross of Calvary
That man might be regenerate through its flood?

Or build we temples underneath His stars
For worship of the hour's divinity
And bend the knee to Plutus, Bel, and Mars?

Each glade an altar hides, each rock a shrine,
Rare incense swings to Venus as of old,
Through cannon's mouth is Odin spake divine.

Great Bacchus still beneath his vine sits crowned Dispensing comfort to these followers
On whom all other oracles have frowned.

Unstable as the gods to whom they pray
Men kneel, low-bowed; each dawn comes questioning,
"What king does man go forth to crown today?"

The Stage

Because We Are Far Away

The stock company appears to be coming into its own once more in San Francisco, the city in which the finest traditions of the American stock system had their birth. San Francisco has always been more or less partial to the stock system, the reason being, perhaps, that it is so far from the centre of things theatrical it cannot keep in touch with the latest productions, and has to depend to a great extent on road companies. Our remoteness has been emphasized in late years by the indifference to our patronage shown by the leading representatives of the theatrical profession. The theatre is now an important factor in the commercial life of New York, and successful productions have such long runs there that managers do not have to eke out their income by sending their first class companies to the coast. There are theatrical stars in New York who play in that city continuously, and others who never wander farther West than Chicago. And so high are the salaries now paid in the profession that when the New York season closes in the summer, the mummies can afford to take a rest. The pampered star scorns to play in the provinces and it is only when a play meets with slight favor that the company is sent on the road in its first season. Even the top-notch chorus girls of Broadway are reluctant to wander far from that gay thoroughfare. The managers keep all their best material in New York and send second and third rate road companies into the provinces. In the circumstances San Francisco must be content with the crumbs that fall from the Syndicate table. And all things considered, we are fortunate in getting so many good attractions from the metropolis. During the year we had with us some of the greatest stars on the stage—Mansfield, Sothorn, Mrs. Fiske, Maude Adams and Mrs. Leslie Carter, and we saw Arnold Daly, the biggest hit of one season in New York, Mary Mannering and Maxine Elliott. Mrs. Langtry visited us, and we had Lillian Russell with Weber and Fields, also the Rogers Brothers. But there are scores of new plays that have been produced and shelved in New York after long runs that we have yet to see. So it is no wonder that the stock company finds this a propitious field.

The Player's Christmas

To that distinguished wit and cynic of the stage, Mr. Wilton Lackaye, who is an occasional contributor to the magazines, I am indebted for the following verses entitled "The Player's Christmas":

In happier climes for luckier men while Carols welcome day,
And sleeping folk are roused by "Waits" with Christmas roundelay.

For us—a pounding Porter at the peaceful hour of three Raucous—bawling, "Git 'ep quick, the 'bus won't wait on 'troopers!' See?"

Oh, the frost is on the tree tops and the snow is in the dell!
(It's a shame we left our rubbers at the "Lake View Grand Hotel!")

But all the joy that poets sing and poetasters rhyme
Are lost in wondering if the train will reach Podunk "on time."

While children of the older growth their yonker's antics view,
And in baby frolics sharing their lost fable-faith renew;
While peace of home and mirth of feast are found on every hand,
We've the dank insult called dinner in a western one-night stand.

While your yule-log's (or your anthracite's, or gas stove's) cheery flame—

(If your "local habitation's" one that's worthy of the "name,"
If in mansion (or in "chambers," or congested flat) you dwell,
Makes all mankind feel the magic of the joyous Christmas spell;
While your table groans (or murmurs) with its (more or less) display,

The mummer's mixing grease paint for the Christmas matinee.

Oh, lords of hearts and dames of homes,
Whose joy of this time speaks,
In the ringing of your laughter, in the holly of your cheeks;
"Twixt the oysters and the coffee let a tearful toast be drunk
To the Player's poor penates in the top-tray of his trunk.

White Whittlesey appeared in Salt Lake City last week, and the critics approved of his acting in "Heartsease" but liked him not so well in "The Second in Command."

MADAME GADSKI,

The great soprano, who will give song recitals at the Alhambra theatre January third, fifth and seventh.

He's the Real Thing

Ki-Ram, the Sultan of Sulu, is a real character that George Ade, artist John T. McCutcheon and other American war correspondents met, studied and sketched from life on his own native Sulu soil. The stories told in Manila of the merry old potentate suggested to Mr. Ade the scheme of making him the central figure in a musical satire dealing with the introduction of American divorce laws and the American cocktail into his primitive tropical paradise.

Madame Melba's engagement with Manager Conried at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, has begun and until early in January her time will be given to appearances with the Metropolitan Opera Company. Melba's reappearance on the operatic stage attracted unusual attention and the demand for seats for the night of her reappearance again proved the great popularity of this artist with the New York public. Manager Ellis, who has charge of Madame Melba's tour in America, has received many evidences that indicate a continuation of the success which attended her concerts up to the New York engagement during the remainder of the tour, which extends into the Northwest, down the Pacific coast, and into the Southern States.

A Gaiety Girl

Grace Palotta, who comes with the Orpheum Road Show for the holidays, is not paying her first visit to San Francisco. She was here some years since at the Baldwin with the famous original London Gaiety company in "A Gaiety Girl." She was one of the skirt dancers with the organization and her "corkscrew" was the most wonderful dance of its kind that had ever been seen here before, or has been seen here since. Decima Moore, the pretty Brighton girl, was also of the company. The London Gaiety girls are different from any other stage dancers, enjoying a reputation for absolute uniqueness in their line. From their ranks the Peerage has been recuperated, several Gaiety girls having married into the nobility. Connie Gilchrist was a Gaiety girl. The first visit of the London Gaieties to San Francisco was many years ago, when "Faust Up to Date" was presented at the Baldwin, the stars of the show being four Gaiety girls headed by Florence St. John.

In the Limelight

In Clara Morris's memoirs, that have been running serially in an Eastern magazine, she tells of her first meeting with the late Mrs. Gilbert. Mrs. Gilbert was the oldest member of the company (Daly's) and Miss Morris a newcomer. The latter had a letter of introduction to the older actress, but had not presented it. According to Clara Morris Mrs. Gilbert "was gray, even then, plain of feature, but sweet of voice and very gentle of manner."

Fritzi Scheff is to revive "Fatinitza" and other old comic operas.

May Yohe is now uttering strange sounds on the vaudeville stage in New York.

HAZEL CLAYTON, BERNICE HARTE AND GRACE CORWIN,

Of "The Sultan of Sulu" company. They are distinct types of beauty, Miss Clayton being a brunette, Miss Harte a blonde, and Miss Corwin a Titian blonde. A more ambitious trio never invaded comic opera. It is their intention to go to Europe at the close of the present season, to complete their musical education.

"Peaceful Valley"

On Monday the Alcazar stock company presented that delightful old play, "Peaceful Valley." It is a clean, wholesome play in which the interest never flags for a moment. It is a play that appeals to many a tender emotion—the love of home, the attachment of brother and sister, the devotion of a doting mother and the love of a maid for a man. The dialogue is bright and crisp, full of repartee, and nothing better has been done for a long time than the quick change of the college student who "waits" at the summer resort to help himself through college, into the young man who declares he'll stay and be a guest where he was discharged as a waiter, and the money that is owing to him can be taken for his board. Mr. John Craig, with his "Just drop in on mother," made a hit as Hosea Howe the student waiter and son of Phyllis Howe (Miss Laura Adams), a doting mother who imagines that all the city girls at once fall in love with her "Hosey," and who does not hesitate to ask her young lady callers, "Be you come philandering?" Miss Lillian Lawrence as Virgie Rand, the wealthy heiress who falls in love with Hosea, was very sweet, pretty and winsome. Mr. Harry Van Meter as Mr. Leonard Rand, the millionaire father of Virgie under the influence of Ward Andrews, the villain, quite looked the part, and acted with sufficient choler to represent the attitude of the irate father toward a young man not of his choice. Mr. Luke Connors as Jack Farquhar, and Miss Elizabeth Woodson as Niobe, his sister, were congenially cast. Jack in his half-drunken condition was the work of a clever character artist. Later his emotion over the return of Martha Howe—the deceived yet lawfully married wife—was a fine bit of acting, not overdrawn. Miss Ruth Allen as Martha Howe was very gentle and convincing as the daughter returning to her old home. Jotham Ford as the old innkeeper was a laughable piece of comedy, leaving the audience in some doubt as to whether it was his chin whiskers or the antics of his legs which made him so funny. Mr. Harry Hilliard was very effective as the boyish son of the millionaire, who didn't like to work. The Ward Andrews of Mr. Harry McAuliffe was a trifle stiff, but the character is a detestable one, and could not please.

Two Little Waifs at the Central

In our kid days we used to worry our minds over the woes of Horatio Alger Jr.'s Ragged Dick, Tattered Tom, Paul the Peddler and Phil the Fiddler. In "Two Little Waifs" at the Central this week I am reminded of those stories of Alger. The two little waifs are acted by children who were brought on from Chicago to enact the roles, and they are very bright child actors. The play shows New York in the holiday season, and is well fitted to draw upon the sympathies of charitably inclined people and make them remember the poor little waifs of our own city. The brunt of the emotional work in the piece falls upon Edna Ellsmere, and other roles are ably filled by Miss Vane, Halifax, Shumer, Mayall and the rest of the stock players.

At the Orpheum

It is some time since a slack wire performer has appeared at the Orpheum and therefore the turn of Lucy and Viato is of special interest. They are quite attractive young women, and their work on the wire is daring and agile. The performing parrots and cockatoos trained by Albertina Melich are rather more novel than the dogs and cats and seals that during the year disported themselves on the Orpheum stage. Miss Melich has evidently spent much time and patience in training the birds and the result is more than satisfactory. Farland, the banjo virtuoso, and Aidi Hemmi, soprano, give very enjoyable musical numbers.

Just Melodrama, That's All

Little Breeches come to life is the chief motif in "Jim Bludso," at the Majestic. The play is a melodrama, not so good as some of Joaquin Miller's and Bret Harte's, but full of the thrills that lovers of melodrama would regret to be deprived of. It is a series of climaxes, and fights are every-minute occurrences. It is really wonderful how well the Majestic players adapt themselves to melodrama when one recalls their clever work in the society dramas. Gould is the one exception. He melodramatizes nearly all roles. But he is the bluff, good-natured, generous Bludso as John Hay depicted him in his poem. Gilmour plays the villain in a cold-blooded way, without exaggeration, that intensifies the impression of the character. Miss Black is very much at home in the part of the girl who loves Jim, and Miss Gordon vitalizes Gabrielle artistically. It is really astonishing what strides Eleanor Gordon has made in her art during the last few months.

T O W N T A L K

She seems to be imbued with that intense ambition that throws itself heart and soul into the work at hand, never slurring or slighting what is given her, though it may be entirely out of the line of acting for which she knows herself fitted. As Miss Gordon is a handsome girl, with a perfect figure, she is usually given parts that call for gown displays, but in "Jim Bludso" her role is one that calls for talent only.

"The Billionaire"

Harry B. Smith, the most prolific of playwrights, must have written "The Billionaire" after a season of rest. It bears not the slightest trace of fatigue or brain fag. It is a musical comedy that bubbles with spontaneous humor. But Smith is not alone entitled to credit for the charm of this latest Columbia theatre attraction. It is the breeziness and effervescence of the production that captivate. The art of the stage manager is beautifully blended with the theme. The latest wrinkles in stage business are in fine relief. The show goes with a snap and a dash that appeal to the seasoned theatregoer. It is to laugh at the nonsense of it, and admire the pretty pictures and dainty women. There are several clever people in the company and they seem to enter enthusiastically into the spirit of the performance, a spirit that is refreshing and delightful. Thomas Q. Seabrooke is the principal comedian, and he is a comedian, one that, unfortunately for us, spends too much of his time in New York. He is one of the best singing comedians on the stage. One of the most pleasing hits of the exceptionally charming performance is his duet with Miss Diamond Donner, "She Reads the New York Papers Every Day." There is some very sprightly dancing in this duet. Seabrooke exudes geniality and Miss Donner, a graceful dancer, "has a way wiz her" that is quite diverting. The last act is a most amusing conceit, a theatre in which the audience accentuates the eccentricities of the real thing. This act is shriekingly funny.

"Old Heidelberg" in Dispute

A clash has occurred between our two stock houses, the Alcazar and Majestic. The management of the latter recently announced that it would produce "In Old Heidelberg," the original Mansfield version, in the first week in January. The Alcazar management had announced "Lost River" as its attraction for next week, but later it was decided to substitute "In Old Heidelberg"—the original Mansfield version. And now comes Manager Price of the Alcazar with words of explanation. He says that the Alcazar secured the rights to the play through Alice Kauser, a dramatic agent in New York, from the Shuberts, who are the sole owners. The Alcazar secured the manuscript and music and secretly prepared for the production. Subsequently the management of the Majestic secured the play from another agent. In proof of the Alcazar's claim to rights of production, Mr. Price submits the following telegrams:

"New York, Dec. 19th.

"Belasco & Mayer:

"Shuberts are wiring Morosco no right to produce 'Heidelberg' and will telegraph you notice for papers that you alone have the rights thereto.

Alice Kauser."

"New York, Dec. 20th.

"Belasco & Mayer:

"You have the rights to 'Old Heidelberg' for San Francisco. Any other announcements unauthorized. Wishing you all success, Shubert Brothers."

I have not been advised as to whether injunction proceedings are to be instituted; nor has it been explained why Shubert Brothers put the play into the hands of two agents. However the clash will serve to advertise the play which is one of the most delightful dramas ever seen in this city.

George Osbourne's retirement from the Alcazar is only temporary. He told his audience at his farewell last Sunday night that he would return from Europe and be in harness again next spring. There were flowers and valuable gifts from management and actors, and Osbourne phrased his thanks very gracefully and with deep feeling. He is too fine an artist to be lost to us, and the tremendous send-off given to him on Sunday night proved how close he is to the hearts of local playgoers.

THEY WERE FROM BALTIMORE.

Wife: The dinner will not be complete without oysters.

Husband: But you can't get decent oysters out here.

Wife: Mrs. Laguna Street had them at her last dinner—they were delicious. She said they came from Darbee & Immel's in O'Farrell street.

Another American dramatist has made his appearance—C. M. S. McLellan—who has made money as a writer of comic opera librettos under the pseudonym of Hugh Morton. His first serious play, "Lea Kleschna," has won approval in New York.

Mrs. M. Ella Harris

A WOMAN WITH A MISSION

It is one of the peculiar features of our times that women have "missions" and "ambitions" not confined by the four walls of home. Women of refinement and even of wealth are entering business and professional fields not merely of necessity, but for the love of the game and the good they can do.

Prominent among these womanly business women of the Pacific coast is M. Ella Harris of this city. Mrs. Harris's mission is beauty. To smooth the wrinkled brow of age, and erase the facial blemishes of disease or misfortune, that is her beneficent work. The masterful witchery of her skill is the result of inherited natural gifts, years of practical experience as a pharmacist and other years of study and practice as a dermatologist. Her father was a Tyrell of Vermont, who married a Noel, granddaughter of Philippe Noel, one of the first French settlers of Ohio who took a notable part in the war of 1812. In Mrs. Harris are blended the ingenuity of the Yankee, artistic sense of the French people, beside the hardy self-reliance of the pioneer.

In 1883 she took up the study of pharmacy and chemistry in the East, remaining in the drug business there until 1888 when, with son and daughter, she came West to golden California. Until 1891 she conducted a drug business, part of the time two stores, in Humboldt county; they are doing a prosperous business there now, one in Eureka and the other in Fortuna. On her office wall today hangs a diploma from the California State Board of Pharmacy, a memento of her druggist years. Being a woman in the drug business, she had been so besieged by anxious women who wished her to prepare remedies for their facial ailments that her attention was compelled to the study of the subject. While treating one of these cases she made her wonderful discovery by which she is able to create literally a new cuticle, free from the disfigurements of the old, as fresh as a baby's. This discovery convinced her that here was her call to service. In perfecting and extending her usefulness in this science of beauty she has spent many years of study and thousands of dollars. Some three years ago she came to San Francisco from Los Angeles. During this short time she has beautified hundreds of faces. One meeting Mrs. Harris is at once impressed with the womanly dignity of her bearing. She is gifted with a strongly magnetic personality, which claims the most implicit confidence of her patients and explains the great numbers that have placed themselves in her skillful hands for her scientific treatment. Her offices have become the Mecca of men and women who sensibly give attention to the cultivation of their natural beauty as well as to dress. They believe with Ella Wheeler Wilcox that people should "take the same pains to become beautiful that they do to become learned or accomplished."

Lorena Atwood, who used to play in melodrama during her San Francisco engagements, is now supporting Kyle Bellew as Mrs. Vidal in "Raffles." Before that she was with Gillette in "Sherlock Holmes." Miss Atwood is a California girl, and has been in the support of Louis Morrison, McKee Rankin, the late James A. Herne, and Milton Nobles.

Edna Wallace Hopper, under Frank McKee's management in "A Country Mouse," will be here shortly.

S. L. ACKERMAN,

who for the past three years has been the manager of the Grand Opera House, is the possessor of great executive ability. When he took charge of the theatre it was the home of the tank, the fire engine and the railroad train melodrama, but by his taste and discretion, he soon altered the state of things, and today the bookings of the Grand Opera House include the very best attractions in America. San Francisco is indebted to him for the engagement of Weber and Fields, Mrs. Fiske, and Mrs. Leslie Carter. Among the attractions he has arranged for in the near future are Blanche Bates in Belasco's "The Darling of the Gods," J. C. Fisher's original production of "The Silver Slipper," Klaw and Erlanger's colossal spectacle, "Mother Goose," also a return engagement of "Ben Hur." Mr. Ackerman is as well known in New York as he is in San Francisco, and is very popular with the theatrical magnates of the East, who entertain the highest respect for his judgment and ability, and give the most careful attention and consideration to his opinions. He is a man of literary and artistic tastes and the possessor of one of the finest private libraries in the State.

A SCIENTIFIC REMEDY.

Modern science is a wonderful thing, and we learn a great deal about submarine boats and Marconi, but we do not pay enough attention to medical science. Daily, some new discovery is made. A wonderful remedy which is becoming rapidly known is "GLYCOZONE," manufactured by the noted French chemist, Dr. Marchand. It is a revelation in the treatment of stomach troubles, some of the cures being marvellous. One of our reporters came across an instance of this the other day. A lady in San Francisco, who had for many years been a great sufferer from indigestion, and whose case had been brought up by her California physician before the Congress of Homeopathic Physicians, held in Chicago in 1901, was finally recommended by an eminent specialist on intestinal diseases to try GLYCOZONE. His advice was followed, and a miraculous and permanent cure was effected. The lady in question was Miss C. Minnie Perry, 2102 Sutter street, and she volunteers this information from a spirit of fellow feeling for people who suffer as she did.

—The Rounder

who for nearly seven years has been the treasurer of the Grand Opera House, is recognized as one of the cleverest theatrical men in the country. He is at all times dignified and courteous and is one of the most popular men in the community. Besides acting as treasurer to the theatre, he is also private secretary to Mr. S. L. Ackerman, who reposes such through confidence in him that in his absence he leaves him in full control of the Grand Opera House. Mr. Campbell is as much liked socially as he is professionally and is a prominent member of the Masonic and Elks fraternities.

"Is Colonel Rich in good standing at his club?"

"Usually until midnight—then he is carried to his auto."

CARD AND LOOSE LEAF SYSTEMS.

$2.00 buys a card index drawer, 500 record cards, alphabetical index and guide cards. Shaw-Walker filing systems, loose-leaf ledgers, price books and complete office outfits, including printing and bookbinding. Stationery Department, Sanborn, Vail & Co., 741 Market street.

A good cup of coffee is an admirable stimulant to the exhausted Christmas shopper. It is also the fitting close to the Christmas dinner. For the best cup of coffee, use Arner Brothers' "Very Best," the most nutritious, palatable and delicious coffee on the market.

Whenever a tourist comes to San Francisco, one of the first things he asks is: "Where is the Diamond Palace?" For Colonel A. Andrews' store at 221 Montgomery street has world-wide fame. The finest selection of diamonds, in the most artistic settings, are those to be seen at the Diamond Palace.

Spend the Christmas Holidays at Hotel del Monte

The country never looked prettier ....

The golf links were never greener ....

THIS is to tell you that by reason of remarkable natural conditions, this present winter season of 1904-05 is far advanced, so that the months of December and January are sure to be like Spring, with Summer peeping around the corner. The golf links sweeping over the hillsides that slope from blue Monterey Bay were never greener, meadow larks carol among the live-oaks, palms and pines send forth young buds and branches, flaming dahlias wave in the breeze. This isn't the season for midsummer gaiety, but it's just the time and the best time for you to take a week or so of idling rest, cheerfully mingled with sport on the golf links, on horseback, climbing the mountains that rise to the eastward, or angling for the game fish of the bay.

Remember this, that Hotel del Monte offers more natural attractions and more comforts and luxuries than any other resort in the world. Remember, too, that the climate here is delightful every day in the year, and should the warm rains keep you indoors, there's bowling for exercise and miles of corridors and glass-inclosed porches. Remember, too, that this hotel is fashionable only because it offers the best; that it is popular because everyone can here have a good time, any time, every time. Remember, too, that it's a home place, where the children can be happy, and families can enjoy themselves for months without disturbing household cares. Why not plan to spend a week or two here? Get out your golf sticks and woo Mother Nature and good health on the luring links.

Special over Christmas or over New Year's Day rate — Saturday to Monday — from San Francisco, including railway fare and two days' board at the hotel, only $10.00.

Leave Third and Townsend Street depot at 3 o'clock (parlor car) reaching the hotel at 6:48.

GEO. P. SNELL, Manager,
DEL MONTE, CALIFORNIA.

Next Week's Bills

The holiday offerings at the theatres are of unusual attractiveness. "The Sultan of Sulu" will be at the Columbia, opening Monday night. The Sultan played a six months' engagement at Wallack's, New York, and also had long runs in Boston, Chicago and Philadelphia. The words and lyrics are by George Ade, author of "Fables in Slang," and the music is by Alfred G. Wathall, professor of music of the Northwestern university. The foreign setting has afforded the author, the costumer, the scenic painter and the composer unusual opportunities and great comic opera latitude. The music is tuneful and popular and the song hits many. Thomas Whiffen heads the cast.

Hoyt's "A Contented Woman" will be put forth at the Majestic as the attraction for the holiday week. The play will be handsomely staged and the cast will be strong. On Friday night Golden Gate Council No. 80, United Commercial Travelers of America, will take a benefit at Mr. Bishop's playhouse. During the week following (New Year's) the Richard Mansfield play "In Old Heidelberg" will be offered on an exceptionally ornate scale. Ella Wheeler Wilcox's much heralded Biblical drama in blank verse, "Mizpah, or the story of Esther," will be given an elaborate premier at Mr. Bishop's theatre. There will be a special holiday matinee Monday of "A Contented Woman."

BURTON HOLMES,

The famous traveler, who will deliver a series of new lectures at Lyric hall, beginning January tenth.

After a run of three hundred and forty-two nights at the Belasco, New York, and a St. Louis engagement of one hundred and forty-five performances during the World's Fair, Blanche Bates will open a three weeks' engagement in David Belasco's Japanese drama, "The Darling of the Gods," at the Grand next Monday evening. This production is one to which San Francisco playgoers have looked forward with singular interest. Produced by a Californian playwright, the leading role is assumed by a Californian woman and a number of the principal parts are taken by players who have already achieved distinction in this city. Aside from Miss Bates, the Californians who will appear in her support are Mrs. F. M. Bates, her mother, Ada Lewis, Leslie Preston, Grace Ellison, Eugene Ormonde, George Wessells and Thomas J. McGrane. The story of the play is strictly Japanese, and is historical. The scenery is superb, as all those who saw the play in the East asseverate. In two wonderful tableaux that evidence the extraordinary stagecraft of David Belasco, the heroine, Princess Yo-San, is seen wandering through the River of Souls piteously crying out the name of Kara, her lover, whom she finally reaches ascending through the misty clouds of heaven.

"In Old Heidelberg" will be the Christmas week attraction at the Alcazar, opening with a special holiday matinee next Monday. This is the romantic play of German court and student life in which Mansfield and Ida Conquest drew the town last May. It is assured an elaborate and brilliant presentation. The long cast is headed by John Craig as Prince Karl and Lillian Lawrence as Kathie. The Alcazar will give the play for the first time upon any stock theatre stage. Joseph Arthur's "Lost River" will be given New Year's week.

King Dodo sends this holiday greeting to his San Francisco subjects, from his throne on the Tivoli stage: "I will give two extra Christmas matinees," he says, "one of them will occur on Sunday afternoon, December twenty-fifth. The other will be celebrated on Monday afternoon, December twenty-sixth." This dictum from King Dodo is a command that all his loyal subjects will hasten to obey and it is a foregone conclusion that the big opera house will be crowded with merrymakers at the holiday matinees aforesaid. King Dodo will reign every night as well and the fourth week of his occupancy of the Tivoli's throne will begin on Christmas day. There will be a grand transformation scene on the stage. It will include a series of appropriate pictures of Christmastide and the holiday time, illustrating a Child's Dream of Christmas and the beautiful sentiment that animates all mankind during the glad time when Santa Claus brings joy to children's hearts and scatters seeds of happiness among the unfortunate. There will be a real Santa Claus in the pictures and a huge Christmas tree.

"The Heart of Chicago," at the Central, is a sensational melodrama in five acts requiring a large cast. All of Carter's plays are luridly melodramatic with a vein of comedy sandwiched in to relieve the heaviness and "The Heart of Chicago" is said to be one of his best. The scenic effects include the court of honor, which was a feature of the Chicago World's Fair, the terrible fire that laid bare the streets of the great metropolis, a great train effect, a roof garden at night and a battle for life and death in which a man is hurled over the building to a fearful death. Mayall will play the leading part.

Sunday afternoon the Orpheum Road Show will begin a limited engagement at the Orpheum. McIntyre and Heath need no introduction to San Francisco amusement lovers; they promise a comedy bit fully in keeping with their past endeavors. Others on the bill are Spessard's bears and ponies, a European sensation, Grace Palotta and the Four Millinery Maids, in a singing novelty, Frank and Jen Latona, original specialty, Clarice Vance, singer of Southern songs, Harry Smirl and Rose Kessner, "The Bell Boy and the Maid," in their acrobatic act, and Probst the Great, who imitates birds, animals, machinery and everything under the sun that makes a noise.

The Chutes has a delightful holiday attraction, in Bothwell Browne's Japanese musical extravaganza, "Princess Fan Tan." The piece is magnificently mounted, the costumes and scenery being gorgeous and picturesque. On Sunday and Monday afternoons, at the conclusion of the performance, a beautifully decorated Christmas tree will be disclosed, from which every child in attendance will be given a present.

The Christmas number of The Sunday Bulletin will be out tomorrow with its sixty-four pages of capital features illustrated by the leading local artists. Among its varied and interesting contents are: What I consider a well dressed woman, by well known society fashionables; The Christmas confessions of a candy girl by one of them; What I owe to California, by famous California actresses; a touching Christmas story by Elizabeth Mills; a plea for Christmas by Ian Maclaren; Dishes that have made California famous for hospitality; Christmas Hymn, with music, by the Bishop of Ripon; The Story of the Successful Women Farmers of California; "The New San Francisco," as planned by Architect Burnham, the "builder of cities," told by Willis Polk; New Tricks in Christmas Magic, written by Professor Herrmann for The Sunday Bulletin, and a score of other features just as interesting. Special Christmas articles will be contributed by Dorothy Dix, Madame Bavard, Frances Joliffe, Grant Wallace, Lowell Otus Reese, John T. Waldorf and other well known writers. "Double Harness," Anthony Hope's latest novel, is concluded in the Sunday Call Magazine tomorrow. On January first will begin "The Brethren," a tale of the Crusades, written by H. Rider Haggard. This is the latest book by the famous author of "She," "Allan Quartermain," "King Solomon's Mines" and a dozen other equally well known romances, and has been received throughout the East with unstinted praise. Other features of note will be "The Raging of the Sea," one of Norman Duncan's powerful Newfoundland stories; "Jottings of Old Lim Jucklin," by Opie Read; "What Women Want to Know," by Madge Moore; "On and Off the Bread Wagon," by Charles Dryden; the fifty dollar prize story, "Red Head," an Arizona story by a woman who has lived the life of the Arizona cowboy, E. Damien Thompson; review of the week's books, by Robert Ritchie; and the regular music and puzzle page.

In Financial Circles

A resume of the week's business shows another falling off, total transactions showing 199,000 Bonds and 3,448 Shares, divided as follows: 155 Lighting, 626 Spring Valley Water, 507 Miscellaneous, 70 Bank shares, and 2,090 Sugars. The San Francisco Gas and Electric Company declared the usual quarterly dividend of $1.1-4. Spring Valley Water showed considerable strength throughout the week, closing at 39 1-2. Alaska Packers remained steady. Most of the trading was done in Sugar stocks without materially changing quotations. The Stock and Bond Exchange is about to move into its new quarters in the Merchants' Exchange Building. If business is to be augmented, the brokers will have to show a little more get-up in Sugar; if not, I cannot see where the improvement is to come from.

*AT CHRISTMAS TIME we should be friends with all things; friends above all, with our highest ideals. We should seek to develop the best there is in us, knowing that we must thereby be instrumental in the highest development of others. We should be happy, if only because we thus bring happiness to others. We should cease to struggle against the harmony of things, which is natural, and will develop of itself, if we but take our ease. Let us work, indeed, but comfortably, accomplishing our allotted task in the pleasant feeling that we are helping friends rather than defeating enemies. Let us lose no time in working for the things that bring happiness to no one, and we will gain for ourselves the great content that is born of labor for the good of all. Let us eliminate the sham in our lives, and in all the little things that influence our lives. Let us refuse to work for Sham Things. THUS THE HOLIDAYS WILL REMAIN WITH US AND THE HOLIDAY SPIRIT WILL CROWN OUR DAYS.

Protest

BY ELWYN HOFFMAN.

When the madness of gold, and the madness of power,
Have ravished my country and laid her supine —
A lewd, vulgar thing in a cold, songless bower —
O God! pluck the sight from these poor eyes of mine!
May I lie as dead dust under dust that is dead,
With each sensitive nerve gone the way of the dust,
Ere the spiritual light of my land shall have fled
And her moral love vanished in rapine and lust.

Though navies may watch by a lengthening coast,
And armies keep guard o'er a broadening land;
Though Empire may shout with its old, Roman boast
And build itself high with a strong, iron hand —
Though cities may roar by the sea and the plain,
Broad-streeted, high-towered — rich, mansion and mart —
Her glory shall rot, and her hopes shall be vain,
When her soul shall lie dead by a dry, shriveled heart!

Nor her blades nor her guns shall my country defend,
Nor her wealth hold her high on the throne of her power,
When the flames of her soul, in expiring, descend,
And stunted Morality fails of a flower.
Her people shall walk on a desert of wrath,
Hammered down and made one with the rock and the clod;
When Beauty shall stand, a dead stalk by their path,
Stripped bare of its blooms and their whispers of God.

Then Honor shall be but a meaningless name,
And Virtue, a sneer on the cold lips of Scorn;
And Love — tender Love — shall be sold without shame,
And Duty shall be as a thing never born.
For the Heaven-sent light will have fled from man's mind,
And the song and the hope will have died in his heart;
And an ogre have led him, worn, shaken and blind,
To barter his soul for the dross of the mart.

May my eyes never see it! May history tell
How this fair land revived when just dying, and caught
The Vision departing — and e'en as she fell Recovered herself, and rose stronger, and wrought
Once more for the spiritual graces that lead
Both nations and men to the highest and best —
That make for true progress, and keep live the seed
Of all that shall stand at the ultimate test.

The Old Beau's Christmas

BY JOHN ROBERTS.

The old beau ran up the club steps with his usual jauntiness. When he reached the top of the inner flight he paused, pulled off his waistcoat, handed it to the servant, and then settling the violets in his lapel, sauntered into the first reading-room.

On the threshold of the smoking den he paused a second time and his eye took in a long vista of emptiness. A newspaper in the farther corner, held with purpose to conceal, attracted his attention, and, as he approached the reader, his step assumed a little swagger of importance.

"Well?" said the old beau, pulling his grey moustache, his eyes quizzical and interrogating.

A pair of spectacles and a grim visage reared from over the headlines.

"Not dining out?" said the old beau, his voice sinking to a pitying inflection.

"No," was the laconic answer, and Courtenay's grizzled head retired once more behind the last edition, the knuckles tightening on the sheet.

"Why, there's your sister Fanny," said the old beau tentatively, "don't you always dine with her on holidays?"

"Yes; somehow it always ends up that way."

"Well," the questioner craned his neck out of the immaculate collar, and there was a certain eagerness mixed with the protest—"you are not going to desert her this year!"

The old beau waited a moment but there was no response, and, whistling blithely, he passed down the comfortable, unoccupied apartment, warm and bright with its blazing fire, its soft rugs and pictures, and its general air of expectancy.

Courtenay slyly lowered his paper, his glance following the old beau's progress. He noted the slim elegant legs ending in the well-fitting boot, the parted hair, brushed in a way to conceal the thinness, the assertive manner, the half-concealed impatience of a delayed appointment. His lips grew straighter and he went back to the notes of the stock exchange with a skeptical grin.

The old beau sank into an arm-chair and stretched his legs to the blaze, then he leaned forward, elbows on his knees, and, holding his hands out to the warmth, rubbed them together with gleeful briskness. He suspected Courtenay's absorption and prepared to meet the eagle keenness of those pitiless eyes. He fancied the gray-haired financier held his habitual smartness in supreme contempt, and that some unpleasant doubt lingered in his astute mind; so to refute the unspoken charge, he rose and rang the bell sharply.

When Hansen, humble and impassive, presented himself in response to the summons, there was a suggestion of hauteur in the old beau's manner. "Did—" he hesitated, and putting his hand to his mouth mingled a cough with some unintelligible name—"did any message come for me?"

Hansen shook his head; "No sir," he answered.

"Most extraordinary!" murmured the old beau, poking the fire with energy. "Most extraordinary," he repeated. His face settled into a forced pleasantness.

Just as the clock struck half after six Thompson and Emery looked in, bringing cheer and damp and holiday hurry.

Thompson had been benedict for a year and Emery was to marry his wife's sister. There was a certain joyous partnership between them, a hint of unspoken confidences and happy anticipations.

A wave of youth, and hope, and human nearness seemed to rush down the empty rooms; hand clasps and gentleness of women; the smell of fresh greens; laughter and good-will; surprises and gratified exclamations seemed to find voice in the silence.

Something in the old beau's attitude struck Emery. "I wonder," he pulled his prospective brother-in-law's arm, "I wonder if he isn't going out—somewhere," he pointed to the arm-chair.

"Oh, of course he is," responded the other, "why the old beau is the most sought after man in town. Come along, Bob, it's getting late." And, nothing loth, the younger man hastened after his host, haunted by visions of mistletoe and a tall fair girl in white.

A newspaper rustled audibly, then a determined step pressed into the heavy carpet and Courtenay, pausing under the chandelier, bent a stern, comprehensive look upon the old beau. For more than either cared to remember these two men, the financier and the man of fashion, had greeted and parted and gone their way; the cotillion favor and the cheek-book; and now they met and faced each other, and life lay behind them, and they knew it, and yet grimly and surely they met each other's eye. The old beau rose in his chair, and pulling his coat together said in the usual sprightly tone: "So soon, it's early—" and then he broke off suddenly for there was something accusing, uncompromising, and yet friendly in the features under the heavy brows.

"Good-night," said Courtenay briefly. He beckoned to Hansen to fetch his great coat, and a few moments later a cab rattled away.

From the foggy, dull streets the square building presented a picture of comfort with its blazing windows, its wide doorway, its general air of waiting hospitality. But it was empty and the old beau shivered. He looked around, then settled back in his chair, his feet on the fender, his head sunk on his breast.

That last stroke was too much. Courtenay had suspected that he was not dining anywhere, that no one had asked him to join in home festivities, and the loneliness that gripped him in the exchange of that one look, the knowledge that Courtenay understood and shared in something unexpressed, took all the jauntiness from his demeanor. He had made Fanny in the old days, when she was young and plump and pretty. He had put her in the first set and helped her carry off a husband. And now she had her babies and the old dancing days of gew-gaws and tinsel had passed with her girlhood—and he—the old beau—was forgotten. Scores of faces came to haunt him; faces dimpled and smiling, expectant and radiant, looked up at him in shy gratitude; and then, the same faces grown cold in their own triumphs, turned from him to someone else; and, standing at the ball-room door, he saw them vanish in the whirl of the dance and the mists of years. He had kissed many a Titania into the social midsummer night's dream; he held the key of many a family cupboard where the skeleton dangled; his feasts had been the most successful of the season; his authority had been infallible, and now! He sank lower in the chair, his chin crushing out the flower in his buttonhole. This night no one claimed the favors he had it in his power to bestow. The glitter and the falseness, and the weary graciousness had dropped away from the night. It was the night of the one star, of simple, homely things—of good-will. He thought of Toney, of the too ready reception, and then he shrank away at the thought of her on such a night. This was the time of innocence, of love.

He saw the children that might have been, the girl with the mother's eyes, and the little chap climbing upon his knee, a sturdy miniature of himself; the secrecy, the rush, the overwhelming gladness; and then the infinite tenderness when silence closed out the world in peace of home.

He shut his eyes upon the sight of two red stockings suspended from the mantel, and the cling of the little chap's arms almost strangled him. "Run to bed now," he heard himself saying, and then he seemed to speak more softly, fearing to be obeyed.

"Please sir," said Hansen, standing at his elbow, "the cabman's waiting to know if he's to stay any longer, sir?"

The old beau sprang to his feet, rubbing his hand across his dazed eyes. "By all means, tell him I'm expecting someone!" His eyes wandered to the clock. Ten past ten. Fanny's children were just trooping in to the tree. He turned to the servant.

"Tell him, Hansen," he faltered, "tell him to go—and get some Xmas—and—" he hesitated, "he needn't wait—I'll walk." Fumbling in his pocket the old beau drew out two gold pieces. "Keep one for yourself, Hansen," he said, going back to his chair.

The Result of Her Philanthropy

BY SARAH WILLIAMSON.

Marion Harrison was always doing things that surprised her family and friends. Sometimes it was giving Paris frocks to girls who could not buy them out of their own pocket-money, and sometimes it was presenting houses and lots to her poor relatives. One time she invited two impecunious girls to take a trip abroad with her at her expense, and just the Christmas before she had given an automobile to her cousin Charlie, a young man about town who could manage to pay his club dues and bar bills, and that was about all.

Therefore when Marion confided to her dearest chum, Ethelwyn Rudolph, that she intended to spring a surprise on the guests at her Christmas dinner, Ethelwyn only said, "Of course," and waited for an explanation.

"It's a girl," said Miss Harrison, "a beautiful girl. There's no one in our set who can hold a candle to her for beauty."

"Do I know her?" asked Miss Rudolph, running over in her mind all the beauties of her acquaintance, and wondering which was the one. Not Lillie Bell, she was sure, for Lillie was snub-nosed and ashen-haired, and Isabel Lee was gawky and freckled. Both of these girls were proteges of Miss Harrison.

"No, not any one at all that you know, though you may have seen her," said Marion, quickly. "This girl is a stunning beauty. Her name is Margaret Ross. She works in a glove store, and has fitted me many a time. She is a lovely girl, too, and I mean to give her a little treat."

"You surely won't ask her to meet our friends?" asked Ethelwyn, who was a bit of a snob.

"That's just what I'm going to do. You see my idea is that girls of her class never meet the right kind of people. I have often talked with her as she fitted my gloves on, and I find her so much brighter and wittier than any girls one meets in society. I want to give her a chance to mingle with us, and put a little sunshine into her dreary workaday life."

"I don't believe she'll come," said Ethelwyn, who did not see any sense in trying social experiments.

"Yes, she will, for I've asked her. I had to beg her a bit, of course, for she's proud. But I made her promise to come."

"I suppose you'll give her a gown?"

"No—she wouldn't take it," returned Marion, much to her friend's surprise as she remembered how many girls of their own set had not been too proud to accept smart frocks from Miss Harrison.

Ethelwyn was sworn to secrecy, and Marion told no one else of the surprise she had prepared for her guests. Her annual Christmas dinner was considered quite the event by Miss Harrison's friends, and there was always a deal of heart-burning among those not asked to share the heiress's hospitality on the occasion.

It was a very select company that gathered about the table on Christmas day. The decorations were in harmony with the occasion, and the most brilliant touch of all, as Marion's cousin Charlie confided to Ethelwyn Rudolph, was the "new girl."

"Who is Miss Ross, do you know her?" he asked, "where did Marion find her? Isn't she the sweetest thing that ever happened?"

But Ethelwyn refused to say a word that would enlighten him.

Margaret Ross really looked superbly beautiful. She was a brown-eyed blonde, with clear skin through which the red blood of health glowed brilliantly, and with hair of the natural golden tint. She was simply gowned in white, with her neck and arms, shapely and slender, half-concealed by a thin net covering. She had made the frock herself, after much consultation with the other girls at the store, and many perusals of the fashion magazines. The result pleased even Marion Harrison's fastidious eye.

"Wasn't I right?" asked the hostess of Miss Rudolph, before they entered the dining-room. "Isn't she the dearest dear?"

"Oh, just wait awhile and see how she acts," rejoined Ethelwyn, who was always skeptical of the results of her friend's whims. She had half expected to see the stranger appear in an outré garment, high-necked and long-sleeved.

But Miss Ross committed no gaucheries. Her manners were as perfect as her garb. She did not even appear awed at her close proximity to those smart people of whom she had read in the society papers and now mingled with on terms of equality. Neither did she commit the other extreme of being too bold. She held her own with dignity. Marion had given her Tom Brinckerhoff, her own particular admirer, as a right-hand neighbor, and cousin Charlie was at her left. Both men appeared to be de-

Villa Lots in San Mateo Park, $6 per foot and up
City Lots in the Hayward Addition, $20 per foot and up

OUR SALES IN THESE PROPERTIES AMOUNT TO MORE THAN

$150,000

No wonder that lots are selling fast in San Mateo Park.

IT IS BECAUSE San Mateo Park is high and slightly and many of the lots command a fine view of the Bay and Mt. Diablo.

BECAUSE beautiful shade trees adorn all the wide and gracefully winding avenues.

BECAUSE the soil is deep and fertile. Flowers, trees and plants of every variety grow luxuriantly.

BECAUSE people of moderate means as well as millionaires find it a congenial place for a home.

BECAUSE it is the only suburban property (except a portion of Burlingame Park and Burlingame Town) with a perfect sewer system draining to tide water.

BECAUSE pure water is supplied to residents at lower rates than are charged in San Mateo City.

BECAUSE, in the language of President Roosevelt, every purchaser gets a "square deal."

Hayward Addition

SAN MATEO is destined to be a large city. Its greatest growth will be towards the North and the South and West of the railroad. The Hayward Addition is in the direct line of this expansion. The main business thoroughfare of the city extends through the center of the property.

COMPARE the prices we are asking for lots on this street with those one and two blocks to the north. Within twelve months we predict you can double your money by investing in these lots, and in fact in any lots in the Hayward Addition.

WHERE can you buy such superb building lots? Where will you find such majestic oaks? Remember all of the streets are splendidly macadamized, are sewered and side sewered. Water mains are in all streets, and separate taps are extended to every lot. Bituminous sidewalks around all blocks and every lot on the official grade.

YOU cannot make a mistake by buying in the Hayward Addition a lot either for a home, an investment or a speculation.

lighted at the arrangement and vied with each other in attentions to the new beauty. In the drawing-room, afterward, Tom Brinkerhoff and cousin Charlie were not the only ones who seemed to find Miss Ross of superior attractiveness. The other men thronged about her, magnetized by her wit and beauty.

When the cotillion was danced, at twelve o'clock, Miss Ross had been honored by a request from every man in the room to be her partner. She chose Tom Brinkerhoff, but the others showered favors upon her, so that when she went home her arms were full of the toys and bonbons and other trifles that had been heaped into her lap during the german's progress. Miss Harrison was so pleased at the success of her "discovery" that, as she said good-bye to Margaret Ross before sending the girl home in her own automobile, she threw her arms around her neck and kissed her.

"Thank you so much for coming," she said, "you were the triumph of my little party."

Possibly Miss Ross thought so herself, as she settled herself with a happy sigh in the tonneau, with cousin Charlie, who had asked permission to do escort duty.

Tom Brinkerhoff lingered until the last guest. He usually did, for Marion always liked to talk over things with him. All their set was aware of the fact that Tom could have Miss Harrison's millions for the asking. As yet, he had not asked. Marion often wondered why he did not. She loved him so well, and many of her generous deeds were half-inspired by the hope of winning his regard. She felt that Brinkerhoff, who was a man of high ideals and great intelligence, looked upon her as a mere butterfly, and she wished to prove to him that there was a serious side to her disposition.

As the last guest left the house, the girls, it must be confessed, not in the most genial frame of mind, for no girl likes to see a "dark horse" carry off all the honors in the social race, Marion heaved a sigh of relief. It was all over, and her experiment was not a failure.

As Brinkerhoff waited, and the butler brought him a whisky and soda to brace him up after his duties as cotillion leader, Marion, answering the question in his eyes, told him all about it; her whim and its result. He was so interested that he stayed an hour longer, and when he left he pressed his hostess's hand so warmly that she felt sure that he was going to ask her the long-deferred question. But he did not, though his warm hand-clasp made the heiress so happy that she went to sleep and dreamed he had placed a ring on her finger, and asked her to be his Christmas gift.

A day or so later, Miss Harrison went to her country-place in San Mateo county, where she entertained a house-party for several weeks. She asked Brinkerhoff to come, but he sent a regretful refusal.

"He doesn't want to rush matters," confided Miss Harrison to Ethelwyn Rudolph, who nodded her head, though she did not wholly agree with her friend.

On the day Marion returned to town, instead of going directly home she ordered her auto to stop at the glove-store where Margaret Ross was employed. She had remembered, with a qualm of conscience, that she had never seen the girl, or even written or telephoned her, since the day of her dinner.

"How careless she will think me," thought the heiress, "just as if I took her up and dropped her."

But she did not have a chance to express her apologies to Margaret Ross, for she was not there.

"She has not been here for a week," explained a saleswoman of whom she enquired Miss Ross's whereabouts.

"I hope she isn't ill, poor girl," thought Marion, revolving all sorts of benevolent projects for her protegee.

She need not have bothered her mind about the beautiful glove-saleswoman. When she reached home, she found in her mail a letter, which she read with a pang in her heart, that was so kindly disposed to every one, and which heaven had seen fit to deny its greatest desire:

"My dear Miss Harrison," ran the note, "I feel sorry that I could not have asked you to the wedding, but Tom wanted it to be strictly private. We are now honeymooning in Santa Barbara, but will be in town in a few days.

"Always sincerely yours,

"Margaret Brinkerhoff."

Frances—Yes, I'm going to marry him, but he's awful stupid.

Helen—Is that so?

Frances—Yes, I refused him at first and he took it seriously. Then I had to explain matters.

Some Christmas Reflections

For of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these — Xmas again!

—The Pauper.

When poverty comes in at the door, Santa Claus forgets to come down the chimney.

—The Cynic.

A Xmas gift at best is only a loan.
We pay for our gifts, and dearly, too.

—The Misanthrope.

The Christ spirit is so clearly not in Evidence these days that even the children
Don't know how Xmas originated.

—The Sage.

Get as much as you can, give as little as you can,
Then figure up your gain —
That's Xmas with a great many folks.

Still prate as we will, like sickness and death
And taxes, Xmas is bound to come and that Regularly.

—The Croaker.

A NIGHT OUT.

Jack was naturally a good-natured fellow, but that morning he seemed particularly cheerful. As we walked down Sutter street to our offices, which were on the same floor in the Mills building:

"You must have enjoyed yourself somewhere last night, Jack," I said, "you are particularly bright this morning. As for myself, I feel tired. We went out to dinner, then to the theatre, and, as a consequence, I feel as though I'd been on a bat for a week."

"Well," Jack answered, "I did have a right 'good time' last evening, as you say. I took the wife and a couple of friends who are stopping with us out to the Chutes. We did the whole show —and I don't see how the owners can keep up the place for the prices they charge. In the theatre we saw a performance that I have often paid a good price for in a down town house. Then they had an intermission. Here was the best of it all. It was the Johnstown Flood. You know this happened in 1889, but truly it seemed as though we were looking directly at that awful calamity (for of course we all went up to see it). They have a large hall built especially for it directly over the Penny Arcade. The place was crowded and a lecturer—who by the way was an artist—described the dreadful affair while it happened before our eyes. There we saw old Johnstown before the flood, with the blasting furnaces of the Cambria Iron Works in full blast, the streets, the river and draw-bridge over which marched the soldiers; it being the day before the flood that the scene was drawn—it was Decoration Day and the marching soldiers were going to decorate the graves of the dead. In the distance we saw the sun set over the hills. Night fell, and then in the early morning the water swept through the valley, washed the whole town against the draw-bridge and there it burned. Then, as the sun rose, it rose on a new Johnstown, as it appears today."

"Must be great," I said, "to hear you tell it."

"Well," he said, "you can laugh, but it's more than I ever saw before for ten cents, and I'd advise you to go and see it."

The next night I went and it was even as he said.

FOR A GOOD LUNCH

Few cities are so highly favored as San Francisco in the matter of eating-places. Business men of the down-town district are never at a loss where to go for lunch. They are always sure of finding a good lunch at the Grand Hotel bar, located under the hotel of the same name. The Grand Hotel bar sets a table that suits any taste, and the wines and liquors are a guarantee of purity and genuineness.

THE LICK HOUSE GRILL.

One of the handsomest grill-rooms in the city is that attached to that popular hostelry, the Lick House. A little over a year ago the Lick House grill was established, and it has steadily grown in favor. Deservedly so, for its popularity is due to its unvaried excellence. Mr. George W. Kingsbury, proprietor of the Lick, had every detail of the grill's furnishings and appointments perfected under his personal supervision. Everything is artistic and beautiful. It is the Old Dutch style, the seven-foot wainscoting of dark Flemish oak, the furniture and high-back cane chairs also dark-tinted in artistic contrast with the walls and ceilings of rich red. The grill holds one hundred diners comfortably. Its central location is an advantage. It has three entrances, one for ladies through the reading-room, for men through the office and a third from Lick Place. All the mining men from the interior of California, and from other States, make their headquarters at the Lick when in town, and they always congratulate the proprietor on his forethought in establishing this up-to-date grill, where the menu satisfies the epicure and the service is unsurpassed.

Why She's the Rage

She's not prettier, wittier nor richer than the others,
Indeed some fellows call her mighty tame:
But around her flock a cordon of devoted "little brothers"
And the other girls are left outside the game.
What's the reason? Well, the best thing is to put it to the mothers —

They all say it is the Hyphen in her name!

Pointers in Politeness

When you sit down to Christmas turkey do so with the firm resolution that you will not monopolize the conversation. There may be others eager to entertain.

When the hostess is speaking do not look bored, and refrain from yawning. Such conduct does not receive the approbation of the best authorities.

Do not pick the turkey bones or you will be suspected of not having the courage to ask politely for more of the bird.

Do not blow the soup to cool it unless the hostess has taken the precaution to supply tarpaulins.

During mastication it is well to keep the mouth closed. This has a tendency to delay the conversation but people will be patient if you have anything interesting to say. It is well to eschew noisy chewing.

Don't introduce mournful subjects of conversation under the misapprehension that sadness is a first aid to digestion.

If you are not dining in the smart set do not throw food by way of diversion. Rich people can afford the luxury, but middle class women have a prejudice against soiled gowns.

If tooth-picks are served you may take one as evidence of good faith and to show that there is no hard feeling, but do not use it unless you can make some plausible excuse for getting under the table.

Tucking one's napkin under one's chin is permissible when one is in the habit of eating pie with one's knife. It indicates, however, that one is not sufficiently dexterous to use a knife without the aid of a net.

When you are in doubt use the spoon in preference to the fork. None but cowards falter between the two implements.

The host should never carve on his feet or in his shirt-sleeves.

George Sterling's Snow-White Lie

BY HARRY COWELL.

George Washington Sterling's nationality has already been indicated; the keynote of his character sounded. He was a New England Puritan, and had never been known to tell a lie. Yet he had once told one, had St. George.

The story of this exception to a lifelong rule is known to me alone. Should I keep silent, George's repute among men would remain unique. But the tale clamors to be told. I do not believe that anyone who reads it will on its account think less of humanity, nor any of Sterling's many friends cease to revere his memory when they learn that once, and once only, and for one person, he deliberately lied. I say "his memory," for George has lately gone (gladly as it seemed to me) to meet Him to whom lying lips are an abomination. When the books are opened, the honest fellow will be not a little surprised to find that, as I am fully persuaded, his only falsehood has been accounted unto him for more righteousness than all his fifty years of veracity.

The dear old friend whom I have just lost I first met in the foothills of the Rocky mountains, about a day's lope from High River, Alberta. He was the only man I have ever seen in the Rockies who did not look petty and out of place. He resembled the rugged men of Michael Angelo's marbles. The grandeur of the hills was his. Like the pines that fell under his ax, he stood there, no interloper, but by inherent right, and fitted into the majestic scenery as admirably as did they. His life was one with tree and mountain-breeze and rock. In a drawing-room he would no doubt have seemed unfinished, even ugly. He was built on too large a scale for indoors: the sky was his natural ceiling. But in the mountains he was magnificent.

My motives for seeking out "St. George" in his retreat in the Rockies, though the journey partook somewhat of the nature of a pilgrimage, were not altogether disinterested. I was "dead stone broke," work was hard to find, and Sterling's heart was said to be in the right place.

If you wish to learn a man's character, go to him asking a favor. To George Sterling I went, and told him that I had a mouth and two hands. Forthwith he put the "three B's"—bread, bacon and beans—into the mouth, which was absurdly beardless, and an ax into the hands, which were absurdly white.

In college I was accounted no mean athlete, but from first to last, George insisted on treating me as though I were a woman. With a tact that would have made the reputation of the hostess of a Parisian salon, he took the heavy end of every log.

When two men share for months a one-room shack in the secret-revealing solitudes of the Rockies, they come to know each other with an intimacy impossible elsewhere. Great is their love or hate—indifference is out of the question. From the first, Sterling and I were friends. As I write, I seem to breathe again the perfumed wine-like breezes; to hear again the clear, full voice chiming with the note of the steel as it struck the fire-hardened bole of a pine; again to see the great Moses-like head against the background of rock; again to feel the wild joy of living in the presence of a friend, close to the heart of Nature.

All large-souled men love with added force the friends they have been able to benefit. George Sterling saved my life; and, accordingly, loved me as he could not otherwise have done; but he never let the owed life feel a feather's weight of debt. This was the way of it:—

One evening I had felled a pine, or, rather, from lack of skill, had failed to fell it. It had missed the gap between two other trees at which I had aimed it, and had caught in the branches of one of them. Foolishly enough, I went on hand and knees to crawl under it, when down it came on me without warning. Though the butt was still on the stump, the top was slowly sinking to the ground as the branches gave way. I was being crushed to death. Suddenly I felt the pressure cease, and the next instant heard the crashing of a tree down the hillside. I looked up. George was standing over me. He had lifted the huge pine in his arms and hurled it aside.

Picking me up, he carried me to the shack, which was about half a mile away. There he placed me on the soft buffalo robes which served as bed-covering. As he leaned over, a look in his face awakened some sleeping memories.

"It's a queer thing, George," I breathed, "but the way you looked just now reminded me of the last time I was laid up." And I tried to laugh.

George smiled. His smile was a poem. In prose it simply meant: "Boy, what are you laughing about?"

"Well," I answered, "this shack of rough logs and you seem made for one another like a squirrel and a hole in a tree. Your face is rugged, massive; hers was petite, cut like a cameo. Her bedroom, which she had given up to me, also seemed made for her; it was filled with that subtle perfume of woman which stirs the senses like wine, and steals upon the soul like sleep upon a tired child."

Again George smiled. I translate: "Well, I don't see the joke."

"Yet your face as you leaned over me now," I continued, "looked like her face as she leaned over me then. The contrast amounts to incongruity; is monstrously absurd; struck me as funny. Hence the laugh."

I was getting into reminiscent mood, my mind wandering a little. From the wilderness without came the night sounds, the bark of kit-fox and coyote, and the call of the wind among the pines. Again the candle-light revealed the memory-provoking look in the face of my friend.

"It was at Medicine Hat," I rambled on, thinking of the time when I had ridden an unbroken bronco for less than Mark Twain's famous "fully half a minute."

"Medicine Hat!" repeated George, in the unmistakable tones of one familiar with the place.

"What! Do you know it?" I cried, trying to sit up. The question was insincere. I was already well aware that he did.

"Yes." That little word had carried many wonderful loads, but never one weightier than that which George then put upon it.

"Then you must have met her," I returned.

"Met who?"

"Delia Maddern."

"Delia Maddern!" he cried; and I knew that this great backwoodsman and I had loved and lost the same woman. I winced.

"Yes," I went on, "I was boarding at her place when that cursed bronco bucked me off. She gave up her room to me and watched over me like an angel."

"If ever there was an angel on this earth——" began George; then, abruptly: "And you, too, loved her?"

"I only knew her about a month," I evasively answered. "As soon as I was well enough, I had to go back to Calgary on business. I have never seen her since. I wonder what became of her. Do you know?"

"Ye-s." Again the word tottered under its burden.

"And you loved her?" I asked.

Sterling did not answer at once. He straightened up, shivering like a great pine struck by a sudden gust of wind. Then the very spirit of silence seemed to come down from the mountains and fill the shack with its impalpable presence.

George seized my hand; the bones cracked. "My boy," said he, "I lied for her!"

"You?"

"Yes, I."

The simple, childlike answer moved me strangely. He had lied for her. I had left her, lest—well, I was city-bred, a college man, and she, a princess of the plains indeed, but uncultured. I looked at him with admiration, in my eyes a question I was longing to ask.

New Year 1905 Greetings

Through the kindness of our friends the year 1904 has been exceptionally good to us, and we desire to take this occasion to thank you all and wish you a very Happy New Year—the happiest that you have ever had. During 1905 we hope to have the pleasure of serving you further, and if given that privilege, assure you that we will do everything in our power to serve you well.

"Yes; I will tell you," said George in answer. "I could not tell her. . . . Are you well enough to listen?"

"When Delia was ten years old, Mrs. Maddern died. From that day the child gave up her dolls and became a little wife to her father, a little mother to her three younger sisters. Death had made a gap between her and them. For this devotion, her father repaid her in barbarous leather money—the boot and the strap; the bottle had made a brute of him. To me she came to shed the tears he was never able to force from her lake-like eyes. She called me her 'Other Mother.' Any kind of a mother is justified in seeing to it that her children have enough to eat. Against that view of things, John Maddern made this argument." And tearing open his buckskin shirt, George showed me a bullet scar. "It's a poor argument," he continued calmly. "Anyway, it didn't convince me. She was then fifteen. After that she began taking boarders, and got that poor old lame woman in to help her. It must have been about that time you came along. I was away for a little while; and don't think my name was mentioned very often in the house. Her father was off on a hunting trip. When he came back—well, he found out about you—they called you the 'greenhorn'; I never heard your name—and he got it into his head that for her kindness to you he owed her something—which he paid to the uttermost farthing."

Sterling paused. I looked up. "Moses Smashing the Tables of Stone, by Michael Angelo," I thought, trying to make him the centre of consciousness. But, on a sudden, a mighty wind straight from the snows shrieked through the pines, and came sobbing in between the logs of the cabin. It played with George's massy beard and long curly hair. The candle-flame flickered. I shivered.

"Forgive me," said George very softly. "I forgot."

"Yes; yes; go on!" I cried.

"Soon after that he died.—" I glanced at the story-teller. "A natural death," he added, smiling; then went on: "The day of the funeral, I made a vow. 'As soon as she is sixteen,' I promised myself, 'I'll—well, no matter what. . . . Before her birthday, an English boy, rose-cheeked, lily-handed, and voiced like a dove, came to board with her for a few days. But the days drew out into weeks, the weeks into months. He seemed to forget what had brought him there—that prairie-hen, canvas-back, antelope, and wavy, were everywhere in abundance that season. When reminded, he had observed, he said, that when game was very plentiful, it was too tame—the shooting of it butchery, not sport."

"The red gods called for him, but he wouldn't go," I put in; for I had to speak.

"That's it," George assented; "he wouldn't go. Month after month he lingered in our little one-horse railroad town. And when Delia's birthday came, I did not keep that promise to myself. It was the first I had ever broken. The Londoner spent his days at Delia's. I kept away. At times I was almost sorry that her father had died."

"Then, one morning, I heard a familiar tap-tap on the window of my shack. I opened the door, and there was Delia. As of old, she had come for comfort to her 'Other Mother.' 'M'lord,' as the Englishman was called, had on a sudden set out for home. He had come in, he said, for a fortune and a title. Just as soon as everything had been settled up, he would return."

"Did he tell you what he was coming back for?" I asked—such was a mother's privilege.

"No," she answered, throwing her arms about my neck; "but he will come."

"I was silent."

"Every morning for ten months, she came, each day a little paler, a little thinner, than the day before. Every morning I asked: 'Have you heard from him?' Every morning she answered: 'No; but he will come.' And she would talk of him for an hour, and then go home to get lunch ready for her boarders."

"Delia had no relatives but her three sisters. All her friends lived near by. Yet every day, rain or shine or snow, after the distribution of the mail, hers was the first face the letter-clerk saw when he opened his trap-window. Often he would say: 'Don't be a fool, Delia. M'lords marry m'ladies.' More frequently he would shake his head and sneer. But her faith remained unshaken."

"About the middle of the eleventh month, a little later than usual, I heard her faint tap-tap. Detecting in its faintness an altogether unexpected difference, I hurried to the door. At once I knew that something unusual had happened."

"What is it?" I asked, taking her in my arms; for she was about to fall.

"O, Mother Georgie," cried my poor Delia, "do say you don't believe it. It isn't true;—it can't be true. He said he would come." I took her on my knees, and she sobbed like the baby she was. When she had quieted down a little, I asked again: "What is it, child?"

"She answered: "They say he's married an Irish countess."

"Who says so?"

"Why, Willie Blacker, down to the post-office."

"How does he know?"

"His people in Europe told him in a letter. "What did I tell you?" he said. "M'lord's make love to peasants, but m'lords marry m'ladies." He needn't have said that; need he, 'Other Mothie?' Say you don't believe it."

"I said so, not quite knowing what it was that I didn't believe. She kissed my face and my hands; and her tears scalded me like boiling water or frost-bite."

"And you believe he will come, Mother George?" It was the first time she had asked me that.

"I was silent."

"I did not believe he would come back. I recalled his smooth face and smoother tongue, and the pink-and-whiteness, which I detested. Moreover, of the ways of young aristocrats on a pleasure trip five thousand miles away from home, I had some knowledge. So I was silent. I dared not say, 'I do not.' My doubt would have killed her."

"She turned her face up to me like a terror-stricken child. 'Why—don't—you—answer—me?' she breathed; and her breath bit my face like fire. 'Say you believe he will come; O, my Other Mother, say you believe he will come!' And I deliberately answered:

"Child, I do believe he will come."

"She covered my face with kisses."

He paused; then asked abruptly: "Have you ever fought a prairie fire?"

"No," I replied, thinking that George's speech had grown strangely irrelevant."

"I lied to her," he went on, "because I saw that she was dying of unconscious despair; and I wanted her to die happy. But so great was her faith in me, that my words gave her new life, and I watched her day by day regain her loss of the last half year. I was now desperate. My lie had been all in vain."

He was silent.

"And that scoundrel of an Englishman never came back," I said uncomfortably.

"He did come back," answered George slowly. "He came back, fortune, title, pink cheeks, white hands, and all, just to get one last look at her. That hell-fiend in the post-office had intercepted all his letters, and when written to for information, had told M'lord that Delia had married—had married—me!—me, her Other Mother!"

"Yes, and then?" I asked eagerly.

George was silent. I gazed at his face until I grew afraid. His presence was that of a god.

"And then," said I, finishing the tale for him, "M'lord made a liar of that post-office fellow, and Medicine Hat had a new letter-clerk; and her Other Mother gave Delia away, and found it hard, as mothers will; and I'll bet the child said proudly to her husband: 'We never for one moment lost faith in you; did we, Mother Georgie?' and somebody answered, 'Never,' and—came West."

George was silent. My mind began to wander again. That pine must have knocked me pretty silly, for I cried myself to sleep like a baby. We never alluded to the subject again.

And now he is dead.

"Whom do you consider has the best figure among this season's buds?"

"Miss Brown—I think hers is a million."

Automobile Topics

William Fries, president of the California Fruit Cannery Association, is one of the latest of San Francisco's prominent men to take up motoring and he intends to own a stable of the horseless carriages. He has an Autocar runabout which his son has learned to operate.

Colonel John Bradbury of Los Angeles tried many kinds of automobiles before choosing the Autocar, which he finds suits him to a "T."

William H. Middleton, president of the West Coast Motor Car company, received an interesting letter a few days ago from Louis S. Clark, a prominent motorist of Ardmore, which may interest local enthusiasts. Mr. Clarke writes that the other night five inches of snow fell in the country about Ardmore and that on the following morning he took a fifteen-mile run in the new four-cylinder Autocar. "Its performance was most gratifying, especially considering the road difficulties presented by snow beaten down in some places to a highly slippery surface, in other places left in its original soft condition. The car was started on the direct drive and the gears never shifted during the entire fifteen miles. The power that the engine showed in pulling the car was thoroughly satisfactory and the car rode easily even over the rough places."

The Suburban, body by Quinby, 28-32 h. p., price $5,200; the Landaulet, Quinby body, 28-32 h. p., $5,200; the Opera coach, Quinby body, 28-32 h. p., $5,200; the Gorot Arrow, side entrance aluminum tonneau, 28-32 h. p., $4,150; the Arrow, side entrance aluminum tonneau, 24-28 h. p., $3,650—these are all 4-cylinder, direct-driven machines. The unusual success attending these cars in '04 is convincing that the Pierce-Arrow solution of the problem of successful motor-car building is the right one. This success was recognized by the St. Louis Exposition, which accorded the Pierce line the Grand Prize.

Rose Melville of "Sis Hopkins" fame makes daily trips around the city in her Pierce Arrow car.

William S. Tevis, one of the first owners of an automobile on this coast, left a few days ago in his 1905 White touring car for an overland trip to Bakersfield, where he will be joined by Truxtun Beale, and together they will make the journey to Pasadena, and also tour the southern part of the State for several weeks.

Miss Daisy Barnhart, probably the most enthusiastic chauffeuse in Stockton, is anxiously awaiting the arrival of her new model White steam touring car, which will reach her about Christmas.

Mrs. Dumouriez has been seen of late enjoying some speedy rides in her '05 White steamer.

The White Sewing Machine company has just received some exceedingly interesting photographs of the Eagle Rock hill-climbing contest, and of Mr. Winthrop E. Scarritt, the retiring president of the Automobile Club of America, in his new White car.

The Pope Manufacturing Company has just opened a new garage at No. 111 New Montgomery street, opposite the Rialto building. The Pope Company has been well known for many years, and is today the largest manufacturer of bicycles and automobiles in the United States. The fact that the company is now showing a handsome stock of new cars of its manufacture is creating considerable attention among those interested in the subject of automobiles. The present display comprises the Pope-Hartford and Pope-Tribune gasoline cars and the Pope-Waverly electrics. The automobile department is in charge of Mr. W. M. Phelps, who is kept constantly engaged in explaining and demonstrating the good features of these various cars. The handsome premises now occupied enable a very creditable display and every opportunity for a careful study of these machines in detail.

George H. Bill, son of J. T. Bill, of Leavitt & Bill, became a benedict on Tuesday, the bride being Miss Minnie Frances Naegle. Mr. Bill is identified with the auto trade, representing a number of Eastern manufacturers.

Two French type touring runabouts arrived at the Pioneer Automobile Company's garage last week. They have been given a thorough test and found to be everything claimed for them by their manufacturers. The machine is of beautiful design and will speed up to 35 miles an hour. George H. Osen (the Pioneer Company's agent in San Jose) has taken one of the machines and has already secured five orders. The Pioneer Company has secured ten orders for this machine since the arrival of the sample. W. F. Hunt, (vice-president of the Pioneer Company), made a speed trial trip around the bay on Sunday last in one of the new French type runabouts and, when asked regarding the accredited speed of the little car, he simply smiled, looked wise and said, "I did not meet any rural constables on the trip."

The Pioneer Company has sold an Oldsmobile delivery wagon to the Fresno Evening Democrat.

J. W. Stanford, of Warm Springs, was one of the first owners of a Winton touring car on the Pacific coast. On Tuesday of last week he placed his order with the Pioneer Company for a 24-30 h. p. four-cylinder Winton touring car. Mr. Stanford in 1900 made a tour of the Eastern factories and purchased one of the old style single cylinder Wintons, which he has had in his possession ever since. He is very enthusiastic over the 1905 product of the Winton Company.

Cuyler Lee, agent for the Cadillac Automobile Company, has just returned from Detroit and says the Cadillac Company will make for 1905, in addition to the $1,050 model B touring car, a smart, high-powered runabout which will sell for $900, and a four cylinder 30 h. p. car which will sell for $2,950.

Gabriel, the noted racing automobilist, was describing in New York the joy of speed.

"Whoever," he said, "has once driven a racing car is a devotee of racing thereafter. He finds that nothing in the world equals the mad, fierce delight of speeding along firm white roads at the rate of seventy or eighty miles an hour. In Paris last year I met a young American millionaire who had just bought a sixty-five horse power car. He and I went out in the country together to try this new car's paces. We had a superb time. The machine was a fine one. We flew so fast we left the birds behind. At the day's end we congratulated each other on the sport we had had. It was agreed between us that there was nothing on earth equal to motoring.

"Can you come out again tomorrow?" I said eagerly. "Can you come out tomorrow and try my car?"

"Well," said the young man slowly, "I was to be married tomorrow, but—I can put it off."

DEPARTMENT STORE SYSTEMS.

The shopping public has been clamoring for a more rapid service by the department and drygoods stores throughout the country. The necessity of this has been recognized by the managers of the large retail establishments, but they have been unable until now to devise a proper method to accomplish their object and thereby protect themselves and at the same time protect the public. Mr. John Wanamaker was the first of the great merchants of the country to devise such a system, which he did by installing a system of cash registers. He was quickly followed by Seigel, Cooper & Co. and other large department stores in the East. So successful has this system proved that Mr. Prager, who recently returned from the East, has decided, after careful investigation, to adopt the system in his department store in this city. This is also true of Weinstock, Lubin & Co. in Sacramento, another pioneer house. They have already installed the system. In short, the long delay encountered by the old time methods of buying in department stores, and waiting until one is tired for one's goods and one's change, is past.

GEORGE GOODMAN ARTIFICIAL STONE COMPANY.

As successors to the late George Goodman, the George Goodman Artificial Stone Company has been incorporated. The firm does general contracting in concrete and artificial stone work, with offices at 317 Montgomery street, Nevada Block; telephone Main 5322. The company announces that it will continue to do the same manner of high-class work that was carried on by its predecessor, the pioneer contractor in this line of work. The manager of the new corporation, John Faubel, was for fourteen years superintendent for Mr. Goodman. His long experience in carrying out the immense number of contracts executed by Mr. Goodman will be a strong factor in the success of the new company. Mr. Faubel bears a high reputation for integrity and rectitude, and this guarantees the faithful carrying out of the firm's contracts.

The Year in Music

The year in its musical aspect was not marked by anything of great moment, unless one may except the positively farewell tour of Adelina Patti. The former divine Patti turned out to be simply a charming old lady with but the remnant of her glorious voice, and the disillusionment was surpassingly sad. Sembrich also came West, and was heard in song recital, but she was not at her best as she was out of condition and ill during her engagement here. The treat of the twelvemonth was Schumann-Heink in several song recitals, the contralto singing to crowded and enthusiastic houses during her entire engagement. Lillian Blauvelt gave recitals, and Fannie Francisca returned and was heard in recital and opera. Harold Bauer and Edward McDowell gave recitals and Paderewski again visited us. There were some interesting affairs given by the Kopta quartet, the Minetti orchestra, Spamer the violinist, Louis Eaton the organist and other local artists. Next year we are promised the Corried grand opera, and the St. Francis Musical Society, an organization modeling its recitals after those of the famous Waldorf-Astoria concerts, will give us Gadsdi and other stars.

The Wonderful Paderewski

Of Ignace Paderewski, crowned king of pianists, nothing more can be said in this year of his reign. His rule is still supreme, undisputed. Under his magic touch the piano has now the majestic power of a full orchestra, again the plaintive singing tone of a cello. To those that love the instrument it is a delightful triumph when he sounds the depths of its potentialities. A little Bach, a little Beethoven, some Liszt and a generous offering of Chopin with one number of the master's own—that is his program. In his sustained legato passages, one is reminded that it is only in nature that there is such regularity. When he plays florid passages "the heart exults and sings, the pulses leap, the feet have wings." Whatever he plays, there is always the theme singing, ever singing. His crescendos! Not to have heard them is not to have been reminded of the gathering of a storm or the rising of a big wave on the ocean's breast, for they are like unto those phenomena of nature in their gradual cumulativeness. Then who shall say that the piano is a soulless instrument? When the master technician becomes deeply interested his hearers applaud him to the roof. You feel the thermometer steadily mount, and impulsively pound your palms applaudively. Now he smites the keyboard with thunderous eloquence, and now he ripples over it, making it sing with infinite tenderness. Surely Paderewski must have been pleased with his audience Monday night. He rewarded their enthusiasm graciously, playing Mendelssohn's Hunting Song, Chopin's Berceuse, Liszt's second Rhapsodie and a Chopin valse as encores, besides repeating a Chopin etude.

The Cowles Recital

Cecil Cowles has grown perceptibly taller since her last public recital. She has not lost, however, her grace of movement and that air of ease and self-possession which are her distinguishing marks. Her playing, too, shows more maturity. Her style is neat, crisp and nervous, and begins to display evidence of temperament, as her interpretations are by no means imitative. She has originality, plenty of it, and displays it in her own little compositions, of which she played two on Thursday evening. The precocious child has under way an opera called "The Fairy Queen." Cecil is now about to travel, and I predict for her a successful career. The following was her program at her recital: Deux Nocturne, op. 55, Fantaisie-Impromptu, Valse, E minor, Chopin; Marionette No. 2, Poldini, Theme and Variations, Cecil Cowles, Fruhlingsrauschen, Sinding; Nachtstucke, Schumann, Melody in F, Rubinstein, Fugue, op. 5, No. 3, Rheinberger; Polonaise, Cecil Cowles, Valse C sharp minor, Scherzo, Chopin.

The Davis Recital

Those clever children, Eric and Elizabeth Davis, gave their second operatic recital (in costume) last week, the occasion being Eric's birthday. Eric is twelve years old, and his sister will be nine in January. These children show a remarkable aptitude for operatic work, and have been very carefully trained by Madame Ellen Coursen-Roeckel, of whose juvenile operatic class they are members. The numbers rendered at their recital were: Sicilienne, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni, Eric Davis; Voi

The Gadski Concerts

On Tuesday morning the sale of season tickets for the Gadski concerts will open at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s. On the following Friday the seats for single concerts will be ready. At the opening concert on Tuesday night, January third, the program will include arias from "Freischutz" and "The Marriage of Figaro" beside some of the gems of G. Schumann, Beethoven, Franz, Jensen and Schubert. M. Meyrowitz, the pianist, will play "Wotan's Farewell" and the Magic Fire music from "Die Walkure." At the Thursday night concert a special feature will be a group of songs by American composers. The Saturday matinee will be devoted entirely to Wagner. As a Wagnerian interpreter Gadski has no superior. The Immolation Scene from "Die Gotterdammerung" will be one of the numbers offered. As many students have expressed a desire to attend all the concerts, specially low rates have been made for season tickets and one can attend all the concerts for as low a sum as two dollars and a half. Next Wednesday night at nine o'clock a special program will be offered by Madame Gadski at the first concert of the St. Francis Musical Art Society at the new concert room of the St. Francis. A few seats are still obtainable at two dollars and a half each and can be secured on and after Tuesday at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s.

De Pachmann, the greatest Chopin player the world has ever known outside of the great composer himself, will concertize here in January. He will be one of the offerings of the St. Francis Musical Art Society and in addition will give several public appearances.

Eleanor Haber's Monologue Recital

Every seat in the ball-room of the St. Francis hotel was occupied last Thursday evening, when Eleanor Haber gave her monologue recital. Miss Haber appears before the public but once a year, though she often recites or gives her monologues at women's club affairs and drawing-room functions. It seemed very much like a private occasion on Thursday evening, for the audience was a fashionable one, the women beautifully gowned. Miss Haber looked like a Dresden shepherdess herself, in a flowered Marie Antoinette costume, with a big white picture-hat. She gave but six numbers. "Shoes" and "In the Employment Office" were brightly humorous, "The Philosopher in the Apple Orchard" a charming blend of comedy and sentiment. "Mr. Carson's Wife," the monologue of an extravagant little matron, seemed to be the best appreciated by the audience, particularly by the masculine element. Three Old English, or rather Scotch ballads, were interesting as bits of literary lore, and were given with very intelligent conception of their value. "Her First Experience," the closing selection, was that amusing monologue of the inexperienced purchaser at the butcher shop, and was given with much vivacity. The monologues were a distinct advance upon those given at last year's recital, though I should like to have heard Miss Haber give the "mixed millinery" selection again that she does so well. But there were no encores granted, though applause was frequent throughout the recital. A stringed orchestra discoursed classical selections between each monologue.

Part one of Handel's "Messiah" will be given at Trinity church tomorrow evening (Christmas) at eight o'clock. Miss Flynn, Miss Fairweather, Mr. Rosekrans and Mr. Oksen will be the soloists. Miss Grace Courtney Jenkins, violinist, will play during the offertory. Louis H. Eaton is organist and director of the choir.

Miss Smalley's Recital

Miss Louise Smalley made a favorable impression at her recital on Monday evening of last week. She is a pupil of Herman Genss, and is artistic and refined. While she lacks somewhat in the matter of force she excels in poetic interpretation. Her method is the "hammer stroke," with a great deal of finger technique. She was particularly good in the Beethoven Sonata for piano and violin (op. 30, No. 3), Harry Samuels, the well-known violinist, sustaining the other part. The Menuetto was charmingly done. Miss Smalley's second number included a Field Nocturne, "Poeme de Mai," by Moszkowski, Chopin's well-known Nocturne op. 27 No. 2, and his Bolero, which is more Polish than Spanish, and with a little slower tempo could easily be a polonaise. All these were rendered with poetic delicacy. She ended with the Hungarian Fantasia of Liszt, brilliantly arranged for two pianos, Mr. Genss taking the second. Mr. Samuels gave a masterly rendition of Wieniawski's "Faust Fantasia" and aroused his audience to a pitch of enthusiasm. Mr. Samuels is a violinist who finds the soul of his instrument. Mr. Genss accompanied in an unexceptional manner.

An Artist in a Pet

An incident not down on the bill occurred at Miss Smalley's recital. When the young pianiste and Mr. Genss appeared for their final number on two pianos, Mr. Genss was evidently in an ill humor, and fancying that he heard whispering among the audience, he flung down his music in a pet, uttered what he fancied was a withering rebuke, and marched off the stage, followed by Miss Smalley, who really did not know just what was expected of her. Mr. Genss's conduct was childish and undignified, as the audience was attentive and well-behaved, many of the most prominent musical people of San Francisco being present. Miss Smalley had the sympathy of her hearers, who were determined that the young lady's program should not be spoiled, and who applauded until the artists came back again and went through their number. This is not the first time I have heard Mr. Genss rebuke an audience. If there were loud talking and laughing or marked inattention I should not blame him, but really he is too sensitive and only makes himself ridiculous and his hearers uncomfortable. If he is so easily disturbed he should not give recitals in a public hall but should keep within the sacred seclusion of the studio.

The Livernash Recital

A very charming affair was given at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. E. J. Livernash last Tuesday evening. It was in the form of a musicale, and the whole program was rendered by their daughter Alberta, who has just entered her teens. Ten compositions of Liszt were given with admirable musical feeling and some brilliancy, though the natural trend of the child seems to be toward the poetic side. Her appearance, too, would seem to indicate a poetic nature. Her playing of the difficult "Predication aux Oiseaux" was surprisingly good and gave one a convincing impression that her musical talent is real, not forced, which impression is borne out by the statement of her instructor, Mr. Mansfeldt, that three years ago Alberta did not know one note from the other. Following is the program played by this interesting child: Composer, Franz Liszt — St. Francois d'Assise, La Predication aux Oiseaux, Pastorale Number 3 from Annees de Pelerimage, Feuille d'Album, Consolation Number 5, Fruhlingslaube, Etude de Concert Number 3, Apparition Number 2, Cantique d'Amour from Harmonies Poetiques et Religieuses, Liebestraum Number 2, Rhapsodie Hongroise Number 8 Capriccio.

Christmas Usage

The bringing in of the boar's head is observed at King Edward's table in England, at Rugby, Eton, Winchester and Harrow, the big public schools; and at Oxford and Cambridge universities. It dates from the Pagan age, when the ancient Britons killed a boar at the winter solstice and offered its head to Freyr, the god of peace and plenty, who was popularly supposed to ride upon a boar with golden bristles.

In old Seville and other Spanish cities, Christmas is largely an outdoor celebration. The Anglo-Saxon idea of hearth and home is not foreign to the Latin temperament, but the climate of old Spain is well adapted to al fresco merrymaking.

Germany is the land of Santa Claus, the home of the Kris Kringle legend, the name being a corruption of Christ Kindlin, or Christ Child. The good German child finds gifts from generous Santa Claus, but the naughty boy finds only a switch, a birch rod supposed to be the reward of his naughtiness. It was placed there by the avenging Pelsnichol, "St. Nicholas with the fur."

The Sanctus Bell

BY PAUL G. CLARK.

The sound of a bell melted on the resonant, Australian air. It was not an ordinary bell. Neither rejoicing nor sorrowing, it neither warned nor summoned. Among bells its mission was peculiar,—the sound of the sanctus bell reminded. It was clear as conscience and as calm.

The Rev. Graeme Hampden laid finally down the pen for the third time assumed. He was young, and the fascination of his theme almost conquered the sense of duty the sound of the bell brought home to him. Alas! the most religious are pure Pagans when they come under the spell of poetry. Hampden was writing a sonnet to a woman. He did not admit to himself that for the hundredth of a second he regretted the suggesting whispers of the bell. To have acknowledged this publicly would mean damnation. He concealed it from himself. What scenes are those men enact instantly in their souls!

A strange thing that the bell used to punctuate the Roman Mass should be employed to guide the feet of the household of St. Stephen's rectory to their orisons! Would it leave no Papal taint on their Anglican souls? Hampden did things differently from the most of men. He saw a sweet and suitable use for the Sanctus Bell. So he adopted it for the chapel service summons. Clergy, bishops, archbishops had come and viewed it curiously; the idea was both good and original. Hampden at thirty, but two years ordained, was a master mind in the Episcopal diocese. This means the possession of superior talent and grit, in a young man whose duties have not yet hardened into a habit, as we have seen in that instant's hesitation at the Sanctus Bell.

With firm step and noble carriage, his face beautiful with the architecture of thought and poetry, the rector of St. Stephen's, a wealthy and fashionable parish of the suburbs of Sidney, left his study and crossed over to the chapel. He walked through a charming garden rich with the bloom of canna and cinnevaria, glowing with gladiolas and the glory of the gloxania. Charming stretches of lawn interspersed this walk he daily took across the superb grounds of his residence, bordered by tall trees forming the most magnificent background of nature. Truly he had a setting suited to the mellow echoes of his bell and the inspiration of his sonnets.

Half way on his walk a woman came out of an arbor white with roses, and Iona joined him. She was his wife, to whom the sonnet was written. Their honeymoon as yet was hardly over. They went over together to the chapel. As they entered, a tall, gaunt, dignified Briton greeted them. He was in clerical clothes, had sounded the bell, and though by a few years Hampden's senior, was the assistant of St. Stephen's.

* * * * *

The man who came on the scene with nothing more than his own word in his own mouth, was the assistant rector of St. Stephen's.

He dropped in on Hampden one day and remarked that he was from England, which was palpable; that he was an Anglican priest,—evident from the cut of his clothes. So far as looks go, a good tailor does a young minister just as much good as a bishop. Hampden, being a man of God, succored the man of God, who seemed sent to him from over the seas. He gave him bread, as St. Paul bade,—the stranger had raiment of his own.

So began the alliance which had proved itself so fortuitous for the parish of St. Stephen's. Cyril Chislebrook was a hard worker. He advanced auxiliary undertakings in the most capable fashion. He relieved the young rector of the severer drudgeries, allowing him time for study and brilliant sermons, and those were public compositions already attracting a wide reading public. With Chislebrook, Hampden promised to advance to that early success which his talents and situation guaranteed him.

There was a beautiful girl in the parish,—Iona D'Anvers. Of Norman name and descent, she was the higher type of the English—her soul and mind were endowed with graces even above her body. With this human incarnation of so much genius Hampden fell madly in love. Maybe the mystic union of heaven's gifts and earthly charms peculiarly appealed to an imagination accustomed to like mysteries of the church. All the poetry of Iona was reflected in the musical mentality of Graeme Hampden.

A present that always pleases the Mr. Man—a bottle of good pure whisky. You can depend on the word of an old established house like HOTALINGS; they will tell you buy the best, OLD KIRK, and please your friends.

Strange will of fate,—the ever unorthodox! It chanced that Cyril Chislebrook loved this woman, too.

The gaunt Briton asked Iona to be his wife, and she refused him.

It came about that Hampden and she were drawn to each other as mutual souls are drawn, and they were married.

There seemed to be no ripple of disquietude on the air of St. Stephen's,—the charming garden resembled the muse's sanctuary,—inspiration penned sonnets indoors,—love walked with love in arbors of roses,—and at eve Cyril Chislebrook sounded artistically the Sanctus Bell.

Alas! Alas! Life, too beautiful, breeds the worms of disaster. Don't seek happiness,—the loss is a worse hell than the heaven of possession was divine. To a cell,—or the shambles,—or the trenches! There exists a little approximate, continued content,—for you do not give the malignity of your fellow man an occasion to conspire.

* * * * *

Chislebrook had a close friend and he was an infidel.

Strange association for a priest.

The affair worked to the assistant's credit, for the people said: "See, this man makes friends not only of the elect, but also of sinners. He is a great missionary. Were all such as he, the whole world would be saved."

Chester Redfern was a gentleman of the highest breeding, a scholar, a man of means, with a pleasing personality. At forty-five he had settled down to enjoy his quietude and the peace of Australia. He was a pure skeptic,—books had made him so, but he respected religion, and considered it bad breeding to scoff. At first amused by Chislebrook's approaches, he grew to like the incongruity of having a cleric for a friend, and learning gave them everything in common. Oxford owned both, and in the republic of books, differences were but food for entertainment.

One day Chislebrook made a startling confession. He admitted that he had doubts of the religion he practiced. Even Redfern was startled. He guarded the secret of his friend.

Chislebrook repeated to his confidant all his affairs. He spoke of his love for Iona, the fruitless suit, and the grievance that henceforth he would eternally have toward Graeme Hampden.

Redfern attempted to ameliorate this dangerous fancy. He naturally took the occasion to rally his friend on the spirit of charity his religion preached. Chislebrook leaped from his chair, and waving aloft his gaunt arms cried: "I will have none of it! I don't believe it! I shall hate Hampden while I have breath in my body!"

Redfern was horrified but he calmed his friend.

* * * * *

The strain on intelligence friendship endures is remarkable and momentous. We suffer all from a friend. Redfern, infidel, religiously clung to the lofty standard of honor bred in an English gentleman, fidelity and friendship, with a perseverance that suggested slavery to a cult. Nor had Chislebrook done aught to sunder their association. Redfern hoped that when the storm settled Cyril would be wiser, mellower, solve his doubts, perhaps in abandonment of his profession, were that better, and then their friendship would be more securely sealed. At the moment he considered Chislebrook a victim of insanity. On the morrow he would recover. Spiritual shocks bowl over the best of fellows.

Redfern attended St. Stephen's on Sunday, as was his custom. People even spoke of it as a conversion. And, indeed, were it not for Chislebrook, Redfern would have been playing golf or reading Montesquieu.

Chislebrook met him before the church. "Walk with me a few moments," he said. The friends strolled over the parish lawn. Their attitude was most brotherly, and Redfern was attentive. He perceived that the assistant, who was gowned in his cassock preparatory to the service, labored under heavy excitement.

"My revenge!" exclaimed Chislebrook. "Today I even the score with Graeme Hampden! You'll see the spectacle!"

Redfern stopped the walk and turned sharply toward the emotional man. "Do nothing rash, Chislebrook. If you have forgotten your religion remember your philosophy. A man must have a guide. The prophets of the intellect merely take the place of the prophets of the soul. It is but a choice of masters, and my masters leave me most free. You have abandoned yours but you have not taken mine. A man cannot live without principles. I am sincerely sorry for any such. You are in a dangerous position. I entreat you to be calm and control yourself, to let me rule you, till you can balance your own mind."

To this Cyril shook his head. His eyes gleamed like the insane. He resumed the walk. "I will have my revenge." He smiled cynically.

Then Redfern laughed. For the first time in his life he allowed himself to scoff. But he did so righteously,—the triumphant laughter of a mature man who has demonstrated the folly of ways he forsook and the right of his own.

Chislebrook went to the vestry to prepare for service. Redfern went toward the congregation in the church. The one came robed into the chancel and the other waited solitary in his pew.

* * * * *

"You are ill!"

"I confess I do not feel well."

"Let me take the service and preach."

"I would but for one thing,—Iona is there; she does not know of this attack, and for me to be absent would shock her."

The assistant displayed the utmost concern for the condition of his rector.

"It is eleven," said Chislebrook. "You are not fit to go in. You look wretched. You seem to have ascended from the sepulchre. Your appearance will shock Iona and the whole congregation as well. Take this—" Chislebrook brought out a bottle of communion wine.

"I have never tasted liquor in my life out of the Sacrament."

"Therefore this drink will have a good effect and you will be fit for service. A minister is an actor. His flock are affected by his every movement. They follow each inflection of his voice. The greatest play is the sacred drama."

"Well, as you say."

Hampden gulped down the glass of wine.

"Why, I feel better. That was a good idea of yours, old man. Give the word to the organist, and we'll go in."

Drugs! A drug in a glass of wine! Put there by a friend! Terrible treachery! On that man should rest a curse. And a minister drank it. He enters his church. The remark about the drama is exceedingly true. There's a drama arranged for today, and it sobs into a tragedy. What stage is greater than the church, where the stage was born? What scene more solemn than the sanctuary, accentuated by organ and an angel-vested choir? What audience more significant than a congregation of reverent worshippers? What actors more august than the ordained?

What anachronism more terrible than a drunken priest!

Redfern, the infidel, shuddered in his pew. On him fell the full and awful force of the episode. To him was revealed the real tragedy, which meant the pity, and the more awful horror. He suffered such agonies of sensibility that he hoped to the day of his death like sensations should be spared him.

Losing ritual in intemperate syllables, forgetting forms, interjecting strange habits, Hampden struggled vainly with his reason. After the blundering of minutes, he buried his face in his surplice, staggered to the vestry, and out of the church. He lay stupefied on a couch while Chislebrook preached the sermon he had prepared. The master of St. Stephen's was ruined. There was no doubt of his habit. He had given away an awful secret which the brilliancy of his record made only the less forgivable. Deception finds men and angels pitiable.

Evil was the day for Iona as she bent over Graeme.

Worse was the morrow, when the bishop deposed Hampden from his high office.

There was a ruin of St. Stephen's.

And Redfern, hating in his heart him he once called friend, whom he tried to save from his folly, knew that an unbreakable seal was on his lips,—the seal of the infidel. To speak was to cast doubt on his own honor, which he zealously guarded. Who is an infidel, though an English gentleman, to testify against a priest of the church? He would have none of its quarrels as he had asked for none of its salvation. If it had threatened him with eternal damnation it was but fair that he should look unquestioningly on while it wrestled in torment of its own. Even he who disbelieves has his day. There is a wonderful virtue in some consistency. And Redfern still clung to that shadowy ideal of emptiness which he still excused with the name of friendship.

And so, not speaking to each other, Chislebrook was rector of St. Stephen's and Redfern no longer attendant at church. Thus it was,—in that place the infidel was the man of God and he who ministered, the child of the devil.

"I tell you that is the man! He was in my class at Harrow. Why, I know that gaunt figure,—he was tackle on the eleven. After finishing Oxford he went to a divinity school for two years, got mixed up in an affair and left the country for it. He hasn't orders any more than you have, Chester Redfern. There isn't a bishop in Britain who'd ordain him."

Redfern lay back in the easy chair of his smoking-room deep in thought, gazing at the face of his old friend, Howard Melville, British traveler. Redfern was the older, but love of travel had introduced and united them, they had taken long cruises together, and Melville made a special trip from London to meet his crony.

Melville was something of a churchman, and at his solicitation Redfern had accompanied him that Sunday morning to St. Stephen's. He said nothing of the events that had disturbed the repose of the parish that the tranquility of Melville's transient stay might not be broken. He was amazed when his chum nudged him, asked who the priest was;—but Redfern was unable to reply. After all, who was he? Why had it happened that no one before had asked that most natural question, first suggested by a stranger? He had referred to no one, he admitted never having held an English cure, and his only proofs of his claims had been his word. Singular trust! Hampden had trusted him! Those who in faith received his offices gave him the care of their very souls. And now, false to friends, he was false to himself.

Melville had laughed right out in the church. Everyone was scandalized, but he knew that he did no sacrilege. At the sound, Cyril Chislebrook had looked startled toward the pew, and when he saw the faces of the Englishmen he went pale as death. But he finished the service, concluding prayers in a scarcely audible whisper.

While Redfern and Melville were discussing their future course of conduct, the new arrival being now familiar with the circumstances of the Hampden tragedy, a servant entered with a card. On it was REV. CYRIL CHISLEBROOK, Rector of St. Stephen's. Chislebrook followed. Redfern remained seated, smoking idly. But Melville rose with mock courtesy.

"One should not be seated in the presence of the clergy," he remarked ironically.

Chislebrook was composed. He no longer labored under the strain of continued hypocrisy. He spoke to the point.

"Gentlemen, I have no documents to prove my claims. You have me at your mercy. Neither would forgeries stand me in stead, for the cable to Liverpool is at your hand. I pretend no more."

"But there's one thing I am standing for, and as a true sportsman each of you must give me credit for it. I played my part well. I never failed a moment. I over-mastered them, and there's not a soul in all this diocese, from the bishop to St. Stephen's sexton, who does not consider me as good a priest as there is in all Australia. Not for pity ask I, but because I was an excellent hypocrite, I ask you both, men of the world, to let me leave this place without a scandal."

Melville looked at Redfern. "We are true sportsmen," he said, "and we admire brave blood."

Chislebrook's future trembled in their decision. The scales seemed to incline his way.

Suddenly Redfern leaped from his chair. "But this man is a damned coward!" he screamed, the repressed fury of long months of toleration leaping in a word to his lips. "He's no sportsman's blood in his veins, but the blood of a cur,—and a lily-white liver. He has not only the hypocrisy of hell but he's a traitor to an innocent and suffering man! Take that!" Bending forward, he struck Chislebrook full in the face with his gloves.

The man assailed cowed before Redfern's tury. "And now to unfrock him," cried the host. "I'll not fight you, for you won't fight. You've no principle to fight for nor soul to fight with. Sit down at that table and write to the Bishop of Sidney saying you are a fraud, a liar, a hypocrite, an impositor, and that you deliberately conspired to ruin the reputation of Graeme Hampden, who is innocent of any wrong."

Word for word Chislebrook wrote and then signed the dictated letter, which Melville and Redfern witnessed.

"Now go," said Redfern. "Do not let tomorrow night find you in Australia."

Redfern looked at Melville triumphantly. "Now to save Hampden, if that be possible."

More than a year had passed since the first fatal precipitation of events. Crushed and wounded to his soul, Graeme Hampden had left church, profession, home, and wife,—for he said, "If they take away my most sacred office, in the sight of God I must resign my most holy love."

He had tried to work in a distant city as a tutor. His soul failed him. He could not think. And then he had gone on board a ship, where he worked with his hands, but no one asked him to use his brain. Rugged, brown with the sea, marked with the seals of travel, but ever sad, Graeme, believing himself unrecognizable from the scholarly poet of old, felt an irresistible power compel him to St. Stephen's.

It was the time of eve, and Christmas Day. A mellowness uncommon christened the air of sunset. There were the blooming canna and cinnevaria,—the gloxiana in its glory. Over the lawn Graeme went into the chapel. In the light from a Gothic panel, the Sanctus Bell shone with the last of the sun. Hampden's heart melted. He went across, laid both hands upon it, and then knelt. After a moment, he rose, and turning saw the bishop in the chancel. Service was over, and in the dim shadow, four people were watching him absorbingly,—the bishop, Iona, his old servant, and Chester Redfern. The Chief Shepherd and the Woman held out their arms.

HUNTER RYE FOR CHRISTMAS.

What would the joyous Christmas season be without the enlivening, stimulating cocktail to re-energize the fatigued shopper, and act as an appetizer to the Christmas menu?

"At the punch-bowl's brink,

As they say in Japan:

First the man takes a drink,

Then the drink takes a man,

Then the drink takes the man."

But when the American gentleman drinks, he is always sure to order only that brand of whisky that is pure, the "real stuff," and which therefore has none of those disagreeable after-effects produced by inferior liquors. For his Christmas cocktail, his Christmas punch, his Christmas egg-nog, the American connoisseur orders Hunter Baltimore Rye. No other whisky is so popular in this country, or so well adapted, in its admirable qualities, to form the staple of the liquid cheer at Christmas time.

CROWN JEWELS PAWNED BY MONARCHS.

It is a well known fact that rulers have been compelled to pawn the royal jewels in times of need to carry on affairs of state importance. The private citizen of today need not feel skeptical about doing likewise if necessary. A special department for this purpose exists at the Baldwin Jewelry Store, 906 Market street, where liberal advances can be obtained at banking rates.

Let us honor, O my brothers, Christmas Day!
 Call a truce, then, to our labors,—let us feast with friend and neighbors,
 And be merry as the custom of our caste;
 For if "faint and forced the laughter," and if sadness follow after,
 We are richer by one mocking Christmas Day.

Christmas Customs

BY ROBERT MACE.

Communing with the antiquaries, I absorbed much interesting information concerning the origin of the Christmas customs. Those industrious, dry-as-dust chaps who read monuments and burrow into the dust of tombs make it clear to us that we are indebted to the ancients for many of the Christmas and New Year ceremonies and customs. The Romans had their Saturnalia, the motif of which was thankfulness for the common blessings of life. The feasts, revelry and mummeries of early times, the exchanging of gifts and visits among friends, embodying some thought of gratitude to a higher power, and some foreshadowing of the universal brotherhood of man, were no doubt the inspiration of the early Christians in adopting the more noble observances that are today associated with the Yuletide period. The Saturnalia of the Romans lasted several days and merged into the festival of the New Year. It was Alfred the Great of England who ordered the annual festival to be kept for twelve days ending with the feast of Epiphany. The revels of the Twelfth Night, of which Shakespeare in his comedy gives us the spirit, were the feature of this celebration in which the wassail-bowl was substituted for the Grace Cup of the Latins. That pleasant and popular custom of kissing a maid under the mistletoe is said to be several hundred years old. The mistletoe enjoyed amatory significance among the Chaldeans, who believed that it had some mysterious effect on the passions, and the Greeks used it for decorative purposes at farewell bachelor banquets. The Scandinavians dedicated the mistletoe to Freya, their goddess of beauty and love, who united in herself the attributes of Venus and of Proserpine, who was queen of the dead. It is curious how the mistletoe has been associated with both love and death in the legends and mythology of many countries. It was with a sprig of mistletoe fashioned into an arrow that Loki, the evil spirit of the Scandinavians, killed Balder, the sun-god. The myth is the story of the tragedy of the solar-year, the sun overwhelmed by the gloom of mid-winter.

The gathering of the mistletoe was an important ceremony among the ancient Druids. Five days after the new moon they went in stately procession to the forest and raised an altar of grass beneath the finest mistletoe-bearing oak they could find; the arch-Druid ascended the oak, and with a golden knife removed the sacred parasite, while the inferior priests stood beneath and caught the plant upon a white cloth, for if a portion of it but touched the ground it was an omen of misfortune to the land. The mistletoe was distributed among the people on the first day of the new year. It was supposed to possess the mystic virtue of giving fertility, and from this belief may have originated the osculatory practice which is presumed to lead to a matrimonial compact. It was because the mistletoe was dedicated to Freya only when it did not touch the earth that it has always been hung from the ceilings of houses; and it is still considered unlucky if it is dropped or placed on the ground, which superstition is no doubt a relic of the Scandinavian legend. In mediæval times the mistletoe was among the evergreens employed in the Christmas decoration of churches, but it was subsequently excluded. It was banished about the time that the custom of kissing in church was barred. The Christmas custom of kissing beneath the mistletoe originated in England, and one of the earliest minstrels sang:

"Yet why should this holy and festival mirth
 In the reign of old Christmas only be found?
 Hang up Love's mistletoe over the earth,
 And let us kiss under it all the year round."

Californian Literature

BY SARAH CONNELL.

The year 1904 has been singularly free from literary sensations. Apparently Californians, both the writers and their friends, have come to the conclusion that there is nothing gained by raising a view halloo every time a pen reaches out towards an inkstand. The result is a decided gain in dignity, for assuredly it is time we acknowledged that we have passed beyond the period of phenomenal infancy. To be sure, the sallysharps and bavardes have given weekly notice that at one time or another each of the society butterflies and smart set matrons was spending half an hour daily in diligent historical research with a view to insuring the perfection of some forthcoming masterpiece, but these announcements are not to be taken any more seriously than the fulsome adulation of the beauty and grace of the same ladies. It is only a manner of speech and to be "engaged in literary labor" may be only a modification of the social fiction that miladi is not at home, when she does not wish to be disturbed by an unwelcome caller. We have not had even such a ripple as was caused last year by the famous Kipling Calendar episode.

Jack London, who is now one of the foremost figures in the literary world, had just published his "People of the Abyss" at the close of last year and it was still under discussion for several months in the spring. As a sociological record it will continue to maintain its value until superseded by some new sensation. Singularly enough, it is the only book by this author which has come in for adverse criticism in England, where, apparently, they have not relished the open discussion of the misery of London's slums, though, taken in connection with the novels of the late George Gissing and the reports of the Salvation Army, there can be no doubt of its truth. A volume of fugitive short stories under the title "The Faith of Men" was put forth during the summer, not new work and not Mr. London's best, but well worth preserving, nevertheless. His "Sea Wolf" was the feature of the Century Magazine during the year. It revived discussion as to whether or not the serial per se is dead, or whether it is only the class of serials which we have been treated to of late years that is really at fault for the lack of interest. "The Sea Wolf" has just appeared in book form and bids fair to become a best seller. It is to have a stage production, the play being put into shape for Richard Mansfield. One of Mr. London's early short stories, "The Scorn of Women," is also to be dramatized for Ethel Barrymore. Meantime the publishers of Mr. London's other long novel, "A Daughter of the Snows," announce that the revival of interest has been sufficient to justify them in issuing a new edition. Mr. London went to Japan at the breaking out of the war in the interest of the Hearst syndicate, where, if he saw no more, at least he saw no less than the other correspondents.

Gwendolen Overton's "Captains of the World" shows her to good advantage in an entirely new environment. She has dealt calmly and dispassionately with the labor problem and has conclusively proved herself to be independent of her environment. Her first novel, "A Heritage of Unrest," was located in an Arizona army post; her second took us to a primitive Canadian village, while her latest deals with the conditions of a manufacturing town.

Geraldine Bonner, who has been contributing a series of travel letters to The Argonaut, has published no book this year, but it is announced that "The Pioneer," a story of mining life in Nevada, is ready for early production.

Miriam Michelson sprang suddenly into national prominence when her first book, "In the Bishop's Carriage," made its appearance. Month after month it headed the list of best sellers, and if one might hazard a guess, it has probably outsold "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." As might naturally be expected, such a wholesale recognition did not pass unrewarded and Miss Michelson is in demand everywhere. A series of sketches of child life, "The Madigans of Nevada," was published in the Century during the year, and at the present writing the author is enjoying the unique sensation of seeing two of her books, her first two at that, both figuring in the lists of best sellers.

Mary Austin, whose "Land of little Rain" has received the recognition of the Government by being added to the list of books suitable for marine libraries, has also written another book, "The Basket Woman," and her novel, "Isidrio," is now making its appearance as a serial in the Atlantic Monthly.

Anna Alexander Rogers's novel, "Peace and the Vices," is a notable contribution. It deals with the effects of peace upon a naval officer, whose nerves are kept strung up to their highest tension in constant preparation for war, and then deprived of his legitimate opportunity for relaxation by the continuance of peace. Mrs. Rogers, who is the daughter of an army officer and the wife of a lieutenant in the navy, speaks from inside knowledge when she maintains that under the circumstances a breach of the strict proprieties does not necessarily convict a man of unfitness for the service.

Gertrude Atherton's "Rulers of Kings" created something of a sensation, rather from the daring unconventionality of her treatment of living monarchs than from its intrinsic merit. It enjoyed the distinction of not being issued in the Tauchnitz edition of worthy books and it is hinted that the author's sudden determination to return to California was instigated by a hint from the German Emperor. Mrs. Atherton is reported to be engaged on a life of Aaron Burr.

Kate Douglas Wiggin maintains her popularity, and her "Affair at the Inn," written in collaboration with the Findlater sisters and Mr. Allan McAulay, is one of the books of the hour.

Ida Meacham Stowbridge, Frances Charles, Alice Prescott Smith, Pauline Bradford Mackay and Jessie Juliet Knox have each contributed to the sum of achievement.

The veteran Charles Warren Stoddard put forth another volume of his old but ever new reminiscences and recollections; Will Irwin and Gelett Burgess preserved some bits of local history in their collaboration, "The Picaroon," which is yet to receive the recognition which it deserves, and in addition they have both contributed to periodical literature. Rumor has it that they are at present engaged on a serious novel of San Francisco life. Mr. Burgess has furnished more "Goops" for the delectation of the younger generation, and Wallace Irwin, in addition to his verses, which appear in every kind and class of periodical production, has given us two volumes of his peculiar style of humor, "Fairly Tales up to Now" and the "Nautical Lays of a Landsman."

Anna Strunsky, who collaborated with Jack London in the production of the "Kempton-Wace Letters," is reported to be writing a novel dealing with Socialism in California, and she has recently appeared as a lecturer before some of the women's clubs.

Adeline Knapp, whose "Upland Pastures" has been reissued in an edition de luxe, has been a frequent contributor to magazines, and the names of Mabel Craft Deering, Juliet Wilbur Tompkins, Elizabeth Knight Tompkins, Hermann Whittaker, Charles Michelson, James Hopper and Philip Verrill Mighels are of monthly occurrence.

Mr. Mighels's "Bruvver Jim's Baby," an idyl of a Nevada mining camp, provoked several columns of discussion in the Literary Supplement of the New York Times. The book appeared simultaneously with Josephine Daskam's "Memoirs of a Baby," and apparently the dispute as to whether "Bruvver Jim" or Miss Daskam were the better mother absorbed a good portion of the heat which is usually expended on a political campaign.

Jeremiah Lynch embodied his experience as a Klondike miner in a volume which was a best seller locally, and will be a valuable addition to the early history of Dawson City when the century is older.

Edward Townsend's "Sure," another Chimmie Fadden book, was issued early in the year, and Chimmie still lives and is apparently inexhaustible. Mr. Townsend struck a new vein in an epistolary series and will probably collect the dozen or so letters into a volume shortly.

Mary Hallock Foote's volume entitled "A Touch of the Sun" is composed of short stories collected from the magazines.

Bailey Millard's "Lure o' Gold" is one of the best stories of hidden treasure and adventure at sea that has yet appeared, and one can cheerfully recommend it to parents bewildered in their search for something for the boys, which will avoid on one hand the namby-pamby goody-goodyishness that all healthy young males despise, while steering clear of the vulgarity and profanity which render so many good stories of adventure unfit for young readers. "Lure o' Gold" ought to enjoy as long a lease of life as "Treasure Island."

Stuart Edward White, who is now a resident of California and an inspector of Forest Reserves, has three books to his credit, "The Silent Places," concerning itself with the Hudson Bay Territory and factories, "Blazed Trail Stories," his contribution of short stories to McClure's, and "The Mountains," a record of a summer spent in traveling through the mountains of Southern California, a companion to his "Forest," which appeared about a year ago. Mr. White will shortly publish, in collaboration with Samuel Hopkins Adams, a tale of maritime adventure, "The Mystery."

Two books, each notable in its way, have chosen the Indians of the Yosemite as their subject. The first to make its appearance is little more than a pamphlet in size, but there is not a superfluous word between its covers. Galen Clark, the author,

Smith confined herself to the Indian legends of the valley and her work follows closely that of Mr. Clark. Mr. Clark's little book is illustrated by photographs and by sketches by Chris Jorgensen, while that of Miss Smith contains color work by Miss Florence Lundborg.

Charles Keeler's contributions to the Impressionist Quarterly, "The House Beautiful," have been more permanently preserved and in addition he has written a little book of verse for young children, "Elfin Songs of Sunland." Rumor has it that he is writing a play in collaboration with another author.

Louis A. Robertson's new volume of poems, "From Crypt to Choir," is just from the press and George Sterling, whose "Testimony of the Suns" is now a year old, has out a new edition. There have been the usual number of books of rhyme and verse from time to time, but nothing especially notable, either as good or bad. As a rule the craftsmanship of the printer and publisher surpasses that of the author.

Maurice V. Samuels has written a drama of considerable merit, entitled "The Florentines," which, however, in the present state of dramatic taste, is hardly likely to see stage production.

A highly interesting narrative of actual experience in search for pirate treasure is that of the gentleman who prefers to be known as George Wood. It calls for comment both as being the work of a local writer and for the fact that the expedition set sail from our own water-front.

A number of volumes of personal recollections and memoirs have made their appearance during the year. Mrs. Luella Dickenson has preserved the records of her husband's journey across the plains in 1846 and the early days in California before the gold discovery, Edward Bosqui has had printed for private circulation among the family and intimate friends a small edition of his memoirs, and Uncle George Bromley has fittingly rounded out the year by giving us his recollections of "The Long Ago and the Later On."

Dr. Behr, another veteran Bohemian, passed from life just after his "Hoot of the Owl," a combination of papers read at various times before the club, made its appearance in print, and still another volume of special interest to that body is "Early Bohemia" a plea for more of the original spirit of Bohemia, and less of commercialism, together with some of the wise and witty summons issued in earlier days to the Jinks. It was put forth anonymously by one of the old members of the organization.

Our local publishers have shown no deterioration in their work or workmanship. The Tomoye Press of the Paul Elder Company has achieved recognition in all parts of the country solely through the perfection of its productions. The Cynic's Calendar, which, by the way, has been entirely re-written for 1905 and furnished with new illustrations, is only one of the publications identified with this firm. The Impressionist Quarterly is another. Booklets, cards, and compilations of various sorts, all vying with each other in their artistic appearance, are brought forth in profusion. Among these of the past year may be recalled the four—"Mosaic Essays," "Prosit," the book of toasts compiled by the Spinners' Club, the four "101's," Beverages, Salads, Candies and Chafing Dish Recipes," and "Proverbs of the People." The edition of "Upland Pastures" and "Yosemite Legends" leave nothing to be desired. The rooms of the Paul Elder Company have been called into requisition during the year for a number of artistic displays, but they are well worthy of a visit themselves even when there is nothing especial on exhibition.

A. M. Robertson seems to have gained the favor of the Bohemian Club writers, and he well deserves their patronage for the taste which he has expended on their productions.

The Whitaker & Ray Company has given its attention chiefly to law and text books, but lately they have issued some very attractive volumes in other branches of literature as well.

One of the earliest events of the year, which, however, passed almost unnoticed, was the awarding of the first Goncourt Prize of five thousand francs to Antoine Torquet, otherwise John Antoine Nau, at one time a resident of San Francisco, and another occurrence which is probably as literary as the ladies it concerns, is the litigation in the Women's Press Club, some disgruntled members of which are suing others, wholesale and retail, for damages to the modest amount of a hundred thousand dollars apiece. No one outside of the organization seems to know or to care particularly what it is really all about, though the periodical reappearance of some notice concerning the progress of the affair serves to remind us that there is such an organization as a Women's Press Association.

T O W N T A L K

The year just past has not been a remarkable one in any respect. From the writers of established reputation we have had no better work than we had reason to expect, while from some we had reason to look for better than they have given us. But if no new stars have arisen in the firmament, none of the older ones have sunk below the horizon. Miriam Michelson has but come into her inheritance and Gwendolen Overton and Jack London held their own. The various prize contests inaugurated by the newspapers with a view to stimulating talent have not as yet brought out any latent genius, nor are they likely to, but if we have no cause for gratulation, neither is there reason to be cast down. We have passed that milestone in our growth when we need to be patted on the shoulder and told what good little children we are in order to encourage us to put forth our best efforts, and we have, it is to be hoped, ceased the "Little Jack Horner" style of self-laudation. If there is a fault to be found with local comment it is its tendency to go to the other extreme and disparage, seemingly for no other reason than a spirit of disbelief that "any good can come out of Nazareth." The one is as bad as the other, for whereas laudation of anything to which we can lay claim simply because it is our own lays us open to a charge of provincialism; on the other hand, the habit of promiscuous knocking is too evidently the result of ill-natured jealousy. There has been quite too much of this spirit displayed during the last twelve months. Certain contributors to the local weeklies appear to hold the opinion that because a writer has personal peculiarities distasteful to the critic, or because he has family misfortunes which fall short of death, therefore it is impossible that there shall be merit in his work and it is their bounden duty to make known the defects lest the world at large be misled by appearances. It is time that such petty spitefulness was laid aside, and it is to be hoped that whatever else the new year develops it will see at least a growth of magnanimity, or the outward semblance of it.

THE FLOOD BUILDING.

Though many fine buildings have been erected in San Francisco during 1904, the most notable achievement was that of the architects of the new Flood Building, at Powell and Market streets. In this building grandeur and grace are combined. There is not a finer office building anywhere in this country. Its equipments are of the most modern character, and nothing was omitted that could subserve the purposes for which it is devoted. Mr. Flood has always had great confidence in the future of this city of his birth, and he has played an active part in its development.

C. E. Goldsmith, the engraver of 36 Geary street, is now with Sanborn, Vail & Co. He has charge of the engraving of wedding invitations, visiting cards, announcements, etc. Mr. Goldsmith's presence at Sanborn, Vail's insures a continuance of the very best work that the engraver's art produces. Prices always right. 741 Market street.

MINNIE C. MILLS,

Plaintiff.

vs.

CHARLES E. MILLS,

Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

D. E. MCKINLAY,
Plaintiff's Attorney.

The People of the State of California send greeting to:

CHARLES E. MILLS, Defendant.
YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful neglect, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

GIVEN under my hand and Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 30th day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four.

JOHN J. GREIF, Clerk.

Defendants.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

GOODFELLOW & EELLS,
Attorneys for Plaintiff.

The People of the State of California send greeting to:

JOHN V. VREDENBERGH, HENRY H. HULL and JOHN DOE ARNAIZ, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint, adverse to the Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto, Defendants.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in the action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff, in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after service upon you of this summons, if served within said City and County; if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to so appear and answer, the Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Said action is brought to quiet Plaintiff's title and to determine all adverse claims of any of the defendants in and to that certain parcel of land situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which is bounded and described as follows, to-wit:—

Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Greenwich street distant thereon 272.265 feet easterly from the easterly line of Gough street, and running thence easterly and along said southerly line of Greenwich street to a point distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet and six (6) inches westerly from the westerly line of Franklin street; thence at a right angle southerly, parallel with said westerly line of Franklin street, to the intersection of the northeasterly line of the northwest quarter (¼) of Lot No. Four (4) of the Laguna Survey; thence northwesterly along said line of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4) to the northerly corner of the northwest quarter (¼) of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4); thence northeasterly to the point of commencement.

Being a part of Western Addition Block No. 115, and being also a part of the northeast quarter (¼) of said Lot No. Four (4) of the Laguna Survey.

WITNESS my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of October, in the year 1904.

Other People's Ideas

Like many another wise and respected saying, the assertion that "all the world loves a lover" is only true within limits. The world does not love the lover who is in love with another man's wife, and yet, considered strictly as a lover, he has his claims to sympathy, merely on the ground that he receives so little of it. Presumably he shares the very same doubts and bleak despondencies, the trembling hopes that are the lot of other lovers; and very likely even the lady herself sometimes takes advantage of his position to trample upon his tenderest feelings in the name of propriety. And yet the world will have none of him. He is an Ishmael, whose hand is lifted against the primeval social instinct, which even the savage respects. There is no doubt whatever that even the wolf has his anxieties, and is at times very unhappy, but no one ever seems to think it necessary to express any sympathy for him.—From "The Horse-Lecch's Daughters," by Margaret Doyle Jackson.

From "Judgment," by Alice Brown:
Sometimes I think what we call the will of God is our own will: not our individual will, but the accumulated word of generation upon generation. We are like voices that cry out, demanding something. We decree love and we get it—for somebody. It is like a beautiful creation, like flowers in a garden. Or we call for vengeance.—Helen.

The law of all loving is that lovers shall turn their backs upon the garden which lies "eastward in Eden," and set their faces toward the West. In their journeying they will come upon springs and dried water-courses, upon bloom and withering, upon ripeness and fallow fields. But if they keep the memory of Eden, the sun of noon and the later light will fall sweetly on their faces, and they will discover that the journey lies through the land of Heart's Content. And after sunset no one knows. There, it may be, lies the land of Heart's Delight; for as the evening and the morning were the first day, so the last evening may be followed shortly by the morning.

From "The Last Hope," by Henry Seton Merriman:

Human nature is the same, it would appear, all the world over, but the upper crust is always the hardest.

A woman is always glad to be told a secret, and immediately begins to anticipate the pleasure she will take in telling it to others, in confidence.—Juliette de Gensac.

NOTICE OF SALE.

OFFICE OF TAX COLLECTOR, CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Notice of sale of property of the State, pursuant to Section 3897 of the Political Code.

Whereas, On the 10th day of November, 1904, there was received by me and filed in my office a written authorization, under the hand and seal of the Controller of the State of California, which said authorization was and is in the words and figures following, to wit:

Whereas, On various dates there were filed and recorded in the Controller's office of the State of California certain deeds conveying to the People of the State of California the title to those certain lots and parcels of land hereinafter described;

And whereas, Said deeds recite the fact that said property hereinafter described was struck off and sold to the People of the State of California for the non-payment of State and county taxes, penalties and costs, and all charges levied and assessed against the said property for the years 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897 and 1898;

And whereas, Five years have elapsed since the date of said sale, and no redemption, according to law, has been made of said property, or any part thereof;

Now, therefore, in pursuance of the laws in such cases made and provided, I, E. P. Colgan, Controller of the State of California, by virtue of the authority in me vested by the laws of this State, do by these presents authorize, empower and direct you, the said Tax Collector, to sell at public auction, in separate lots or parcels, the property hereinafter described, in the manner following: Public notice shall first be given of such sale by publication for at least three weeks in some newspaper published in the County, or City and County, or if there be no newspaper published therein, then by posting a notice in three conspicuous places in the County, or City and County, for the same period, which notices must state specifically the place of, and the day and hour of sale, and shall contain a description of the property to be sold, and shall also embody a copy of this authorization.

The property above referred to and hereby authorized to be sold is situate, lying and being in the County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit:

(Property sold to the State July 3, 1896, for taxes of 1895.)

The lot of land commencing at a point on the easterly line of White street, distant sixty-two (62) feet, six (6) inches northerly from Vallejo street; thence running northerly along the easterly line of White street twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles easterly fifty-six (56) feet; thence at right angles southerly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles westerly fifty-six (56) feet, to the point of commencement.

The lot of land commencing at a point on the southeasterly line of San Jose avenue, distant one hundred and fifty (150) feet northeasterly from Sherman avenue, thence running northeasterly along the southeasterly line of San Jose avenue, fifty-two (52) feet; thence running southeasterly one hundred and fifteen (115) feet, more or less; thence running southwesterly fifty-two (52) feet, and thence running northwesterly one hundred and twenty (120) feet, more or less, to the point of beginning. Being a portion of block numbered five (5) as per map of the West End Map No. 2, filed in the office of the City and County Recorder May 1, 1863, at the request of Harvey S. Brown.

The lots of land numbers two (2), three (3), four (4), five (5) and six (6), in block numbered fourteen (14), as per map of the West End, Map No. 2, filed in the office of the City and County Recorder May 1, 1863, at the request of Harvey S. Brown.

The lot of land number six (6), in block numbered twenty (20), as per map of the Sears subs. of West End Map No. 2, filed in the office of the City and County Recorder January 17, 1885, at the request of Henry Sears.

The lot of land number sixteen (16), in block numbered twenty (20), as per map of the Sears subs. of West End Map No. 2, filed in the office of the City and County Recorder January 17, 1885, at the request of Henry Sears.

The lot of land commencing at a point on the southeasterly line of Mission street, distant one hundred and twenty-eight (128) feet northeasterly from Olive street; thence running northeasterly along the southeasterly line of Mission street, twenty-five (25) feet; thence at right angles southeasterly ninety (90) feet; thence at right angles southwesterly twenty-five (25) feet, and thence at right angles northwesterly ninety (90) feet, to the point of beginning, as per map of the West End Homestead Association, filed in the office of the City and County Recorder March 26, 1863, at the request of John A. Bauer.

The lot of land numbered one hundred and forty-five (145), as per map of the Gift Map No. 1, filed in the office of the City and County Recorder November 7, 1861, at the request of H. S. Brown.

Hearst's Awakening

In announcing his intention to quit the job-chasing pastime, Mr. Hearst said that he feared that, as a candidate, he would be subject to misrepresentation. Mr. Hearst is addicted to the habit of employing language to conceal his thoughts and his motives. If he were candid he would say that after much experience he had become sensible of the fact that the public are skeptical of the protestations and professions of a newspaper whose proprietor is trying to boost himself into high office. Mr. Hearst has come out of his pipe-dream. He has long labored under the delusion that he could make himself the logical standard-bearer of his party by professing himself, in large insistent type, to be the logical standard-bearer. Blissfully he nursed the fond hallucination that the people would accept him at his own estimate providing he shouted his own praises loud enough, and with interminable legato. He had argued with himself no doubt that years of consistent espousal of party principles and of deeds that were eloquent of his sympathy for the plain people, gave vraisemblance to the claims which he put forth as a candidate for the Presidency. All of which was quite plausible, but Mr. Hearst should have reflected that perhaps the people might suspect that his past professions and performances had all been in pursuance of a policy that had for its object the achieving of a high political ambition. He also should have reflected that for years he had been noisily advertising his best performances, giving the impression that the tactics which he had pursued were designed to enhance the value of his newspaper properties. The methods that he exploited were those of the mountebank, and despite all the good that he has done, despite achievements which we believe were those of a sincere patriot and public spirited citizen, when he announced his candidacy, refined and intelligent people who had judged him by his immodest panegyrics on his own virtues were shocked at what they considered stupendous audacity. We have always admired Mr. Hearst for his generosity and for his high civic ideals, and during his campaign we defended him against the vicious slanders of his envious rivals, but we never took his candidacy seriously. We believe that the philosopher who writes eccentric editorials for the Hearst papers on how to achieve success in life should find inspiration for a moral lesson in the disappointment of his employer. He should be able to write a whole page on the absurdity of sticking to the same rules of action in widely different fields of endeavor.

Lawson's Message

Up to the time that Town Talk asserted that Tom Lawson's Frenzied Finance serial was the greatest and most important message to the American people since the Emancipation Proclamation, no attention had been paid to the sensational performances of the Boston millionaire by any of our local contemporaries. The San Francisco editors were all busy advising the belligerents in the Orient, discussing Tariff Revision, and the petty grafter of the predaceous Schmitz gang. They had yet to appreciate the fact that one of the ablest financiers in this country was laying bare a hideous ulcer that is feeding on the vitals of the National Government. Blissfully ignorant were they that an alarm had been sounded which was awakening the masses throughout the country, and directing attention to a system of graft and plunder operated by an octopus whose tentacles extend into almost every department of the Government at Washington and into the legislatures and courts of several States, infusing a poison that is rapidly impoverishing the life-blood of the nation, and threatening the Republic with moral chaos and ethical anarchy. But the editors have of late been sitting up and taking notice. The despatches have been teeming with the news of Lawson's doings, and it has become apparent that the author of Frenzied Finance is the man of the hour. Even the strenuous President has been unable to break into the limelight since the Boston millionaire caught the public ear. The scoffers have had to take a back seat. Tom Lawson is making good. He has painted in luminous colors the infamy of some of our leading citizens, the perversity, untrustworthiness and absolute unmorality of men who have been clandestinely guiding the destinies of the nation through the instrumentality of facile puppets in the halls of legislation. His analysis of the methods of the big insurance companies has startled the people of the country. He has proved that our greatest financiers are bigger scoundrels than most of the professional swindlers that are wearing prison garb. Tom Lawson is awakening public sentiment against the monstrous evils propagated by the Rockefellerers and their heinous associates. President Roosevelt is bound to take cognizance of those evils and it is his duty to insist upon remedial legislation. Of course the Standard Oil puppets will be prepared to combat every effort made to curb the aggressions of the giant Trust, but when public sentiment is thoroughly aroused, as it surely will be before the close of Lawson's thrilling tale, it will behoove the rogues to take to cover. Lawson has predicted the scattering of the greedy crew, and he has proved himself a man of wonderfully keen prophetic vision.

The Nan Patterson Case

The case of Nan Patterson has been absorbing a great deal of public attention and provoking much superheated discussion. There are some people who maintain that no punishment is too severe for an abandoned woman who separates man and wife, and they think that justice would be outraged if she were not convicted. They are not quite sure whether she should be convicted of murder in the first degree or of a simple assault, but convicted of something she should be, in the opinion of moralists who demand that the sanctity of the home should be preserved at all hazards. Certainly if Nan Patterson killed Caesar Young deliberately and with malice aforethought, she should be convicted; not of simple assault but of murder. In this particular case, however, the sanctity of the home is not involved, for it does not appear that Caesar Young ever considered that, as a husband, he was bound by any sacred or moral obligations. He never imparted any sacred or inviolable character to his home life. When he met Nan Patterson he did not introduce himself as the husband of Mrs. Young, nor did she ask for a copy of his marriage certificate. There was nothing in the character of his associates or of the diversion that he sought to remind her of the sanctity of a home. She presumed that in availing himself of her society he was not departing from his usual routine. She was a young woman, one or two years out of her teens, scarcely old enough to justify the supposition that she was schooled in all the insidious wiles that artful or designing women practice for the ensnaring of the unsophisticated male person. The probability is that the ripening of the relationship into an attachment was due to the efforts of the experienced man of the world, a man of the type that is responsible for brothels, bawdy houses and prostitutes. So there is no reason why the case should be considered from a sentimental or moral standpoint. The only question at issue on her trial was that involving her guilt or innocence in respect of the crime of murder. And from what we know of the testimony we do not believe that she received a fair trial. We know that the District Attorney offered in evidence a letter written by Nan Patterson's sister to Caesar Young, the purpose of which was to prejudice the jury against the defendant, and the court admitted it in evidence with the understanding that if the prosecution could not connect the defendant with the writing of it the jury should be instructed to exclude it from consideration. Of course the connection was not made, and the probability is that the District Attorney knew that he could not make it when he offered the letter. His purpose was to influence the jury, and we all know that it is farcical to ask jurors to reject anything that has been brought to their attention. Some District Attorneys, eager for the glory of a fine record, such as is evidenced by a string of convictions, have not the manliness or the decency to deal fairly with a defendant. The District Attorney of New York appears to be such a one.

Napoleon's Prophecy

A commission has been appointed in France to revise the Code Napoleon, which has been the civil law of the country for one hundred years. It is a law founded on such wise principles that the probability is it will not be subjected to destructive revision. The temperament of the French people has not changed much in a century, and there is not widespread demand in the country for new rules of action. Comparatively little of Napoleon's fame rests on his genius as a statesman, and yet that genius was considerable, but it was completely overshadowed by his military achievements. But Napoleon, like many other distinguished mortals, preferred to shine not in the role in which he won distinction, but in one with which the public declined to identify him. When his famous code was completed he said, "I will go down in history with that book in my hand." That was what he hoped to do, but the brilliant Corsican had no control of his posthumous fame. So dazzling was his military genius that it blinds the eye of the historian and prevents him from seeing the astute diplomat, the brilliant statesman and the learned law-giver. Napoleon's pen never attained the dignity of his sword.

Black and Depew

The friends of Chauncey Depew are furious because the New York Republican machine has decided to substitute ex-Governor Frank S. Black for him in the United States Senate. They assert that Depew is to be turned down by the Harriman railroad interests, and that Black is the representative of that gigantic combination. All of which is no doubt quite true, but it should be remembered that Mr. Depew is also the representative of a big financial combine. He was elected to the Senate at the instigation of the Vanderbilts and he served them there. If the people of New York had the privilege of choosing a Senator, Frank S. Black would more likely be their choice than Chauncey Depew, for Black is a man of great ability, entirely fitted to hold the office, whereas Depew is merely a good-natured wit qualified to shine at dinners, or to beam with opulent smile on a Womans' Congress. He has long served as an ornament to social functions, and he is much more useful to society and clubdom than to the great State of New York. Mr. Black is in every respect a suitable representative of his party, and he is not the less so by reason of the circumstance of his being the representative also of special interests.

Importance of Appearance

One of the New York dailies recently commented severely in its editorial columns on the immorality of a certain wall poster which represented an elaborately attired damsel whose complacent summing up of herself was "Everyone is good to me because I look prosperous." It was queried whether shop girls and others of the proletariat were to be thus given an object lesson in surface display, whether they were to be taught by example that to look "well turned out" was the essential thing, and as a corollary that to have "things" was the main matter of consideration, regardless of how they were obtained. As a matter of plain fact every girl knows long ere this that to look prosperous is the best means of securing a fair share of prosperity. Neither employers nor casual acquaintances feel called upon to "go back of the records," and if a person looks sufficiently well-dressed, no questions are asked as to the means by which the appearance is produced. Personal necessity is not a factor in the case when seeking employment, and of two applicants for the same position, the lady in silken skirts and the latest tailor-made has a decided advantage over her shabby sister. To be sure, fine raiment will not suffice when it accompanies conspicuous inability, but on the other hand, shabby gloves do not, of necessity, cover dexterous fingers, and other things being equal, an employer may, without deliberate forethought or intention, find himself swayed in favor of the one who appeals to his esthetic sense. He does not concern himself to inquire whether his eight-dollar a week stenographer has a private income which enables her to wear furs and diamonds and indulge in automobile rides. His cashier or bookkeeper may be a masquerading millionairess for aught he cares. All he asks or expects is that they do the work for which he engages them and do not help themselves to the contents of his cash drawer. Nor need one look so high in the scale to note the same course. Let a tired and shabby woman enter a crowded street car and she may hang to a strap for twenty blocks without attracting a glance from any one, but let some gaily bedizened butterfly appear and in a moment every man is on his feet and half the women will crowd their neighbors in an effort to make room for her. Let a humbly-clad shopper attempt to make purchases when there are others better dressed within reach, and she will be gently, perhaps, but in any event, firmly given to understand that she must wait. Go in a last season's gown to purchase a new one, and you may expect to spend the afternoon making studies of womankind, for unless you are of an aggressive and combative disposition you may enjoy the pleasure of seeing half a dozen attendants assiduously dancing about the fashionables "while you wait." It is only the wealthy who can afford not to devote their thoughts to "looking prosperous," and it is time thrown away for editors, preachers, teachers, and others who profess to lead thought to preach any other doctrine, for in practice every one of them has a sharp eye for effects. The man who thinks he will excite compassion by the sight of his toe appearing through the cracks of his well-blackened shoe or the conspicuous darn in his threadbare coat-sleeve, is much more apt to be sent about his business for those very reasons than he is to be invited to go to work, much as his help may be needed. Employees are not necessarily dishonest because they are properly clothed any more than they are models of propriety because they are down at heel and generally forlorn. Poverty is no more a virtue in itself than decent competence, not to say wealth, is vice. Many a one has had opportunity thrust upon him because no one suspected that he needed help; many another has been passed over for the contrary reason, because people whose star is in the ascendant have constitutional objections to being connected even indirectly with those whose fortunes are conspicuously on the down-grade.

As To Farming

The latest educational fad is an agricultural college for women exclusively. Since men have "deserted the land" it behooves the women to spring to the breach and take up the neglected profession of farming, which opens such a wide field for industry and pecuniary reward, all of which is beautiful theory. It reads well in editorials in the city newspapers and in papers read before women's clubs and congresses. For some unexplained reason, the idea has become firmly fixed that the farming population, bodily and in numbers, deserts its well-tilled acres and comfortable homes to resort to city slums, and that country roads daily present the spectacle of "refugees" with their household goods packed promiscuously into farm carts, or loaded in bundles carried on heads and shoulders, "trekking" towards the nearest settlement, with no other aim or object than to get away from the farm. The companion of this picture shows tracts of fine farming land left to revert to a wilderness, white-painted farm-houses with green shutters and wide, comfortable porches, and barns, granaries and poultry-houses falling into decay through the desertion of their lawful owners. If the factory hands, the sweat-shop workers, the underpaid stenographers and typewriters and all the host of overworked women in the cities would but take their courage into their hands and set out to conquer fortune they would be able to pick and choose for themselves, on the principle of "first come first served." The cattle would come lowing home from the pastures to stand patiently while the amateur dairy maids milked them and the newly-transformed henwives would be able to gather eggs as they would wild blackberries. It is nothing but natural depravity which stands in the way of the one class remaining on their farms and the others not taking advantage of their opportunities. As a matter of fact no farmer ever removes to the city unless he has made a failure of his farm or has become sufficiently wealthy to quit hard work. No farm which will yield a comfortable living is ever abandoned under any circumstances, and very few young men who see a prospect of a reasonable return for their labor will throw down the hoe and drop the plow-handles for an indefinite "city job." Farmers are proverbially the most discontented class on earth. Not one in a hundred ever finds the weather to suit him or the crops as good as he hoped for. Not one in a thousand but has a heavy mortgage to keep the roof from blowing off, and the mortgage sits down to every meal with the family and occupies the easy chair at the family fireside. It takes practical skill to make a success of any occupation, and it will need many things besides a course of lectures and a railroad ticket into "the country" to transform city women into successful agriculturalists. Capital is one and land is another, after which may be considered physical strength to perform laborious work for sixteen hours out of every twenty-four and a remunerative market for the products, and a few other vital details.

Abbott on God

BY THEODORE BONNET.

The religion mender and improver is becoming very much of a bore and something of a nuisance. Every little while he bobs up with what he believes to be a new idea, one with which he expects to startle the religious world, and the newspapers gladly accord him space in proportion to his rating among doctrinaires and academicians. If he is regarded as an intellectual heavyweight they comment on his utterances editorially, and seek to make them the basis of a controversy by securing interviews with men who are presumed to know what they are talking about. Usually the reputed new idea is thought to be in accord with the spirit of so-called liberal Christianity, and is therefore classified under the head of Higher Criticism, most of the exponents of which are poseurs who pride themselves on being iconoclasts, and who are doing no good either to the cause of religion or to the moral or ethical welfare of the commonwealth. Conspicuous among them is Dr. Lyman Abbott, who delivered an address to the students of Harvard University last week, telling them that he no longer believed in a great First Cause, and adding, "Tomorrow I will be branded as a heretic." Who should doubt that with Mr. Abbott, the wish was father to the thought? For why should he have invited the branding? If he were not suffering from a decided atrophy of his sense of humor he would never think it worth while to take the world into his confidence on the subject of his religious belief. There is nothing hieratic in his dictum on religion. His views are not of great importance unless they are postulated from absolute knowledge, and we have yet to hear of his being favored with divine revelation. Without such revelation he can do nothing more than guess, and there is no reason why the world should sit up and take notice when Lyman Abbott is in the throes of conjecture. If he doesn't believe in a first cause, then, he believes that what has existed from all eternity is mere matter and that the eternal energy, which, he says, is proved by science, literature and history, resulted from a fortuitous concourse of atoms. The ratiocination by which Mr. Abbott reached his conclusions was not revealed in the despatches, but I should imagine that it is not less amusing than the conceit which prompted him to seek notoriety as a heretic by advancing a theory which has not even the merit of originality, though it was unquestionably sprung to enhance the reputation of Henry Ward Beecher's successor as a thinker. So many brainier men than Lyman Abbott have coldly consulted their reason and feelings as the source and rule of religious belief, that at this late day it is pretty hard to suggest anything that was not dreamt of in their philosophy. Confronted with the difficulties arising from the supposition that the world was formed by the motion of matter, Spinoza maintained that there is only one substance in the world and that that substance is God, combining matter and spirit and the attributes of thought and extension. Is that not precisely what Lyman Abbott affirms when he says he believes in no absentee God, but one "who is in and through and of everything"? Let us see to what this brilliant philosophy reduces itself. Pursuing it to its logical conclusion, a fool, your hand, a stone, all the physical and moral accidents of life, are intimately connected with the Deity. But is it not sufficient to know that Abbott has been borrowing ideas from Spinoza, the purpose of whose Euclidian system was to establish a demonstrable nexus between God and human conduct, and who deified in one eternal substance all the crimes and infirmities of the world? It is pretty generally known nowadays that Spinoza, brilliant metaphysician though he was, often reasoned in a circle when he thought he was offering an infallible demonstration. It was probably the circular logic of Spinoza that convinced Mr. Abbott, who appears to have joined that fashionable throng which considers it smart to sneer, disbelieve and deny, who would convert the world into a domain ruled by sheer natural law or fate, and who never look at religion from an exalted standpoint. They revel in the applause of the intellectual proletariat, the half-educated, who regard Ingersoll's puerile vaporings and tuneful rehash of the dicta of ancient and wiser scoffers as the ne plus ultra of scientific philosophy. Mr. Abbott should get in front of Satan and reflect on what Francis Bacon said about the atheistic consequences of a little learning. He should scan the signs of the times, and he would notice that skepticism is losing ground, that we are approaching a spiritual renaissance, and are being bored by the maunderings of the Higher Critics and the promises of scientists. It is not to his credit that he is contributing to the unrest of the Christian world under the misapprehension that he is leading people toward the light. Christ did more for the world than he may ever hope to do, and he did not mix science with religion for the promotion of agnosticism. Even though he does not believe that Christ was divine he will not say that He was a charlatan, or that He was talking nonsense when He preached the importance of Faith. Mr. Abbott would no doubt be ashamed to confess faith in the mysteries of religion, never stopping to reflect that many of the so-called truths of science depend on faith. The only science that we deal with is the science of phenomenal knowledge, for our knowledge is only of phenomena. Two centuries ago the non-existence of innate ideas was denied and proved by John Locke. If in the ultimate analysis all our knowledge comes through our senses it is vain of us to set forth our convictions dogmatically, for we know that our senses are most untrustworthy; to set forth our mere guesses is both idle and stupid. When Newton said that every body in the universe attracted every other body he did not know, never having tested every body in the universe, but he at least reasoned from analogy, and now there are scientists who say that at the confines of the universe the law of gravitation does not hold good. Our belief in its universal application rests on faith. It was once thought that Darwin had completely disproved the existence of God, but the latest theories of evolution tend to strengthen rather than destroy the belief in a Supreme Being. Science leaping acrobatically to conclusions is ridiculous in the domain of theology, but it has at least shown that the Book of Nature corroborates that of Revelation. Earth's contributions of circumstantial evidence of a God are infinite, and we have yet to find one scintilla of positive, direct evidence of the non-existence of a Supreme Being. Abbott says that man is not a creation; Lord Kelvin, a scientist of recognized ability, says that science positively asserts Creative Power. Lyman Abbott's philosophy excludes the presumption of a First Cause; Herbert Spencer said that he could not but shrink from the assumption that the universe was without cause or purpose. Lyman Abbott says that the Bible can no longer be accepted as ultimate; the Catholic Church has always so maintained, and it has wisely denied the right of indiscriminate interpretation of the Scriptures, anticipating the reckless and harmful construction of men of the Abbott type. Dr. Lyman Abbott has become a pantheist, for he has proclaimed the belief that there is no God but the combined forces and laws of the universe, which, by the way, is quite different from the doctrine of omnipresence with which it was confounded by Rabbi Nieto in a Bulletin interview the other night. Pantheism is as infidel as was Ingersoll himself. But Abbott will not be branded as a heretic. There is no such thing as heresy among the jarring Christian sects today. A Presbyterian clergyman recently renounced the Westminster Confession but he was not branded as a heretic. Orthodox ministers have reduced the miracle of the Incarnation to a mere symbol, and they go right along drawing their salaries under false pretenses. Despite, however, the iconoclasm of clergymen, the belief in God is growing stronger every day, and there are signs that portend a reaction and a spiritual renaissance.

Open Letters to Men of Mark. No. 6.

ADDRESSED TO THOMAS W. LAWSON OF BOSTON, CAPTAIN OF FRENZIED FINANCE, CONGRATULATING HIM ON CALLING THE BLUFF OF THE "SYSTEM" AND OTHERWISE FORCING THE HAND OF THE WALL STREET SHORT-CARD SHARPS

BY DEMOCRITUS.

My Dear Lawson:—

Let's shake, pard. You done it beautiful an' no mistake. Maybe there ain't no notches on your gun but there's a heap o' nerve in your trigger finger. I'll bet your assay'll go a thousand to the ton an' no slag in your waste dump. I'll match you for a dead game sport against the best bucks that traverse the screaming West from the Brazos to Circle City an' from Tonapah to Anaconda. You've hit 'em hard an' they're squealing to make the rafters rattle.

I'm surprised to hear that my old friend Colonel Bill Greene is one of the squealers. I knew Bill down in Tombstone when he didn't have a picayune to his name—his poverty barred him out of the quarter-check games, an' the wolf was a howlin' dismal at his cabin door. He wasn't a squealer then, an' he didn't quit. I knew him when his brand was on the flank of a thousand steers an' fortune was a-smilin' on him like a night-bloomin' cactus. It was all the same. He played the game win or lose from soda to hock. Now I read in the papers that he's squealing because he says you made him lose the turn for four million. That's hilarious. The boys who knew Bill Greene on the San Pete are laughin' fit to kill. They recollect the time when Bill wasn't exactly a Colonel an' when he'd given a mortgage on all he hoped was comin' to him for a chance to lose four million. But I reckon that's the way with some men—the more they own the less they want to lose any of it. That don't take the edge off of Bill's squeal though.

Nothing out here in the boundless squeals—not even the hogs. It's contrary to good form. The man who squeals is looked down on in polite circles after you pass the Rio Grande, an' the farther you go towards the setting sun the less sympathy they have for the man who whines when he's hurt. I reckon it's different in the artificial East, an' maybe it's catchin'. I should judge from the squealing in Wall street since you bucked up against the game that it's epidemic. Those fellows have been dealing a brace so long that they seem to have roped the idea that they own everything on the layout. You come along an' bust the ban! 'n spite of splits an' hold outs. It happens that you know the system an' don't bet on the card that's marked to lose—you know when to copper. Then the galoot behind the box wants to know who's a dealin' this game—you or him; an' when you says soft like an' gentle, so to speak, that he's a dealin' but you're a regulating the game as it were, he gets mad an' talks about seein' you in your office to tell you what particular kind of a liar an' faker you are. We don't tolerate brace games out here—much. The dealer who isn't satisfied with the legitimate profits of the game gets turned down sooner or later. But he doesn't squeal—he doesn't dare to in the first place, an' in the second place he wouldn't anyhow. He's got too much self respect.

Out on this reservation every game's honest until it's proved a skin. Then the game closes. In your country I judge it's the other way about as I heard a tenderfoot say the other day. Here you know to the fraction of a chance what you're goin' up against. The odds are all figured out for you before hand an' you know that the bank's bound to win in the long run. It's up to you to gauge how long you can play even against the percentage of the house. In Wall street, I take it, it's all brace an' the suckers know it, but they bet their dinero on the chance that the dealer is too busy robbing the other fellow to take any notice of them. These check guerillas probably know that they are against a skin game but they think it's the other sucker who's goin' to get skinned—the easiest mark in the marts of trade an' commerce is the jay who buys the goldbrick because he thinks the fool who offers it for sale doesn't know its value, or because he has been convinced that it was stolen an' the thief is afraid to be caught with the goods.

I like your style, pard. I don't care what they say about you. I don't care even if what they say is true. I admire your nerve. There's sand enough in your craw to outfit a flock o' Mexican gamecocks. You've reversed the play—they thought you were bluffin, on a two-spot an' you show down a full hand. They pass the buck an' call for a new deal. You play your cards wide open an' they squint theirs for the marks on the back. I don't say that you can't read the spots as clear as they do; an' I'm pretty sure you can outhold them when it comes to a showdown—your sleeve's as full as theirs. Then they squeal. They don't like to take their own medicine. If those Wall street sharps could know how ridiculous they look to the rest of us they'd crawl out into the brush somewhere an' herd up with the sidewinders an' horned toads—I wouldn't advise 'em to run and herd with the coyotes because a coyote is a grinning beast, an' it's grins that these Smart Alecks of Wall street are trying to avoid.

I see that they're talkin' about corraling you in one of their calabooses. They say you've been circulating false reports about their stocks. Of course that bluff don't worry you. We all know that the game of stocks is a gamble in false reports. There wouldn't be any profit to the house if there was any truth in the reports. It is because you've told the truth that the dealers are squealing. It's the truth that hurts. The stock market is a big sponge. You've squeezed the water out of it—that's all.

We've lost some of our esteem for Colonel Bill Greene since you called his gun play. We thought he'd see your ante an' come a shooting. But he didn't. He talked about something he called an "incident" an' said it was "closed." I suppose he meant he'd drawn to a bob-tail flush an' caught a ramps. As you've explained the circumstance he wasn't in it as far as you were concerned. He just happened along when the shooting was on an' he got some of it good an' plenty. He says he's in the hole for about four million. I'd like to be in for that amount. You wouldn't hear a whimper from me. If Colonel Bill was a-runnin' a square game he wouldn't a been hurt in the fracas. He says he puts up his copper mine to pay dividends to the stockholders. Then what's that mine a-doin' on the bucketshop list of Wall street? It looks to me as if Colonel Bill's mine was full of water. I hope it'll prove a lesson for him, an' that hereafter he'll stick to the dividend end of his game instead of trying to capitalize a good thing for more than it's worth. I'm afraid it's a game he don't understand an' I'm of the opinion that Henry Rogers or some of those "system" sharps is a givin' him the tip. I wonder if any of Colonel Bill's dividends from the bucketshop sales of his stock ever gets to the pockets of the shareholders?

The Colonel was sure wise to make it up with you. He's only a small fish in the stream an' the sharks could gobble him easy. If he can keep your hands off his little copper game he can keep on drawing down the ducats from the tom-fools that squander their money in the Wall street gambling joints. But I reckon Colonel Bill will run his mine dryer after this.

So there's my hand on it, pard. If you ever go broke an' want a good fat job, come out to this country an' we'll elect you Sheriff of any county in the wide West. You're our calibre—which the same is forty-four or thereabouts. Anyway you've got the everlasting friendship of yours truly.

The Paralysis of the Ideal

BY HARRY COWELL.

Though at rare times of happy meeting of man and moment, geniuses, the gods aiding their own, build better than they know, the result surprising them into exclaiming with unwonted modesty, "Not unto us the praise!"; none the less is it true that every actual work of art pales before the ideal; that the songs the silence sings to the heart of the composer lose I know not what of sweet in their passage to paper, being as it were vulgarized by sound, for which it almost seems they were never intended. Women of more haunting beauty than the finest canvases of a da Vinci are every day born of inferior imaginations, bred of lesser brains—dream women who will have none of the coarse world of creation, who flee the mere thought of impious brush or pen or chisel. Even among the master craftsmen of the fascinating trade to which I have apprenticed myself, it falls out more than once that what in the womb is a wonder word of godlike aspect proves when born to be nothing but a common red brat after all. The greatness of the tale is lost in the telling.

"The way to perfection," says one who has traveled it, "is through a series of disgusts." The arch-enchanters of the world well know the disenchantment of work done, having risen every one of them on sad stepping stones of dead selves to things that finally are high as heaven—mortals smitten with a hopeless love of a perfection impossible to mortality.

of science and of art, a paralysis of the real, the actualized, terrible enough to render impotent all but the most virile, commonly falls upon those born to believe that nothing is worth doing save what is perfectly done. Why say what has been better said, not once nor twice merely, but many times? Is not fine appreciation nobler, rarer, in every way more admirable, than inferior creation? It is not so much a man's originality as his belief in his originality, that is in inverse ratio to his reading. To hear the word spoken of master mouths is to cry in despair: I shall keep silence forevermore!

Of the many ambitions that drive men to great doing, not the least worthy is the desire to add, be it ever so little, to the permanent beauty of the world. The craving for fame is one thing; the insatiable mother longing of the artist to bring forth beauty is another and very different. Bitter indeed is the barren womb, but more bitter still to give birth to deformities; and not even the biased eyes of those who bore them can fail to see that beside the god-like sons and daughters of genius, our own darlings are as dwarfs and hunchbacks. One may miss fame and be happy, but for philoprogenitiveness to fall short of complete motherhood is sadness itself. With some not over vain natures — natures to all seeming pre-ordained for exquisite doing — the effect of culture, as I have said, of dwelling friendwise with the giant broods of genius, is a strange impotence. A feeling, the reverse of emulation, follows the realization of so much work so well done.

It is not, however, the wonder work done of man — or of God, for that matter — that brings about the most desperate folding of futile hands. God seldom makes a woman so fair as to cause among artists envy of his artistry; seldom does the most prideful artist so improve upon the Creator's masterpieces as to render forever impotent the once eager hands of his fellow craftsmen. It is because of the Ideal that many a would-be doer despairs. Fain would he do what never was, nor ever shall be, done — make pure dream objective. The Ideal made real by miracle would be no longer the Ideal. On paper, my story is not my story, but a miserable plagiarism; my picture, on canvas, merely a copy by an inferior hand.

To refrain from doing, to pass for an idle fellow, for the sake of the Ideal, is quaintly noble. To do nothing at all because I cannot do the impossible thing I would; to be, so to speak, a deedless Don Quixote — in that, as it seems to me, is tragedy sufficient to make it forever sacred and safe from ridicule. Despite of much loving of Love, of longing and loneliness hard to bear, to remain maid or bachelor to the bitter end, for no other reason than this: that one must marry either a man or a woman — never a dream — is matter not for laughter but for tears.

Most of us, however, being very human (the gods be praised therefor), make our concessions with little or no apology, and marry the actualities at hand, or write our stories, or paint our pictures, or compose our songs, or sing them, or do our day's work whatever it may be; so that the old world, real and rough, goes its wonted round, and our places that so soon forget us know others of our kind.

And it is well so. Who would have it otherwise? Mixed with error must the truth be by which man is to live; the lie unaccountably serving as useful alloy. The noblest negation that ever sat with folded hands and watched with fine scorn the doing of imperfect things, is not half so noble as he who does his best today and on the morrow is up again and doing better, having gathered overnight in the world of dreams fresh store of strength and skill and enthusiasm — what though daily the critical morning lights show flaws in the finished work, making him for the moment sick at heart and powerless of hand. He who could be happy with a dream wife, his patronym is Smith, but of no common name is he who takes to his heart flesh and blood and frailty as he finds them, choosing as best he may, and yet by gracious gardening keeps alive in his home even to the point of full-flowing the delicate exotic, happiness; and that for indefinite days and nights and seasons.

Thus, though to the soul it seems otherwise, there is ample room to doubt whether the perfection sought, if haply found, would please beings blessed or cursed, as the case may be, with five imperfect senses. To mortal eyes perfect beauty could indubitably be made more adorable by a patch. And if today I avow, as I did yesterday, that only the unattainable is worth striving for, it is because in the strife are much sweet and gain immeasurable.

To the Old Year

BY MABEL PORTER PITTS.

How privileged are you, Old Year,
Behold, when life is through,
You change the reading of your name
And issue forth anew.

The follies left within the past,
Mistakes that you deplore,
Are dead within their hidden graves,
Are visited no more.

You snatch the rose from pleasure's bush
Forgetting where it grew;
You keep no cup when it is drained—
Ah, how I envy you.

New life comes swift on pealing chimes
With smiles of kindly fate,
Lo, through the holly's mystic fire
You are regenerate.

I would that I might leave, like you,
This body, weak with age,
And as a child begin again
Upon an unsoiled page.

While the Angels Sang

The season of peace on earth and good will to men, annually recurrent, is closing with this year of grace 1904, and we are preparing to resume business at the old stand. We have gorged and guzzled "in honor of the occasion," and those of us who have the means have given of our hoard to "the deserving poor." We have performed our annual duty and our consciences are at ease for another year. During the past week those of us whose habit it is to covet our neighbor's possessions have managed to mask ourselves in a pretense of good-will that almost deceived the cynic observer into the belief that we had repented and virtuously resolved to sin no more; the stock market has been stale, flat and unprofitable; the vendors of gold bricks have occupied themselves in the disbursement of a portion of their ill-gotten gains; the grafter has ceased from grafting; the tongue of the envious has been stilled; and the hearts of men have been softened to the tenderness of the love that passeth understanding. The only battle, murder and sudden death during the past week was unavoidable owing to the obstinate and truculent disposition of Pagan Japan in opposition to the righteous effort of Christian Russia to civilize the heathen of Asia in the manner of all Christian nations that maintain vast armies and powerful navies. If it had not been for the infidel Jap peace on earth would have been universal and good-will to men unanimous. None of the Christian nations were at war with each other during the Christmas holidays. Whatever wars they may have in mind were decently postponed until after they had done prating of peace on earth and good-will to men. Even the California legislature does not convene until next week.

Some Age-Worn Heresies

Now for apostolic blows and knocks. Hark to the drum ecclesiastic! Heresy rears its horrid head on every side and preachers of little faith are endeavoring, with carnal logic, to reconcile the half-truths of science with the irreconcilable speculations of religion. Lyman J. Abbott was the first to reopen the controversy concerning the immanence of God; then came Professor Howison of the University of California with a nebulous theory that the soul might be immortal if the body were indestructible; and now we are informed that the Rev. Minot J. Savage has declared that "every birth is a divine birth; every mother is a madonna." The only fault I find with these utterances is that they are not new. There are bricks in the Babylonian tumuli inscribed with cursive characters expounding the Abbottonian theory that energy is the beginning and the end of the universe and all that therein exists; these same bricks testify to the fact that in the dark backward and abysm of time some philosopher preached the doctrine that every phase of life is but a manifestation of the universal energy; long before the savage ancestors of the Rev. Minot J. Savage had learned that denial of the immanence and omnipotence of the Sun-god was a heresy to be punished with death, there were Aryan doctors who insisted that "every birth is a divine birth; every mother a madonna"; and it is recorded in unmistakable cuneiform on the tablets of Menes that there were Egyptian Howisons antedating the Shepherd Kings who were cocksure that the soul was immortal. The trouble with all these learned doctors lies in their lack of humility. They are inflated with egotism. They think they think. In truth, they merely prate. The world has forgotten the philosopher who first announced the "heresies" so elaborately set forth by the Abbots, the Savages and the Howisons of today. A million years hence the world will forget the Abbots, the Savages and the Howisons. I have measured the fame of these ephemera by the scale of their egotism; and yet a million years is imperceptible duration in the age of the universe; and the universe itself is only a bubble flung from the spume of eternity. Moreover, these people take themselves seriously. Assuming that they are immortal gods, they have returned to the laughterless condition of the natural world; as a poet who knew his business has sonnetized, "they roar their solemn thunder out to the sleeping woods"; they have ceased from among men whose one sense differentiating them from the beasts of the field is that of humor, and its consequence—the ability to laugh at our follies:

A good bracer is what you need after your holiday shopping. Always have a little GOOD whisky in your home. GOOD whisky means pure whisky. A. P. Hotaling & Co.'s famous OLD KIRK, best on the market.

"Nature has symbols for her nobler joys,

Her nobler sorrows. Who had dared foretell

That only man by some sad mockery

Should learn to laugh who learns that he must die?"

An Attorney's Tongue

Who is this Hiram Johnson, anyway? And by what right does he malign society's pet, Mr. Addison C. Mizner? If, as reported in the newspapers, Mr. Johnson compared Mr. Mizner with "Raffles" he compared him with a thief, and Mr. Mizner should be vested with cause of action, civil or criminal, but he isn't. The law protects the lawyer; it presumes that there is no malice in the assaults of an attorney who is merely trying to win his case. The liberty of the lawyer is much greater than that of the press. If Mr. Mizner is, as Mr. Johnson avers, a "social bum," a "buffoon" who lives on society by his wits and clowns for his dinner, what had that circumstance to do with the sanity or the insanity of Miss Dolbeer? Mr. Johnson could say the same of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, or Theodore Hook, or any of the wits of the old Mermaid Taverns, and he could say it with equal propriety as far as the question at issue before the court is concerned. Without attempting to defend Mr. Mizner against the vituperation of Mr. Johnson I will say that in my opinion Mr. Johnson needs a bridle on his tongue and a curb on his judgment.

Evidence of a Weak Case

Mr. Johnson, I am told, is a brilliant attorney who had a very lucrative practice in Sacramento before coming to this city. His knowledge of law and his natural talents are sufficient to enable him to win cases without abusing the other side. Therefore it is surprising that he should stick to the old custom even when he is so unfortunate as to have a weak case. The legal profession is rising to an intellectual plane on which men of ability accomplish what they purpose by superior tact and the finesse that can only be acquired by proper training. It is no longer deemed an evidence of forceful talent at the bar to hurl epithets at witnesses, and in many of our courts this sort of thing is not permitted.

Passing of The Epithet

After all, the public doesn't much care what an attorney may say in abuse of a witness. Even the victim is more often amused than otherwise. Vituperation of this sort is obsolete even in the columns of the newspapers. The Hang Dog Clarion no longer addresses the Dead Horse Palladium as our loathsome contemporary. Thus the gayety of nations suffers but common decency scores appreciably.

Cheap Rates for Doubtful States

The purchase of legislatures with money of corporate interests is so common that it has ceased to excite more than passing comment in some of the opposition newspapers. It is a time-worn American jest to compare a term in a State legislature with a term in the State prison. Legislators are bought in bunches like radishes or asparagus. The individual legislator is probably the cheapest human chattel on the market. He is cheap because he is a fool, not knowing his intrinsic worth to the purchaser; and because the supply usually exceeds the demand. All of which, as I have said, is so commonplace that people laugh at it and deride the occasional honest representative who refuses to be corrupted. Now comes Thomas Lawson who tells us that sovereign States can be bought "in bunches" like legislatures, and offers the instance of five doubtful States that were purchased by Mark Hanna for McKinley in 1896 for five million dollars, furnished by H. H. Rogers on behalf of the financial and corporate interests of Wall street. This is specific proof by one of the men on the inside confirmatory of a suspicion that has long existed among the people. It is the first time, however, that we have been explicitly informed that States can be bought "in bunches" like legislatures. But what do you think of the price? Only five million dollars for five States — a million dollars per! Shades of Washington, father of his country! and Jefferson the incorruptible! This comes of letting in the scum of Europe and the cheap citizens of other lands; for it is beyond belief that any genuine American patriot would sell his birthright for an aliquot of a million dollars after it had passed through the clutch of the distributing bosses. Perish that thought! The price is too small.

A Hint To The Chattels

The voters should organize themselves into unions and refuse to sell their votes for less than a specified union scale. These corporations and financiers can afford to pay at least ten million dollars per State for they are constantly enriching themselves at the expense of the very people whom they purchase. How much per voter do you suppose is necessary under the existing tariff to "carry" California for the money power? But the poor sheep who are thus bought and sold in the political shambles don't get the worth of their votes. The bulk of the purchase price sticks to the palms of the middlemen — the agents of the cattle-buyers. Certainly there is crying necessity for immediate organization of the corruptible vote of the country. Then these miserable wretches can "get all that is coming to them." They will no longer complain that the "boss" gets the hog's share. They will deal directly, through their officers, with Mr. Rogers, Mr. Pierpont Morgan and Mr. John D. Rockefeller.

Votes on The Hoof

The man who would sell his vote would sell his mother. It is possible that some of these mercenaries would demand more for their votes than they would accept, without long haggling, for their mothers. I have known votes in the legislature to be bartered for a hundred dollars each. When a United States Senator is to be elected the price rises, but if the legislator is convinced that any one of the candidates is sure of election he will "get aboard" at almost any price commensurate with his dignity as a representative of the people. I am happy to be able to announce that there will be nothing of this bargain and sale in the coming legislature of California. I am informed on the best authority (the authority of the legislators themselves) that Colonel Mazuma will not pollute the lobby at Sacramento this session. This is not saying, mind you, that all of the members of the current California legislature are priceless — it is merely an intimation that none of the Senatorial candidates have the price, or would be willing to pay it if named. The times are too prosperous and all commodities, including the mavericks rodeoed in the legislative herd, are being marked up.

There was a time when you could buy legislators on the hoof for the price of a winter overcoat; but that time is past, temporarily, and nothing less than a Federal office with an assured income of at least a hundred dollars a month will satisfy the ambitions of those who are to elect a Senator at this session. I am also informed that the price of mothers has advanced several points and that wives are firm with an upward tendency. I am proud to call myself an American citizen — oh, how proud I am!

Merely a Family Row

Sharper than a serpent's tooth is the ingratitude of an unappreciative client. Witness that of Mrs. de la Montanya, for whom the Dorn brothers, attorneys have been doing business. For several years those sympathetic attorneys have taken the deepest kind of interest in her financial and domestic affairs. The relationship between them has been much closer than that which ordinarily exists between attorney and client. It has been that of the most cordial friendship. The attorneys not only managed their client's business but one of them took her daughter off her hands, establishing himself as one of the family, more firmly uniting the bonds between them and making the confidence of the rich widow doubly sure. And now we learn through the public prints that Mrs. de la Montanya has had the presumption to undertake the management of her own business, ignoring the valuable services of the Dorns, and substituting those of her son and heir. Fortunately for the Dorns they had taken the precaution to incorporate the business and to become directors of the company, thus firmly intrenching themselves and fixing securely their commercial status.

The Upper Hand

In all their dealings they have shown that wisdom and foresight that are essential factors in business life. At this particular time the Dorn who married into the family finds that his marriage stands him in good stead, for following the scriptural injunction he cleaves to his wife and she clings to him. The Dorns have decidedly the better of the complicated situation. They are in control of the business and have thrown out the son, who makes complaint that one of the Dorns was responsible for his estrangement for many years from his mother. Of course the young man does not appreciate all that the Dorns have done for the family, and he is inclined to make trouble. He is prejudiced. Not long ago he sued one of the Dorns to revoke a deed of trust which he was persuaded to execute when he was having trouble with his first wife. The deed protected him from her all right, but he had to appeal to the courts later on to get protection from Dorn. It is doubtful whether he will be able to induce his mother to join him in legal proceedings against the Dorns, for now one of the Dorns is her son-in-law, and she may be reluctant to precipitate a family row in the courts. If she were to do so there would no doubt be interesting developments, and light would be thrown on the methods of the attorneys who have done so much for the Montanya family.

Their Courageous Zeal

Some lawyers are restrained by ethical considerations from entering too closely into financial relations with their clients, sensible as they are of the danger of an improper construction being placed on their motives, but the concern of the Dorns for the welfare of their clients was such that they were not deterred from exploiting their zeal to the limit. The law looks with suspicion on such relations between attorney and client as have existed between the Dorns and the Montanyas, for it is the theory of the law that imposition is to be easily practiced by an attorney when he undertakes the general management of a client's business, but the Dorns have no doubt considered themselves above suspicion. Even at the time of the scandalous collapse of the Pacific Bank, D. S. Dorn, who was in at the finish, as the friend, admirer and counsel of the McDonalds, was free from fluster, conscious unquestionably that the wreck was inevitable despite his benevolent activity. Now that the Dorns are part and parcel of the Montanya family their acts are not to be reviewed from the standpoint of the arbitre of professional ethics. The dissensions that have arisen are in the nature of a family quarrel, and will no doubt be amicably adjusted if the Dorns are given sufficient opportunity to persuade the widow that it is to her interest to let them run the business.

Reminiscences of Latham

For several months the London and San Francisco Bank has been threatening to merge itself into some other financial institution, the reason being that it has betrayed symptoms of inanition. At first it was reported that its business would be transferred to the Nevada Bank, but later on I learned that it was to be absorbed by the Bank of California. The London and San Francisco Bank has an interesting history. It was founded in the sixties by Milton S. Latham, that distinguished statesman, financier and art connoisseur who was a conspicuous figure in Californian society in early days. Latham was more of a politician than a financier. He was elected Governor of the State in 1858 and immediately after his inauguration the Legislature elected him to the United States Senate. At the end of his term he went to England, and made connections that enabled him to found the bank, which, immediately after it was incorporated, absorbed the banking business of John Parrott, progenitor of the numerous Parrott clan of today not to speak of the collateral Parrott branches, for Parrott pere be it remembered was a remarkably virile individual who had a Mexican past before he ever set foot on California soil.

His Disastrous Railroad Enterprise

Latham engaged in many unfortunate financial ventures, but probably the most disastrous of them was the one out of which grew the narrow gauge railroad to Duncans Mills. Through that project he and his associates were badly crippled, and he never recovered his losses. In the heyday of his career Latham was the Chesterfield of San Francisco society, and the Latham family was in the first rank of the old Southern set that dominated social affairs. The Latham residence in Menlo Park was one of the "Sights" in this part of the world, and the Latham home south of Market street was noted for its rare paintings and many art treasures. When the ex-Governor lost his money he went to New York, and from there he sent for his paintings, which he expected to sell in the metropolis, and upon which he hoped to realize about one hundred thousand dollars. Unfortunately he had neglected to renew the insurance on them for they were destroyed by fire before he could put them on the market. Shortly afterward Latham died and his widow returned to this city. She believed that she had scarcely a cent in the world, but Joe Eastland took charge of Latham's accounts and succeeded in realizing upon them nearly one hundred thousand dollars which he turned over to the widow.

A Paying-Teller's Downfall

The London and San Francisco Bank has always been a very conservative institution, and has seldom been hit hard in any of the financial crashes that have occurred in this State. It suffered a big loss in the recent Eppinger wheat failure, but up to that time it managed to steer clear of the shoals and rocks that test the vigilance of navigators on the financial seas. It was not always fortunate, however, in its supervision of the money in its vaults. About twenty years ago the community was startled by the report that Lawrence Hall, paying-teller of the London and San Francisco Bank, was short in his accounts. He was a man who had long enjoyed a good reputation for honesty and sobriety, but the directors of the bank discovered one day that he had got away with about one hundred thousand dollars. They also learned to their amazement that the manager of the bank had long been aware of Hall's speculations. The manager lost his job and Hall was sent to jail. His case excited a great deal of interest, and was made the theme of a novel entitled, "Was He Guilty?"

Confession and Apology

Doubtless it has been forgotten that I recently announced my ignorance of the circumstance that Bertha Runkle (now Mrs. Basch), author of "The Helmet of Navarre," was once a poet and that a sample of her poetry could be found in the "Library of the World's Best Literature, Ancient and Modern." If I remember aright I also made some flippant remark implying that I had never heard of the "Library of the World's Best Literature, Ancient and Modern." I have ascertained within the past few days that to argue Bertha Runkle not a poet is to argue myself not a competent critic, and that my ignorance of the existence of a "Library of the World's Best Literature, Ancient and Modern," is most deplorable in one who conceits himself a censor of all things literary. Bertha Runkle is indeed a poet and one of her poems was published in the "Library of the World's Best Literature, Ancient and Modern." The title is "Song of the Sons of Esau." It is published on page 16,758 of the "Library of the World's Best Literature, Ancient and Modern." Miss Runkle's poem, of course, was classified with the "modern" Best Literature. It must have been written, however, previous to 1897, the date of the copyright of the "Library." I find the poem in volume XVIII among the "Songs, Hymns and Lyrics" of the collection. If Mr. Millard sees fit to publish the poem he can do so, with an assurance from me that it is probably one of the most remarkable products of what we used to call "the infant prodigy of American letters" that has thus far flowed from her somewhat reticent pen. It is even more remarkable than "The Helmet of Navarre" which as we all remember once achieved to the distinction of "one of the six best sellers"—a phrase that did not then as now contain a noun easily converted into a transitive verb insinuating that the purchasers may be "sold." For myself I hasten to pay this belated tribute to Mrs. Basch's genius as a poet hoping to atone in a measure for my previous doubt of her ability.

A Monumental Work

I am surprised that I had never heard of the "Library of the World's Best Literature, Ancient and Modern." It is one of the big books of the age. There are at least thirty tome-like volumes containing as many thousand pages of the best literature in the world, ancient and modern. The editor was Charles Dudley Warner and he was assisted by Hamilton Wright Mabie, one of the most prolific producers of the best modern literature, George H. Warner, whose pedigree I have not yet traced, and Lucia Gilbert Runkle. I suppose the coincidence of an editorial Runkle and a poet Runkle within the scope of a "Library" of this character is merely fortuitous. To say that if there had not been a Runkle in the editorial chair of the "Li-

Blanche Has a New Ring

Though Blanche Bates says that she has no intention of marrying, she speaks rather dolefully of her profession. She has made such great strides in that profession since leaving her soldier husband to strive for the goal of her ambition, that it is surprising she should appear so discontented. Perhaps if she had not found marriage a failure, and possessed some of the temperament of Yo-San, she would now, having sounded the depths and shallows of a theatrical career, be eager to give ear to the pleadings of a sighing lover. Though the glory of stardom is most refreshing, the theatrical star does not always recline in a bed of roses. Along her pathway through the Middle West she meets an occasional thorn, and her triumphs are not a continuous performance. However Blanche Bates is not discussing her love affairs, if she has any, and Dick Hoteling is not being interviewed on the subject. But the actress and her mother have been guests at Sleepy Hollow since their arrival, a circumstance to which no significance should be attached. The relationship may be that of mere friendship. But as I was the first to give publicity to the rumor of the engagement I feel constrained to keep in touch with developments, and I now have to report that since the "Darling of the Gods" company reached San Francisco Blanche Bates has been wearing a new ring. It was noticed by members of the company, to whom the star vouchsafed no information, despite their curiosity.

The Ovation

At the opening performance, Monday night, Blanche Bates enjoyed what the reporters are pleased to describe as an ovation. There were many fashionable people in the house who were quite generous with their applause. In one loge were the Frederick Otises with a group of guests. Mr. and Mrs. James Flood occupied two boxes with their theatre party, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. William Hinckley Taylor, Mr. and Mrs. Follis and Mr. and Mrs. Augustus Taylor. Both of the Mrs. Taylors wore blue, Mrs. William Taylor wearing a white Charlotte Corday hat with a blue pompon and Mrs. Gus Taylor a blue plumed hat. Mrs. Follis wore a tight-fitting white satin with a black hat trimmed with white plumes, and Mrs. Flood also wore blue and white. In a box above, Harry Holbrook had as guests Mr. and Mrs. Silas Palmer and Miss Lillie Spreckels, the latter in an unusual looking gown of vivid pink white which she brought from Paris and in which she received at Mrs. Miller's tea.

Gadski at the St. Francis

Madame Gadski opened the season for the St. Francis Musical Art Society in the beautiful White and Gold room of the hotel, Wednesday evening, and the attendance was of a highly fashionable character. This organization is representative of the wealth and culture of San Francisco society, and it has made arrangements for a series of high class concerts, to be given by world-famous artists. In this the society was assisted by the Grau of the Far West, Mr. Will Greenbaum, to whom music lovers are indebted for much entertainment of exceptionally high character. Madame Gadski came to this city under his management and she will appear at the Alhambra next week. Her opening performance at the St. Francis was an artistic treat that incited great enthusiasm. After the performance the prima donna held an informal reception.

Mrs. Martin's Speculation

That shrewd financier, Mrs. Eleanor Martin, has butted into the controversy over the site for the public library building to be purchased with some of the money raised by the sale of municipal bonds. For a long time it appeared to be the understanding that block sixty-seven, bounded by Fulton and Grove, Van Ness and Polk, would be purchased, but somebody gave Mrs. Martin a hunch and she immediately purchased all the land available in block seventy-three, bounded by Hayes, Fell, Franklin and Van Ness, and then somebody discovered that it was more suitable for a library site than the other. There appeared to be a sudden change of sentiment in favor of the Martin block with Mr. Phelan, the civic patriot, as its chief sponsor. Mr. Phelan and Mrs. Martin are merely good friends, and I am quite certain that he has no financial interest in the impending deal. However, the controversy that has arisen is corroborative of what I asserted in connection with the project to purchase bonds, at Mr. Phelan's suggestion, for the benefit of real estate speculators. But if Mr. Phelan were inclined to profit by the library site deal, he would have secured an interest in block sixty-seven, which happens to be one of the blocks included in the proposed civic centre established by Architect Burnham. It is from this centre that Burnham proposes to extend a boulevard along Fulton street, widened sixty feet on each side, connecting with the panhandle by a detour through Alamo Square. His plan would be much cheaper than Phelan's proposed panhandle extension. I should be surprised to learn that Burnham, who was engaged at Phelan's suggestion, failed to take his patron into his confidence as to the proposed civic centre, but it certainly looks that way since the millionaire has declared himself in favor of the Martin block.

Has a Rich Father

Nearly every girl who marries into the Army finds herself up against a difficult financial proposition when it comes to keeping house on her husband's salary, for army men do not draw princely wages from Uncle Sam's coffers. Once in awhile the young lieutenant or captain happens to have a rich father. It was that way with Martin Crimmins, who married Margaret Cole, and Captain Young, whom Marie Voorhies is to marry, also has a plutocratic papa. Young pere is a large manufacturer of jewelry, and his son, I understand, will be very wealthy some day. It therefore happens that Marie Voorhies, the eldest of the four sisters, will do better in her marriage, from a pecuniary viewpoint, than did Kate, Anna or Leila. Of course Anna, who is Mrs. "Tom" Bishop, will be rich some day, for her husband also has "expectations." Malcolm Henry, Kate's husband, had lots of social position, but no income to speak of, and Leila married an army lieutenant, Guy Scott.

An Innovation

Miss Voorhies's wedding day is to be unusual. The reception is to take the form of a tea at which a number of people have been asked to receive. The bride and groom will not depart in the usual shower of flying missiles, but will wait until the guests have departed, and then there will be tearful good-byes, for the bride will be leaving home for good and all. People are wondering whether to send gifts or flowers, for whereas the multitude is usually invited to the wedding and the favored few to the reception, this time the procedure is reversed.

Honolulu Is Interested

An occasional correspondent writes me from Honolulu that the smart set of that city was very much interested in the news from San Francisco of the engagement of Mrs. Mott-Smith Bird and Colbert Cunningham, an art tutor. Mrs. Mott-Smith Bird was at one time a conspicuous figure in Honolulu society. The Mott-Smiths are one of the pioneer white families in the islands. Though they were not missionaries they associated with the missionary element. Dr. Mott-Smith, in the days before he hyphenated his name, was Minister to Washington from the Hawaiian kingdom. He died about twelve years ago leaving a large estate which was greatly increased in value by the development of the sugar industry. One of his sons is a lawyer who at the close of the Hawaiian Republic was Minister of Foreign Affairs. His brother has the artistic temperament. He plays the 'cello and has a local reputation as a painter. The daughter of Mrs. Mott-Smith Bird is popular in the Honolulu smart set.

Fushi at the Banquet Board

Prince Fushimi had a glorious time at the Pacific-Union Club Tuesday night when he was toasted, watered and fed on the best that the land affords or his regimen would permit him to enjoy. The host of the occasion was Mr. R. P. Schwerin, representing the commercial interests of the country, and he was ably assisted by Rear-Admiral McArthur, representing the Republic. Fush-eye-mi, or Fu-shee-me, or Fuz-ee-me, or Foo-shim-mee, or Foo-zy-mi, or whatever he calls himself, has had a glorious time since he landed in this country. He has been told a hundred times the extent of the grandeur of his people, and of the ignominy of Russia. He was invited to become a member of several Trusts, and he still lives to return home in time to attend that long-deferred function, the fall of Port Arthur. To those who wonder why he did not stay at home and fight for his country it should be explained that he is the personal representative of the Emperor sent out to enlist the moral support of the world outside of Russia. He is, by the bye, the most democratic Prince Japan ever had. He was educated in France, where he learned a great deal of the principles of Democracy. He has shown a disregard for his high station by his active participation in the hardships of war with the common soldiers at the front, and by his association with the plain people at home. Before the First Division of Tokio, of which he was the commander, started for the front, he entertained a large number of his men of lowest rank at a dinner in his palace, and treated them as his personal friends. This was considered an extraordinary thing for a Prince to do, especially one who is third in succession to the Mikadoalty.

The operations undergone by Ashton Potter were very serious and for a time his life was in danger. However he appears to be recovering rapidly, and has been able to drive to the McNutt home several times.

Mrs. Brown of London

"Mrs. Brown of London," as the newspaper bavardes have persistently designated her ever since she first beamed on the little bohemian coterie in society, has about decided to flit back to England. There have been rumors current to the effect that Mrs. Brown of London is the possessor of a voice which she had cultivated in Italy and polished up a bit by a Withrow sister, and the pleasing promise has been made that before leaving she would vouchsafe society a vocal treat. It is to be hoped that she will condescend. I dearly love to hear society amateurs who have cultivated the vocal art in Europe, especially in London. Mrs. Brown, by the way, is not accompanied by Mr. Brown. Indeed I do not believe that Mr. Brown has ever been in town, or that at present he is in any way connected with Mrs. Brown. Though Mrs. Brown is quite a young woman she has had sufficient matrimonial experience to be very interesting. Her first husband was a Frenchman. She is a woman of very attractive personality, and has made many friends during her sojourn here.

Reagan Spare That Dinner

Police Commissioner Reagan threatens to abolish the French restaurants of San Francisco. Does Police Commissioner Reagan know that his fell design will deprive San Francisco of its best advertisement? Has Police Commissioner Reagan fully weighed the consequences of his purpose? I am not going to throw stones at Police Commissioner Reagan—others, who live in glass houses can do that—I am going to speak to him more in sorrow than in anger. I want to inform Police Commissioner Reagan that the so-called French restaurants of San Francisco furnish the best dinners in the world for the least money. In no other city within the confines of the Seven Seas can such meals be purchased for a dollar as are provided by the chefs of the restaurants that it is the intention of Police Commissioner Reagan to eliminate. And why? Because they are supported by the wages of sin. There is no profit in the dollar dinner—on the contrary there is at least twenty-five per cent loss on each dinner served at that price. It is from the proceeds of the "hotel" patronage of these places that the profits are derived that enables the honest and eminently respectable bourgeoisie to proclaim in the salon of Madame Neufrique: "I have dined at the Poodle Dog!" It is not necessary that Monsieur Prudhomme should say: "My dinner cost me only five francs"; it is his intention to convey the impression that he has dined in the sense that Lucullus dined and when he says he has dined at the Poodle Dog, or at Marchand's, or at the Pup, or at Delmonico's it is to say he has squandered money there and is proud of it. He seeks to establish a reputation, and those who hear him say that he has dined thus accept his pretense at the value he places upon it. Would Police Commissioner Reagan deprive this honest, chaste, moral mediocrity of the opportunity to pose as a deuce of a fellow? Then there is the salaried clerk, the haughty but not always pecunious floor-walker, the bookkeeper who invariably strikes a balance favorable to the profit of his employer, the hired man, in brief, of the marts of trade—why should Police Commissioner Reagan seek to eradicate the crowning joy of that weekly dollar dinner from the otherwise placid lives of these people? Why should he banish Midas from the particular cabinets where he is paying four times the value of everything he orders for the little supper he has so generously provided to please the fastidious palate of his winsome but ever coy stenographer, thereby also vanishing the male contingent of the Midas establishment from the general dining-room down stairs where the dinner of many courses is being served for a price four times less than it would cost in any other metropolis on the face of the earth? Is the strict moral code under which Police Commissioner Reagan proposes to abolish these French restaurants so insistent that it cannot be repealed so far as it prohibits the Marquis of Steyne from paying for Rawdon Crawley's dinner?

Pleading for Time

If Police Commissioner Reagan succeeds in his effort the price of dinners at the French restaurants will advance to four or perhaps five dollars. Only plutocrats will be financially able to dine there. I don't suppose the price of the meal will worry Police Commissioner Reagan, but he should think of the rest of us who would be compelled to resort to the creameries and the dairy kitchens, or on rare occasions to the cafes where a good meal may be had for a price dependent on the card rate. But if Police Commissioner Reagan is determined to pursue the villain to the bitter end, driving him from the seclusion of the French restaurant into the secret places of vice, I will only ask, as a special favor, that he grant respite until he has cleansed the police department of corruption and set his own immediate official household to order. If he will promise to hold his hand from the French restaurants until this is accomplished I think the patrons of the dollar dinner at the French restaurants will continue to come and go, eating, drinking, making merry and dying tomorrow even unto the third and fourth generation of those who are content to live without love or books but who would perish miserably were it not for French cooks.

Mrs. Arthur Crellin, who is just returned from New Zealand, is enthusiastic over the "simple life" in that country. She is delighted with the spirit of the English colony. There is a freedom, says Mrs. Crellin, that is delightful; the people seem to have caught the very spirit of liberty.

To get something which will be useful every day and yet something which is out of the ordinary—something different enough from other possessions to recall holiday pleasures and the donor—that is the great and often unsolved problem. If you can not think of something suitable for friend or relative, a visit to the Russian Art Store, 428 Sutter street, will bring you happy results. For the New Year you can find unique novelties here which are appropriate.

The Greenway Calves

Ned Greenway and his famous calves really constituted the piece de resistance of the Greenway ball last week. Some say that the calves were the motif of the ball, but the statement is not entitled to credence, though it must be admitted that the calves received more than a passing glance and excited no little comment. Mr. Greenway did his favorite impersonation of a Spanish hidalgo which he does very well with the aid of a Baltimore accent. The costume serves as a pretext for the exhibition to society of classic curves draped in tight-fitting hose of amorous red. Mr. Greenway's passionate socks divided the honors with his calves. Although it was generally conceded that his were the shapeliest legs present—of the masculine variety—it was the judgment of many that those of Courtenay Ford were the most chaste. Mr. Ford wore the costume of a Spanish bull-fighter. Very few of the men wore fancy costumes, at the ball, and those that did were unmercifully joshed. Some of the men wore hunting coats, and the army officers perspired freely in heavy uniforms. The women made a brave showing. Dorothy Eells in a costume of the Jane Austin style was the beauty of the ball. Emily and Charlotte Wilson looked strong and healthy in their Folly costumes and Bessie Wilson was captivating as a rococo shepherdess. Maud Bourn had the courage to appear as a Pierette with a face daubed with white. There was a plethora of Follies and Watteau shepherdesses but there was not one sensational costume. Ethyl Hager was expected to furnish the sensation, but she was not in town.

Greenway's High-Priced Splurging

By the bye, Ned Greenway is doing a great deal for society this season. His expense account must have been greatly increased by the plutocrats of the champagne firm he represents, for the entertainments that he has been giving are quite expensive. The most elaborate affair of next week will be the Greenway ball in honor of the Gaiety Club. After next week there will be a lull in social gaiety, for everybody is getting tired. The season began very early this year and has been going at a rapid and furious pace, for little new San Francisco, ever since. Even the people who have always had the society habit admit they are getting weary. It is about two months and a half to Lent and the society leaders are appalled to think they must keep up the pace until then.

Rushing the Kohls

The Kohls were the first to organize a theatre party for "The Liars," the play which is to be produced by society amateurs for the benefit of Mrs. McCalla's Sailors' Home. The Kohls, by the way, appear to be leading the social rout these days. They have a great deal of money, and are not afraid to spend it. Mrs. Fred Kohl is a crack bridge player and she is being made much of by the set that take bridge as they do their daily bread. And the Kohls are being rushed by those society people who reserve their best blandishments for the captivation of the wealthy that invitations might follow fawning. The society amateur performance, by the way, promises to be a great financial success, and strenuous efforts are now being made in furtherance of an artistic production. Rehearsals are being held nearly every night at the home of Mrs. Mark Gerstle.

Rumor of a Romance

Society is wondering whether Dan Cupid has undertaken the conquest of Grace Llewellyn Jones in the interest of Paul Kossackovitch, the Russian Consul. Society is always on the qui vive for a romance with a grand passion for the motif, and when the news leaked out a few weeks ago that Mrs. Goewey had given a dinner at the Palace in honor of Miss Jones, and that the only other guests were her uncle, Captain Jarrett Burnett of the navy, and the distinguished representative of the Czar of all the Russias, the rumor of there being a prospect of another international matrimonial alliance was soon current. The average society gossip doesn't need more than a vague hint for the weaving of a romance. Miss Jones has been very much in the spot light since she returned from Italy, owing to her varied accomplishments which she has exploited most graciously. As there has been some talk of her going on the stage to give rein to an absorbing ambition, I am surprised that she should have been considered a suitable heroine for a romance, but since the rumor was given currency I have heard that while she was in Italy her hand was sought by the last of one of the most distinguished families of Venice, and that his wooing was rapidly reaching a happy climax when death overtook him.

The James Otises were much disappointed that the architects of their new Broadway house could not finish it in time for occupancy this winter. It will be June before it will be finished.

The Jack Wilsons were in Naples at last advices, and intending to automobile northward through Italy.

Another Richmond

Politicians wondered what was doing the other day when the Bulletin came out with a "knock" on all the leading candidates for United States Senator, putting them all in the same class, that of railroad henchmen. The Bulletin expressed its deep concern for President Roosevelt's anti-railroad policy, and pointed out that it would be a shameful reflection on the dignity of this State if, despite the big majority given the President by the people at the polls, a man were elected to the Senate who would deliberately block the legislation which he has proposed. It certainly would. The Bulletin's argument reminds me of a story: One day a politician asked his friend in the Assembly why he had voted against a certain bill. The statesman replied that he considered it a vicious measure, one that was drawn at the instigation of unworthy interests, that was designed to oppress honest people and work great hardship. When he finished his eloquent outbreak his friend said in a confidential whisper, "Now give me the real reason." The Bulletin's real reason is that the paper has a candidate of its own, and I am of the opinion that the gentleman is none other than Mr. Truxtun Beale, who has long had designs on the Senatorship. He will certainly be welcomed by the statesmen at Sacramento, for he has wealth, and the supposition is that when a man with money seeks the toga he does not expect it on purely sentimental grounds.

Probing the Police Scandal

The question at issue between the Bulletin and several of its daily contemporaries, arising out of the Grand Jury's investigation of the alleged corruption of the Police Department, is one that should be easily settled. The Bulletin asserts that Sergeant Ellis told the jury that he had received secret instructions from Chief Wittman to vouchsafe the gamblers of Chinatown immunity from police interference. The Call denies that such testimony was given, the Chronicle intimates that the Bulletin's story is greatly exaggerated, and the Examiner, having no positive information on the subject, confesses that if there is a leak in the Grand Jury it has not been found by the Monarch of the Dailies. Sergeant Ellis could settle the matter by telling just what his testimony was. I should not be surprised to learn that he did connect Chief Wittman with the corruption with which the Police Department unquestionably reeks. I have always believed that Chief Wittman knew more about the nefarious traffic than it would be to his interest to reveal, for I never considered him a fool, and it would be inconsistent with my appraisal of his mentality to acquit him of an unholy alliance with the criminals of Chinatown who have defied the laws of this State with impunity. I hope that the Grand Jury will brand the official rascals, and I also hope that while they are investigating the traffic between gamblers and the police, they will examine the books of the white lottery companies with a view of ascertaining what it costs those concerns to do business along the highways and byways of this metropolis.

Mrs. Gerberding's Play

Mrs. Gerberding's Spanish play given at the Century Club was so successful that it was necessary to repeat the performance and the second drew almost as large a crowd as the first. Like most amateur performances the play is funny where it is not meant to be, and the serious acting is humorous too. Mrs. Mark Gerstle, who had the soubrette role, looked very pretty but is temperamentally unsuited to the part of a Mexican senorita. Mrs. Dickinson took herself and her part with immense seriousness but forgot her lines the second night in a bit of impassioned pleading which made the first act highly amusing. Both Mrs. Hengstler and Miss Emily Rhein who did the Indian maids were excellent and Joseph Eastland, who is to marry Miss Helen Wagner, was stunning as the American gentleman of the forties. When announcing the fact, however, that he had just killed a man he was as quiet and unresponsive as though it was his custom to kill and eat several men every day. Billy Smith was not at all convincing as Antonio, but Mr. Bonestell as the don both looked and acted the part.

They Are Still Friends

Though so many rumors have been wafted westward of a rift in the friendship between Charlotte Thompson and Margaret Anglin, there is not a word of truth in the story. They are as devoted friends as ever and Miss Thompson has a studio next door to Miss Anglin's apartments. The Californian girl who gave up school-teaching for play-writing, and persevered in her ambition in spite of many discouragements, is now floating on the wave of prosperity. A drama on which she collaborated has been produced in Washington, and was a success, and she makes a good living out of hack-writing for managers.

The "Gus" Spreckelses are expected here within the week, and will probably be guests of the Rudolph Spreckelses during their stay.

Generous Mrs. Smith

Nowhere in Alameda county does Christmas mean so much as at Arbor Villa, the residence of the F. M. Smiths. There is not only the family tree and the dinner, but the festival for the cottages, and that is where Mrs. Smith and those of her household spare no expense. Each of the little households has its own tree and its own holiday feast, and Mrs. Smith, who is the god-mother of all the little children who are being trained under her fostering wing, gives generously and understandingly. There is no sense of charity, the children being trained in their own cottage homes, under a sensible "mother," for a useful career, and Mrs. Smith means to do her best to make their path as easy as possible.

No Carols This Year

Oakland is the poorer this year for missing the Christmas waits that, for years, have caroled from door to door. The old English custom was begun years ago in Oakland by the Hush girls. One of the Hushes is now Mrs. "Tom" Magee, another is Mrs. Fred Magee, and another is Mrs. Frank Richardson Wells. The Hushes were always fond of doing something for others, and when one of the girls suggested that it would be a good thing to go from house to house and awaken a true Christmas spirit in the men and women who were forgetting the love behind the gift, the idea was taken up enthusiastically. They went out in a two-seated carriage, returning home at dawn, where a hot breakfast was served to the weary singers. In later years—for the waits always sang after that—there were a number of society maidens who gathered together during the year and practiced for the Christmas eve performance. Never have other breakfasts seemed just the same to that little band as those. Among the more recent carolers were Maud Edith Pope, Pauline Fore, May Coogan and Christie Taft.

Announced Her Engagement

Carolyn Quinan, after spending several weeks in Oakland, has returned to South Africa where she makes her home with her brother. Before sailing, she announced her engagement to Walter Mott Shaw of Boston. The telegram, which was a sort of round robin sent to twenty girl chums, ran: "Engaged to Walter Mott Shaw, of Boston elite, congratulations desired when I reach Cape Town." The wedding will not be solemnized for a year and the twelve months are to be spent in European travel. Miss Quinan was accompanied as far as Paris by Hess Pringle and Edith McDonald, of Santa Rosa. The two girls expect to be absent for a year, during which time they will be the guests of relatives in Paris and London.

Kittredge--Peters

"Sub Rosa" was the legend appended to the end of the invitations received by twelve members of the Monday Club to take luncheon with Mary Dame Kittredge on Saturday afternoon. The mystery was unfolded by each girl from the heart of the wild rose beside her plate, for therein

Out of Door Life

Oakland society is looking forward to a big housewarming to be given by Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Searles in their new house in the Piedmont hills. The house is a great, rambling bungalow, and commands a magnificent view of Golden Gate, with a fine vista of hills in the distance. The Searles' are true children of nature, and they have made the most of the outdoor life. Most of the meals in this household will be taken on the wide verandas, and I hear it was there the Christmas turkey was carved and eaten, the porch pillars being entwined with ropes of greenery and brightened with the red of glowing holly berries. Another unique feature of the house is a room where, when an occasional chilly day comes, the sun may filter through ground glass and give its warmth to those who prefer it to a fire, although there is always a log burning in the fireplace. As a girl, Mrs. Searles made her home at Menlo Park, where her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Grosvenor P. Ayres, had a lovely country seat.

His Unfortunate Candor

Brown and Jones, Oakland lawyers, were invited to eat their Christmas dinner at Mrs. Green's. When the day and hour arrived, Jones appeared without Brown.

"So sweet of you to come," gushed Mrs. Green, shaking Jones's hand, warmly, "but isn't Mr. Brown coming?"

"No, he sent his deep regrets. But you see we were called on a case, and decided to toss up as to who was to go up country and who to come to your dinner."

"Ah, I understand — and you —"

"Oh, I lost as usual."

"What?"

And then Jones apologized.

"The "Dick" Tullys are expected to arrive here in January. Mrs. Tully (Eleanor Gates) has had the good luck to sell her latest manuscript, a story of the wild West, to McClure's, and her husband has disposed of several plays.

Mrs. Albert Gallatin has taken a house in the Western Addition, where will be celebrated her daughter Lita's marriage. Miss Gallatin has accumulated flesh since her return from Europe and it adds much to her beauty.

The Will Dodges are still at Rowardennan where they entertained a large party for the Christmas holidays.

Raphael Weill gave a large dinner on Wednesday.

The Sickie Was Busy

Never did the dread Reaper gather in such a harvest of well-known people during the holiday season as this year. So many families have been plunged into mourning that there will be many absentees from the whirl during the remainder of the winter. William Alvord's death sends the Blakemans and Keeneys into mourning. Though Mr. Alvord was only the stepfather of Dr. "Jim" Keeney's children and those of Charles Keeney, he was as fond of them as if they were his own grandchildren. Ethel Keeney, the elder daughter of Charles, was a particular favorite of Mr. Alvord, and when she married Mr. Tomlinson and went to New York to live, he missed her greatly. Mrs. Charles Keeney was the daughter of Admiral Spotts. Mrs. James Keeney was Miss Jones, the step-daughter of O. C. Pratt.

Mrs. A. L. Stone's death means the retirement from society, at least for a time, of her granddaughter Ursula Stone, one of the season's debutantes. The Loring's of Berkeley sustained a double bereavement. First their father, David W. Loring, passed away in Berkeley, and then their brother Frank died in New York. Frank Loring used to be very well-known in society here. He was the captain of the crack "G" company of National Guardsmen, and married Emma Angellotti, sister of Judge Angellotti of San Rafael. The death of Mrs. Boole in the East sends the Booles of Ross Valley and the J. D. McKees into mourning. The deaths of Warren English Jr., Mrs. Redington and Mrs. Monroe Salisbury mean the abandonment of social pleasures for three other families, relatives and connections.

The Late Mrs. Salisbury

There will never be another social leader to take the place of the late Mrs. Monroe Salisbury. She had her faults, as have all humans, but her virtues were far in excess of her errors of judgment. I have heard that Mrs. Salisbury never took seriously the jests made about her in the papers. She had her work cut out for her, she believed, and if others chose to criticize or lampoon her manner of conducting her social campaigns, she did not care, nor did their criticisms cause her to change her mode of action. She was very good to climbers and helped many of them attain social recognition. Of Southern birth herself, she did not let her prejudices stand in the way when it was to help on someone not so well-born as herself. She did not feel ashamed of the fact that she had in her earlier years been a worker herself, an employe in the Mint, nor of her later financial effort as the head of a boarding-house. She was good to her poor relations, made excellent matches for her daughters and some of her nieces, and was equally kind to poor Southern girls whom she introduced to society at her dancing classes. She organized the popular Fortnightlies, and her delight at these parties was to see that every girl had partners galore. She was a godsend to society which, when she started out as a leader, needed just the stimulus she put into it.

Mrs. Salisbury had some staunch friends who mourned her death sincerely enough to remain away from the dances and other social functions for a time at least. Among those who have left the whirl for a time out of respect to her are the Will Colliers, who were probably Mrs. Salisbury's most intimate friends. Captain Collier and Monroe Salisbury were at one time interested in the same investments, which it seems turned out poorly. Mrs. Salisbury was always fond of the Collier girls, especially Sara. She always placed the patrician Sara at the head of all her receiving parties and many times allowed her to lead the Germans at the old Fortnightlies. Mrs. Collier and Mrs. Salisbury were friends from childhood.

The death of Mrs. Stone caused the indefinite postponement of two dances to the younger set, one of them the house dance that Mrs. Wakefield Baker intended to give in honor of her niece, Helen Thomas, last Monday; the other the elaborate ball that Mrs. L. L. Baker had planned for her niece, Ursula Stone.

Scenes Not in The Book

A correspondent writes me from New York that "The Baroness Fiddlesticks's" Casino engagement ended with an amusing hair-pulling scene which was not written in George de Long's libretto. The chorus girls with diamonds had snubbed those with black velvet and no jewels until the latter rebelled. The Baroness is going on the road, for in spite of the fact that thirty-five thousand dollars of the Bruguere estate were sunk in the Broadway failure, the young composer still believes in his work.

Optimistic Emil

Emile Bruguere is nothing if not optimistic. Since his return from the East he has been quoted as saying that he was well satisfied with the reception accorded "Baroness Fiddlesticks," and that it was meeting with success on the road. When the piece was about to collapse at the Casino J. Cheever Goodwin was called in to patch it up and a few new tunes were inserted, so it would be hard to say now how much of it is the work of our talented young composer, whose music must have been too classical for Broadway. Bruguere, by the bye, owes much, I am told, to Oscar Weil, who has written some good music.

Lionizing the Count

Count de la Rocca, the new French Vice-Consul, bids fair to become the hit of the winter season. He has fairly magnetized society, especially the feminine section of it. He is a handsome chap with that grand air which appeals to women, and the alluring news has spread that he comes of one of the best families of France. We of this provincial burg dearly love the best families of other countries, but of course we understand that to be of a best European family is something different from a San Francisco "best." The Parrotts are said to be among our "best," but why they take the superlative degree I have never been able to understand. I know that the founder of the family never bothered himself about social rank. But the Parrotts are acknowledged to be of the San Francisco "best," and there are not fifty-seven varieties. It seems quite proper therefore that the Parrotts should have taken up the French Count. They are making his sojourn here very pleasant. The Hyde-Smiths, also of the best, are making the Count feel very much at home far from the madding crowd of gay Paree, where the best are almost as numerous as the worst. The Hyde-Smiths know their Paris well and they are acquainted with many of the Count's friends there. Another distinguished Frenchman who is much admired in society is Dr. Garceau, who has built up a very large practice. Yet he is said to be very homesick. Mrs. Hyde-Smith and Mrs. Garceau are two of the prettiest and most popular matrons in society.

Going Abroad

Madame Emilia Tojetti is going abroad shortly, and will be much missed in the California Club, for she is the most active member of the music section. Madame Tojetti is a great student, and loves nothing so well as delving into old volumes and bringing forth discoveries of ancient music. She is the eldest of the Musto sisters, and before she accumulated so much avoirdupois was a great beauty. She is a charitable woman and shows many little acts of kindness toward her poorer acquaintances. The Mustos have lived in Hyde street, at the corner of Clay, for years. The father died a few months ago, and lately there were three weddings in the family that have cut down the once large and happy home circle.

The Charles L. Ackermans have gone abroad, and will remain until September, chiefly in Paris.

The latest Californian to carry off a Black Cat prize is Adeline Knapp, who won five hundred dollars for a story in the 1904 competition.

McConnell--Gragrigge

The marriage of Lolita McConnell, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chalmers Newton McConnell, with Robert Stockdale Grayrigge, will be solemnized in Grace church on Monday, January eleventh, at three o'clock. This marriage is a pure love match, for young Grayrigge came back from England, where his father's people live and where his fortunes lie, solely, I have heard, to woo and wed the girl of his heart's choice. He was educated abroad and looks like a typical English youth, but he is very American in his feelings. Many society girls here would not have objected to have been asked to share his prospective title and estates, but young Grayrigge was true to the girl he loved. Many invitations have been issued for the marriage which will be a large affair.

A House Party

The "Willie" Bourns took a large party to Grass Valley with them for New Year's, the company including several of the season's debutantes. The Bourns' country place is an ideal home, with a big house surrounded by extensive grounds, laid out in palms and tropical plants, with tall trees and beds of beautiful flowers. In the winter of course the verdure is lacking, for the snow falls up that way and covers everything with a mantle of white. "Billy" Bourn inherited the property, I believe, which adjoins the Empire mines, also his, and one of the best-paying mining properties in the State. The mines are managed by George Starr, a relative of their owner.

The Tobins

There is no happier couple in San Francisco society than the "Clem" Tobins. They are real comrades, entirely in harmony in all their thoughts and pleasures. Mrs. Tobin is one of the best-dressed of the season's brides. She looks particularly well in a black and white check tailormade suit with which she wears a large black hat. Mrs. "Joe" Tobin is also partial to black and white toilettes, and has one check suit that is very becoming to her.

The Jacobs "School" Party

The Fred Jacobses evolved a new idea in social functions with their "school" party last week. Children's parties are not novel, the kind where grown-ups appear in juvenile attire, but the Jacobs party was more than that. The drawing-room was fitted up like a school-room, and the motif of the entertainment was an "exhibition" just like the real thing. Mrs. Jacobs was a delightful hostess and looked very attractive in a red costume. Charles Aiken made a great hit as a football player and all the men in their "little boy" clothes acted well their parts.

Chinchilla in Favor

Chinchilla comes next to sable as the popular fur this season. Mrs. Hermann Oelrichs, before her marriage, was very fond of the pretty gray fur and used to wear it a good deal. It is expensive and much harder to obtain than sealskin or mink. Bessie Wilson is wearing a chic chinchilla four-in-hand and muff. Mrs. Greenbaum (Dorothy Heynemann) has a beautiful set of chinchilla, which includes a hat. She has also a coat, muff and hat of Persian lamb.

Ade's Farical Satire

"The Sultan of Sulu" is one of the best of the enormous American output of musical-comedy. The book being the work of George Ade is funny, or at least it is not so witless as many of the inane pieces that have been set to music for American managers. Though its plot is merely a pretext for introducing shapely women and animated pictures with tuneful accompaniment, it is not altogether devoid of purpose. George Ade is a dealer in satire and in "The Sultan of Sulu" he satirizes the hypocrisy of Uncle Sam in posing as the benevolent friend of the benighted races, pretending to assimilate them for their own good, shouldering the white man's burden for the promotion of commerce, trailing the Constitution after the flag for sordid reasons, while violating its cardinal principle which makes Government the choice of the governed. This is a breezy satire full of good quips and jolts at Uncle Sam's expense, but like most musical comedies it is crudely farical, and scant of coherent episode. Mr. Ade has done the familiar trick of shifting white people to a far-away isle and there mingling them with the picturesque natives for the development of comic situations. Mr. George Marion, stage manager, did the rest, and Mr. Marion knows his business. He is one of the best stage managers in the country. He has a pretty genius for suiting the action to the melody, never presenting a motionless picture, grouping for dainty effects, and projecting a quick series of palpitant poses. With Marion turning the crank the panorama never bores. Alfred G. Wathall, the composer, supplied several pleasing numbers, which, however, are not unfamiliar to us, for the Sultan made slower progress across the continent than did his catchy tunes. The company is superior to the average road organization. At its head is Thomas Whiffen, son of the veteran actress, a young comedian, with all the tricks of his trade at his command, but more industrious than magnetic. The best singing voice in the company is that of Walter Lawrence, but this merry Columbia attraction does not boast of its vocal talent. Fortunately it doesn't have to. Maude Williams, the soprano, is a pretentious singer without justification, and George O'Donnell is a singer with a tremendous voice which he does not make much good use of. The most satisfactory singing is done by the chorus, which is composed of several of the liveliest young women that ever contributed to the gayety of a Columbia audience.

—Theodore Bonnet.

"The Darling of the Gods"

You may readily understand why Blanche Bates grumbles at the role of Yo-San and wishes that she had something better to do. She complains that she is only one of the details of a big production, and that is quite true. It is also true that she is the star, but according to the modern system of theatrics no "production" is complete without a star passing a name that looks well when blazoned in electric light over the main entrance. In "The Darling of the Gods" the star is not the central figure. Kara, the outlaw, enjoys that distinction, and even he with the star is dovetailed into the scenery at the wind-up and lends himself gracefully to the mechanics of the occasion. But the five-act Japanese tragedy is not a conventional play. That wizard of the stage, Dave Belasco, has wrought a masterpiece that sets at defiance accepted tenets of the drama. The magnitude of the spectacle is impressive and it abounds in pathos, horror, tragedy and heroism. The scope and power of the drama fairly stagger an audience, and never invite applause. It grips you through your imagination rather than through the ordinary emotions that are aroused by dramatic action. In fancy you are transported to the heart of old Japan, and so enthralling is the atmosphere that you are imbued with a thorough understanding of the feelings and sentiments of a strange pagan people who might have been borrowed from the pages of the "Arabian Nights." The human, tender touches in the dialogue, and the simple pathos of Yo-San's idealistic love story, vest the Japanese maiden with live interest, and you become deeply in sympathy with her in her devotion to her stolid, heroic lover. In the presence of weird Japanese gods you experience a shivery creepiness, and in the horror, suspense and tragic import of Zakkuri's torture chamber, your feelings are harrowed up with ruthless intensity. Later on you are confronted with a haunting picture in the bamboo forest where Yo-San's lover dies in her arms, and by this time it occurs to you that this drama, so full of vivid, bewildering Oriental beauty and magnificence, has in it many of the elements of greatness, that it is a masterpiece of color and theme moving in stately precision, gruesome, perhaps, but poetic of conception, a grand epic of stagecraft. And after all, why should a young star pout over being identified with the machinery and scenery of this grand and thrilling production? As the hapless Japanese Princess Blanche Bates has to respond to many calls on her histrionic talent. The part is a big one, of varying moods and requiring much artistic effort, and Blanche Bates is surprisingly successful in portraying the emotions of that delicious, simple maiden who believed that it was better to lie a little than be unhappy much, who loved only for her honorable lover's sake, and followed him to death with pathetic loyalty. She pictures the lighter moods of the unsophisticated girl with exquisite realism, but seems to exercise too much repression in the tragic climaxes. Her emotional work is in surprising contrast to that of the other Belasco star, Leslie Carter, but perhaps Dave the Wizard argued that the Oriental is less demonstrative than her Caucasian sister. Of somewhat the same temperament is Eugene Ormonde, the heroic Kara, who looks like Emperor William, but plays like a passionless lover. Albert Bruning gives a very artistic performance in the role of Zakkuri, the fiendish war minister, whom he invests with sinister craftiness. On the whole the production is one of the most powerful ever seen at a local playhouse. It is billed for three weeks at the Grand.

Theodore Bonnet.

Grand Opera at the Tivoli

The Tivoli is to have grand opera again, beginning Monday evening, January ninth. The company is an organization of over one hundred people imported by the Mexican Government under a liberal salary from the Mexican treasury. It was the original intention of the directors of this organization to go direct to Havana after the conclusion of their engagement in the Mexican capital, but through Mr. Leahy's tempting financial inducements their tour was re-arranged. The authorities in Havana consented to a month's postponement of their grand opera season and the big company will be brought intact by a special train to San Francisco, returning direct to Havana at the conclusion of their engagement there. The full list of principals is: Sopranos, Tettarazzini, Berlindi, Flory and Bettini; mezzo sopranos and contraltos, Claessens and Marchi; tenors, Colli, Bazelli, Prosini and De Marcho; baritones, La Puma, Romboli and Rossi; basses, Rossi, Mugnoz and Cervi; conductors, Pollacco, Golisciani and Longo; stage director, Saporelli. There are a chorus and an orchestra, which when increased by the addition of some specially engaged players of the Tivoli orchestra, will number fifty. The repertory to be presented will include "Faust," "The Pearl Fishers" by Bizet, "Mignon," "Manon Lescaut" by Massenet, "Lakme" by De Liebes, "Rigoletto," "Somnambula" by Bellini, "La Traviata," "Dinorah" and "Pagliacci" by Leoncavallo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Lucia," "Puritani," "The Barber of Seville," "La Tosca" and "Manon Lescaut" by Puccini, "Adrienne Lacouvreux" by Cilea, "Fedora" and "Andre Chenier" by Giordani and "Zaza" by Leoncavallo, "Carmen" and "La Boheme." Many of the artists who will appear in these operas have sung at La Scala in Milan, the San Carlo theatre in Naples, the Constanzi theatre in Rome, the Paglion in Florence and the Mosimo in Palermo. The sale of seats for the first week of the season will open at the box office of the Tivoli theatre on Wednesday, January fourth.

"Old Heidelberg"

It is not often that a stock company risks contrast with a Broadway production while the memory of the latter is still fresh. That is what the Alcazar company did in presenting this week that delightful sentimental comedy, "Old Heidelberg." It was only a few months ago that Richard Mansfield appeared in that play at the Columbia with a strong, well-drilled, seasoned cast. Mansfield sounded the only discordant note in that production, for the old gentleman overacted to accentuate the bubbling youth of the prince, and made himself grotesque. In the rush of new attractions this week I was able to see but one act of Heidelberg, the act devoted to the arrival of Karl Heinrich at the university, where he was greeted by Kathie and by the students. I was there at the first performance and it was so good that I could scarcely break away, so redolent was it of that invigorating atmosphere which is essentially of and through this charming play. The smoothness and spirit of this first performance was amazing. The staging lacked not a single detail, and the members of the company played with the art of specially selected mummers adapted by temperament for the roles. Who would have thought that Lillian Lawrence could play the rustic Kathie? She does play it with capital naivete, and with all the simplicity of the German girl who was the toast of the Heidelberg students. In that act John Craig plays the ingenuous prince cleverly, but the most artistic performance is that of John B. Maher in the role of the old tutor. He completely merges his identity with that of the rollicking old gentleman. The pompous valet, Lutz, is in the hands of Luke Connors, who plays the part more boisterously than did the Lutz of the Mansfield cast, but effectively notwithstanding the over-emphasis. I am going to sit that Alcazar performance through.

The Orpheum Road Show

There are just four superlative turns in the Orpheum Road Show, which annually comes this way. Clarice Vance leads the superlatives, with her quaint little darky songs as the darkies sing them. Miss Vance is a tall young woman with an expressive face all alight with humor, the chuckling, quiet humor that goes with real darky songs. Miss Vance's hit on Tuesday night was of such dimensions that had she been willing to supply the demand she could have filled the hours from start to finish of the program, entirely to the audience's satisfaction. Probst, with his imitations of birds, animals and machinery, made a milder sort of a hit; I do not class him among the superlatives, for what he does well I have heard others do better. But the audience liked him. Next in point of magnitude, speaking of hits, was that of Harry Smirl and Rose Kessner. Billed as "The Bell Boy and the Maid," their act is one of the most original that ever somersaulted and high-kicked over the Orpheum stage. Smirl does the most extraordinary back and forward and sidewise somersaults without any disagreeable contortions and without changing countenance—always a smiling one. His partner, in a beautiful rose-colored poppy frock, gives a graceful skirt dance. She also shows her ability later on as a balancer. This team has a "chorus" for their last stunt, the dearest little French poodle, which like its master and mistress is agile and clever. Grace Palotta was a slim girl when I saw her in "A Gaiety Girl" years ago. She is exquisitely rounded out now, and prettier than ever. Her act is unique in idea and settings, the latter showing a millinery shop, with four stunning "millinery models" appearing heads and shoulders above the counter. The models later come to life and join in the choruses of Lady Fashion's songs, three of them, in addition, doing a Gaiety dance. Miss Palotta evidently had a cold Tuesday night, or else the smoke bothered her, for her voice ran from shrill to flat with only occasional return to its naturally warm and rich quality. The songs introduced in her act go from gay to grave, ending with a very sweet song and a pretty tableau of herself kneeling, with the four millinery girls behind her. The trained bears and ponies of M. and Madame Spessardy are the other superlative. The bears are well-bred beasts in white collars and the ponies are beauties. They dance and perform other stunts and are altogether most interesting. McIntyre and Heath received a very warm welcome, for they are popular, and their familiar sketch is enjoyable despite its antiquity.

The Passionate Poetess's Play

"Mizpah, or the story of Esther," the biblical drama by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, to be given its premier at the Majestic during the week beginning January ninth, is in blank verse and those conversant with it declare that it presents the poetess in her most impassioned style. Its dramatic climaxes are intense and the simple story of the Bible is brought out in its most vivid coloring in action and words. Scenically the times, conditions and grandeur of the era of the Persian captivity are fully and elaborately depicted. Its production is considered to be one of the theatrical events of the times, as Ella Wheeler Wilcox is one of the widest discussed writers of the day, even if she is not universally regarded as a great one.

JOHN CRAIG, in "Old Heidelberg" at the Alcazar.

The Majestic is giving an admirable production of "A Contented Woman" this week. This is the play poor Charley Hoyt wrote for his beautiful second wife, Caroline Miskel. Its satirical points still make good with the audience. Oza Waldrop, who is in the cast, received a rousing welcome upon her return to San Francisco after her long absence in the South.

"The Heart of Chicago" is just the kind of a melodrama that appeals to an audience delighting in thrills and sensations. It has the usual thrilling rescue, a locomotive in full speed, and various other heart-throbbing scenic effects. The Central company always gives the best of interpretations to melodrama, and the scenic artist has evolved splendid background for the lurid plot and situations.

In the Limelight

George Wessels, the Prince of Tosan of the "Darling of the Gods" cast, has been away from San Francisco many years. At one time he was a popular stock actor here. My first recollection of him was in the role of Ivan Ogaroff in the first production in this city of "Michael Strogoff" at the old California.

Pinero's "Wife Without a Smile" has been presented to Broadway, but without the gyrations of the doll that caused comment in two continents. The heavy hand of Madame Grundy has fallen on the doll and now it merely dangles. Consequently the play is as great a failure as would "Hamlet" be minus the melancholy Dane.

Klaw and Erlanger's gorgeous production, "Mother Goose," is flying this way, and will shortly roost in the Grand Opera House. There are three hundred and fifty people in the cast.

Next Week's Bills

There will be a matinee today of the "Darling of the Gods" and an extra holiday matinee Monday. The run of the drama here is limited to two more weeks. Next Thursday Miss Bates will give a special matinee, when she will present, by request, a double bill consisting of "Madame Butterfly," and the comedy, "My Aunt's Advice," which she wrote in conjunction with George Arliss.

The Majestic offers the popular military drama, "Held by the Enemy," as the attraction starting with the matinee performance Monday, January second. "Old Heidelberg," noted to be presented, will be postponed on account of the magnitude of the preparations that are being made for Ella Wheeler Wilcox's biblical drama, "Mizpah, or the story of Esther," which is to be given its premier at the Majestic January ninth. "Held by the Enemy" will be presented on a most elaborate scale and its characters portrayed by a great cast in which the most popular of the Morosco players will figure.

"The Sultan of Sulu" enters upon its second and last week at the Columbia with a special matinee on Monday. On Monday, January ninth, the Columbia will offer the Frederick Warde-Kathryn Kidder combination in "Salamambo," prepared for the stars by Stanislaus Stange from the novel by Flaubert.

So great has been the demand for seats for "Old Heidelberg" at the Alcazar that the management has decided to keep the play on for another week and a New Year's matinee.

The Orpheum Road Show, which will begin the second and last week of its San Francisco engagement tomorrow afternoon, January first, will be augmented for the farewell twelve performances by the four Bards, American athletes. These young men, all real brothers, do an act said to be beyond description. There will be a special matinee on Monday, January second.

"King Dodo" will run but another week at the Tivoli, when will come the grand opera company from Mexico in repertory.

Howard Hall, once leading actor at the Grand and later at the Central, was co-author with Charles Blaney of "The Child Slaves of New York," the Central's New Year's attraction. One of the features is a thrilling rescue from a den of thieves by the police patrol boat just in the nick of time. Real water will be used and a full-sized steam-tug will be seen on the stage. Herschel

CLARICE VANCE,

The inimitable singer of coon songs, who is making such a hit with the Orpheum Road Show.

Mayall in the leading role will have a part along the lines of Sherlock Holmes with many quick changes of costume.

"Princess Fan Tan" will receive its final presentation at the Chutes on Monday evening and on Tuesday afternoon, January third, the regular specialty performances will be resumed. Among the new vaudeville people will be the four Gordons, phenomenal acrobats, Dan Russell and Blanche O'Neil, an Irish comedy duo, presenting their original absurdity, "Sullivan the Coachman," the Burton bell-ringers, musical entertainers of renown, Eldridge, who makes portraits and paintings in sand, and Sallie Russell, a versatile and vivacious singing soubrette.

In the Sunday Call Magazine tomorrow begins H. Rider Haggard's latest novel, "The Brethren," a romance of the Crusades. "The Brethren" is written in the line of the modern historical novel, but Mr. Haggard has lost none of that power to charm and fascinate which made his earlier books so popular. Other features of interest tomorrow will be "Driftwood," the fifty dollar prize story for the week, written by Martha Tustin Patton of San Francisco, who has already won one prize. "The Blowing of the Horns" is the story of a New Year's custom. Louis Levy summarizes the past year's work in athletics in California in "California's Record in Athletics," which includes some new photographs of California record holders. Chimmie Fadden's adventures are continued by Edward W. Townsend, and the regular installments of Charles Dryden's serial, "On and Off the Bread Wagon," and Opie Read's "Jottings of Old Lim Jucklin" appear, in addition to the book page by Robert W. Ritchie and the puzzle page.

Arrivals at Hotel del Monte last week included: Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Russell, Portland; Mr. and Mrs. Albert H. Harris, Rochester, N. Y.; T. S. Hand, Mrs. C. A. Tyrrell, Miss L. E. Tyrrell, New York; J. C. Goodrich, Seattle; Mr. and Mrs. A. D. Shepard, Misses Shepard, Mr. and Mrs. Howard C. Holmes, San Francisco; Mr. and Mrs. L. S. ## In Financial Circles

There was the usual holiday week inactivity. Bond transactions amounted to $202,000; total of Shares 2831, divided as follows: 160 Lighting, 220 Water, 302 Miscellaneous, 209 Bank shares and 1940 Sugar shares. Rather a poor showing even for a holiday week. Prices show no variation; the tone, however, was strong. The principal dealings took place in Hutchinson Sugar Plantation Company, at a slight advance. It is said the Hawaiian Planters' combine known as the "Sugar Factors Company," has made a new contract with the Trust on terms quite favorable to the plantations. The better terms are reported to be about $5 to $7.50 a ton. The better terms exacted are undoubtedly due to the determined stand by the Honolulu Sugar Plantation.

Music

Andrew Bogart's Pupil Made Good

One of the truest tributes to the talent of Louvia Rogers, Andrew Bogart's fifteen-year-old pupil, was that paid her during her interpretation of the pathetic little song, "Daddy," which she gave as one of her encore selections. Several in the audience were moved to tears during its rendition, and one woman was so affected that she left the hall and did not return until the close of the song. Miss Rogers interprets her songs with rare conception of their meaning, and sings easily in German, French, Italian and English with a faultless diction. This perfection of diction is one of the noticeable qualities in Mr. Bogart's own vocalism. In two years her teacher predicts that Miss Rogers will be a wonder, and it is certainly remarkable to find such artistic and dramatic interpretation in a fifteen-year-old girl. After the grand aria, "Du Christ Avea Ardeur," by Bemberg, she was recalled many times with such insistence that she finally responded to the demand with a Cradle Song by Johns. Her concert was given in Maple Hall on Thursday evening, and the program in full was: From Six Love Songs, Op. 40,—Sweet Blue Eyed Maid, Sweetheart, Tell me, Thy Beaming Eyes, O Lovely Rose, MacDowell; suite Op. 11 for piano and violin, Goldmark; Ich ham im Traum Geweinert, Schumann; The First Primrose, Grieg; Lehn Deine Wang, Jensen; Ouvre tes Yeux Bleus, Massenet; Lasciali Dir, Pizzi; Allah, Thou Art so Like a Flower, Chadwick; Songs My Mother Taught Me, Dvorak; My Dreams, Tosti; violin solo, Walter's Prize Song, Wagner Wilhelmj; arioso, "Du Christ avea Ardeur," Bemberg. Hother Wismer, violinist, and Fred Maurer, accompanist, assisted in the program.

Philip Hale, the Boston musical critic, to whom Lawrence Gilman dedicates his new volume, "Phases of Modern Music," is a Yale graduate and a member of the bar, as well as one of the most erudite and incisive of contemporary musical critics. Mr. Hale has studied music in Germany and the organ under Guilman in Paris. He has been prominent in musical journalism for more than a dozen years and the editor of the Boston Symphony program books since 1901. It was Mr. Hale who originated the admirable note concerning Edward McDowell, in which he says: "McDowell is a genius — not a Boston genius, but a real genius."

Ysaye, in a recent interview, said that the origin of his peculiar name is more or less dubious, but he was told it was derived from Isaac.

The Gadski Concerts

Next Tuesday night Gadski will give her first song recital in this city at the Alhambra, assisted by Herr Selmar Mayrowitz, an eminent European conductor-pianist. Mr. Meyrowitz is one of the Wagnerian leaders at Carlsruhe and his numbers will be his own transcriptions of Wagnerian scores. The program will include two grand arias, one from Weber's "Freischutz" and the other the beautiful one from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro." The songs will be "Lotusblume," "Nussbaum," "Mondnacht," and "Widmung" by Schumann, "Ich liebe Dich" by Beethoven, Aus Meinen grossen Schmerzen, "Die Haide ist braun" by Franz, "Fur Music" and "Murmeldes Luftchen" by Jensen and a group of Schubert songs including the "Erlking" and "Margaret at the Spinning Wheel." On Thursday night another magnificent program will be offered including a group of songs by American composers and the "Samson and Delilah" aria. At the Saturday matinee a Wagnerian program will be given, including scenes from "Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "Tannhauser" and "Gotterdammerung." One year ago the new Tivoli threw open the doors of its beautiful new temple of music, and now, at the close of the first year of its history, the management is enthusiastic over the success of its enterprise. During the year Manager Leahy has kept the music lovers of San Francisco well supplied with entertainment. There have been some notable productions at the new house, and the management may well be proud of its achievements. It has kept up to date with musical comedies, one of which, "King Dodo," the current attraction, promises to be a record-breaker in a year of record runs. In addition to the regular performances of the stock company, the Tivoli gave us some popular concerts by such famous artists as Schumann-Heink and Josef Hofmann, and now comes the announcement of the engagement of the Italian grand opera company brought from Italy by the Mexican Government, the advance sale for which opens January fourth. Manager Leahy also reports that he has secured contracts for "Florodora," "The Silver Slipper" and "The Burgomaster."

In deference to the wishes of hundreds of people who were unable to gain admission to the First Congregational church of Oakland last Sunday evening, the choir of this church will repeat Handel's oratorio, "The Messiah," Sunday evening, January first. The full chorus of eighty voices and soloists will participate, including Mrs. Z. R. Jenkins, the soprano soloist from St. Dominic's church, San Francisco, whose singing gave such pleasure last Sunday evening. Owing to its length, the service will begin promptly at seven o'clock as before.

Paderewski Will Return

On his trip from Portland to Los Angeles Paderewski will take a day off in San Francisco to give music lovers another treat. He will give a matinee performance at the Alhambra on Sunday afternoon, January eighth, the sale for which will open on the fifth.

The next great pianist to visit us will be Vladimir de Pachmann, the greatest Chopin player in the world. His dates are January twenty-fifth and twenty-seventh, evenings, and Saturday matinee, January twenty-eighth. He comes under the sole direction of Will Greenbaum.

Miss Camille Frank has accepted the position of soprano in the chorus of the First Congregational church

The grand opera season will open at the Columbia in February and Henry W. Savage promises to give San Francisco the greatest presentations of grand opera in English ever enjoyed here. He will send from New York a monster organization of over two hundred people and will have practically a double cast for every opera in the repertory announced for presentation.

Gottlob, Marx & Co. announce the dates for Melba's appearances here as Tuesday, February seventh and Friday, February tenth. The songstress will be heard at the Alhambra and will have with her a great company of soloists.

Automobile Topics

A. Knowles has placed his order with the Pioneer Automobile company for a French type Oldsmobile touring runabout. The Pioneer company is in receipt of a letter from Joseph Maw of Winnipeg, Canada, reading: "I have now gotten my contract signed by the Winton Motor Carriage company and am of the opinion that we have the best car in America." Mr. Maw has taken the Winton agency for the territory of Winnipeg, after a thorough investigation of the Eastern factories.

Perhaps one of the happiest young society women in San Francisco is Miss Elsie McEwen, who received from her father as a Christmas present a thirty horse-power Winton touring car. She is one of the most expert and daring chauffeuses in California. Last year she drove one of the large two-cylinder Winton cars which was in every way satisfactory to her, excepting that it was not quite fast enough. Her new car will be especially geared in regard to speed, and is expected to arrive here some time during the month of February, 1905.

Al. Hechtman and Charlie Dickman were of a party of Winton enthusiasts who made a tour around the bay on Sunday last.

Chas. Farnham of Cleveland, Ohio, who is at present visiting California, was heard to say one day last week that he enjoyed a number of rides in the new model "C" four-cylinder Winton while at his home in Cleveland recently. He stated that the car ran very smoothly and was possessed of a great deal of speed and power. He further stated that to the best of his knowledge, it maintained a speed of about forty-five miles an hour. This car sells in San Francisco for nineteen hundred and fifty dollars and will be on display at the Pioneer company's salesroom about January tenth.

Harry S. Haupt, agent for the Thomas touring car in New York, made the following statement recently to The Motor World: "My contract with the Thomas company is for seventy-two cars. They will be sold before the 1905 season is well under way. The worst of it is I am unable to get any more. I cannot increase my order because the company's output is sold. There are actual bona-fide orders in the company's hands for every car the factory can turn out, and no one can get a single car in addition to those already ordered." Frank E. Hartigan, sales agent in San Francisco for the Thomas touring car, was at its factory in Buffalo when H. S. Haupt came there to secure the Thomas agency for New York. Haupt had no knowledge of the automobile business, but he owned a three-cylinder Thomas which he had run over eight thousand miles at practically no expense for repairs. He concluded that the agency for such a car was a good investment. When the contract was closed he transferred by telegraph from his bank in New York to the bank of the Thomas factory in Buffalo a deposit of twenty-five thousand dollars.

A new six-cylinder 60 h. p. Thomas, built to order for Colonel Miller of Franklin, Pa., has been completed and will be entered in the Ormond races.

One of the recent sales of the West Coast Motor Car company was a four-passenger Autocar to Fred Franks of this city. Mr. Franks has never owned a car before and has learned to operate his simple auto with much success.

Harry Stetson took an enjoyable trip across the bay last week in his Autocar.

Mrs. A. A. Moore Jr. has long enjoyed outmobiling, her husband having owned numerous cars, both large and small, but not until recently has she known what great pleasure is derived in running one of the chug-wagons. Mr. Moore added an Autocar runabout to his stable and his wife after a few more lessons in the operation of the little car may be added to the list of expert chauffeuses in San Francisco.

Frank Fries, the young son of William Fries, is more than enthusiastic over his father's present to him—an Autocar runabout. Last Monday he had the little car going all day, making the trip through the Presidio and park several times.

W. W. Arsdale enjoyed a spin out through the park last Monday in his Autocar. Mrs. C. S. Middleton was accompanied on a run this week in her Autocar by the Misses Bruns and Miss

At the Punch Bowl's Brink

BY ANNE THURBER.

Holly brewed the punch. He would not explain just how he did it, for he said it would never do to give away the secret of the only thing he knew how to do well. Everybody knew the punch was good, and so they stopped begging Holly to tell how it was made, and satisfied themselves with drinking quantities of it.

The gathering to see the old year out was at Colonel Larry's. He had a last name, but last names were tabu in the merry coterie that met occasionally to celebrate birthdays, inheritances, or any old thing that could serve as a pretext. Sometimes a stranger, introduced at once of the functions of the Knockers' Club, as Ducey had christened the group of genial spirits, would ask for a last name from someone to whom he had taken a fancy. But if he learned the name it was not then and there, but upon some other occasion outside the limits of the Knockers' Club.

"We're just a jolly bunch of good fellows, men and women, and that's all," said Colonel Larry, "and if some of us act other characters in the world from those we are here, it is not well to remember them when we are here."

"Eat, drink and be merry," said Holly, "for tomorrow we have to practice law or medicine, attempt to bluff the stock market, buy and sell bonds, report what is doing in the city for gaping multitudes of newspaper readers, preside over banks and board meetings, paint our picture, write our book, or be staid wives and mothers. Here we are just what we are."

"And the very devil sometimes," added Mollie, pouring out another drink for the stranger.

At first the stranger was shocked at the overflowing spirits of the coterie, their merry quips and pranks and breaches of decorum. But if he were of the adaptable species he soon fell into the spirit of the gatherings and held his own with the others, in song, story, repartee and dance. The true soul of camaraderie was possessed by every one of the Knockers, and this spirit was always present. There was no room among them for the person who comes, drinks and eats of the cheer provided and goes away and "knocks." The Knockers themselves never knocked. They held sacred their little meetings, and if staid Colony Larry unbent to the extent of doing a cakewalk, or Ducey imbibed too freely of the liquid refreshment, or Flo told a naughty story when enthused to the point of forgetting her usual delicacy, or Holly kissed Bess without the privilege of mistletoe overnead, nobody said anything about it afterward. "Post mortems," as well as last names, were tabu.

Colonel Larry was a veteran clubman, a rich old bachelor and the best of good fellows, kind, witty and generous. Holly was the head of a big insurance company. Ducey controlled the destinies of a bank. Rex was a hardware merchant, Tony an artist, Will a horse owner, Punch a mining magnate, Harry the city editor of a big daily. Flo was an author of two best sellers; Mollie a society matron whose husband owned four solid blocks of downtown real estate; Bertie, a school teacher; Bess, an actress of serious roles. The queen of the bunch was Gertrude, the prettiest, wittiest and most graceful of all the girls. They were all "girls" to the Knockers, though some of them were sufficiently advanced in years of indiscretion to appeal to the callow youth in quest of experience. Gertrude was the youngest, and by virtue of that and her other attractions, was the most popular of them all, for the male Knockers were not callow youths. They had lived long enough to value, at her true worth, the woman of thirty or thereabouts. It was Gertrude who could sing the coon songs in the real dinky way, kick the highest in the dance, and who was the quickest to see the point of a jest. Out in the world she was a society girl of the conventional order, and no one outside of the Knockers knew her at her most brilliant best. She was engaged to marry the aristocratic scion of a blue-blooded New York family, and expected to become a bride at Easter.

On New Year's Eve, they were all at Colonel Larry's with the exception of Punch, who had telephoned that he would drop in about eleven-thirty and begged the privilege of bringing a friend.

He's a nice chap and I think will fit in all right," said Punch over the phone.

"All right, fetch him along," answered Colonel Larry, hanging up the receiver.

The gayety was at its height when Punch opened the door of the dining-room and ushered in his friend.

"Welcome, welcome," cried a dozen voices, and Flo handed him a brimming glass of Holly's famous brew.

"Welcome, welcome," repeated Colonel Larry, holding out a cordial hand to the mining magnate's companion, as the latter said:

"Colonel Larry,—Prince Charlie."

Punch had remembered in time, as he was about to introduce the New Yorker by name, that family cognomens were not acceptable to the Knockers.

The room was in semi-darkness, the only light that shed by the red and blue flames in the punch-bowl.

Prince Charlie saw only a circle of ghostly forms, each holding a glass, gathered about the flaming bowl, and heard voices of both genders caroling scraps of song, or merrily jesting. He joined in the chorus of "Auld Lang Syne," as they all took hands and sang good-bye to the Old Year. He sang as loudly as the others when the New Year was ushered in with "He's a Jolly Good Fellow." Then as the last glass was drained, the company flocked to the drawing-room where Gertrude sat herself down at the piano and began a lively two-step. It was a coon song, and her voice rose sweeter and higher than all the others as, to her music, they formed in couples and danced.

Punch's friend was the last to enter the drawing-room. Mollie had engaged him in conversation and they were still earnestly talking as Prince Charlie joined the dancers.

"Who is singing soprano?" he asked, "that high, sweet voice sounds familiar to me somehow."

"Oh, that's our queen," answered Mollie, "Gertrude, turn around and greet the Prince."

At her call, the girl left the piano and came toward the speaker. The dancers paused in their twirling deux-temps, wondering why the music had stopped.

"Charlie!"

"Gertrude!"

None of the company could fail to scent a tragedy in the tones of the simultaneous exclamations. But, with the tact of friendship, they turned away, while Mollie hastily started another dance tune at the piano.

Gertrude stood, cold and silent, proudly awaiting her fiancé's next words. They came after some deliberation:

"I suppose this is the end," he said.

"I don't understand—the end—of what?"

"Oh, you know well enough the kind of woman my wife must be."

"Must be?"

"Yes. I had an ideal."

"You did!" she exclaimed, and there was a sneer in her tone. "What a narrow escape I had! Years ago I resolved never to marry a man so foolish as to evolve in his fancy an ideal wife upon the theory that he could recognize her in real life. It would be an awful bore trying to live up to your husband's ideal. How fortunate that we understood each other in time."

Then she shrugged her pretty, bare shoulders, and joined the group at the piano, who were singing, "Bind the Cup with Roses."

"THE FLORENTINES."

It is a relief to the reviewer occasionally to come across a book like "The Florentines," a play written by Maurice D. Samuels of San Francisco. Mr. Samuels's play is hardly suitable for the stage, in fact, about as unsuitable as one of Cadenasso's landscapes would be for a drop curtain. Nevertheless it has action and plot, and is written in good blank verse. The central figure is Benvenuto Cellini, goldsmith and sculptor, and moreover typical figure of the Italian Renaissance, with its striking virtues and vices. There is also a Duke of Florence (Cosimo di Medici), a lover, Marsilio Giotto, Cellini's apprentice, but really Prince of Perombino, and a Lady Leonora. These play the principal parts, and the plot revolves around a diamond ring stolen from Cellini by his mistress, Federiga. The writer has evidently made a close study of the times, for there is atmosphere to his little drama. The book is well gotten up by Brentano of New York. The cover is in warm red with plain gold lettering, the cover design being the shield of Florence. The title page is very attractive with its groups of Renaissance figures. Paper, type and margins are all that could be desired. Lovers of literature would prize it for a holiday gift.

CROWN JEWELS PAWNED BY MONARCHS.

It is a well known fact that rulers have been compelled to pawn the royal jewels in times of need to carry on affairs of state importance. The private citizen of today need not feel skeptical about doing likewise if necessary. A special department for this purpose exists at the Baldwin Jewelry Store, 906 Market street, where liberal advances can be obtained at banking rates.

Beatriz Michelena. P. E. Bowles of Oakland was on this side of the bay on Monday taking a spin in his Autocar.

The Pope-Toledo Touring Car Company is much elated over the information just received from the Pope Motor Car Company that the side entrance car has been increased in horse-power from 24-30, which was used in 1904, to 30-38 horse-power for 1905, and it is claimed by the manufacturers that it will be the most powerful of anything produced in the United States. A sample of this car was shipped from the factory at Toledo, Ohio, on the twenty-second instant and is due in San Francisco on the tenth of January.

A carload of new Cadillac high-powered runabouts will arrive in San Francisco in January. The new four-cylinder 30 horse-power Cadillacs, with King of Belgium tonneau and side-door entrance, will arrive here in February.

The latest bit of interesting news from Eastern motordom is that the owner of the White steam car, which was driven by Webb Jay in the famous Eagle Rock hill climbing contest, is to bring his speedy horseless carriage to California and will spend some time touring in the State.

C. M. Wiggin attended the Teachers' Institute at San Jose this week, running down from Oakland in his "White."

Judge Bond of Santa Clara is one of the latest to be introduced to the modern creation. After having several most enjoyable rides in a White steamer, he immediately placed his order for a 1905 model of this make.

On a day of the recent races at Los Angeles H. D. Ryus, one of the most prominent dealers in Southern California, was at Mohave, but wanted to be in at the finish, and in order to make an appearance at the speed contests had to set a new record for the trip. In one of his new White steamers Ryus ran down in just five hours and a half; he says it is a jaunt he has no desire to repeat. Coming in he raced the Owl, and in some places held his own even against that speedy train.

The Pacific Motor Car company has just received a carload of the new model "N" Packards, double side-entrance. This car has created quite a sensation among people who have seen it.

E. W. Hopkins was seen Monday with his family driving through the park and Presidio in his new Packard.

George H. Lent is expected shortly from the East where he purchased a model "N" Packard, which arrived in the carload received by the Pacific Motor Car company last week.

Motocycle Notes

C. C. Hopkins has already booked several orders for the 1905 Indian motorcycle, an illustration of which we show in another column of this issue. The new machine has several exclusive features, among which are the double grip control and the cushion fork. "The cushion fork," writes Mr. Hendee, the manufacturer, "we cannot enlarge too much upon. There is not one particle of side or twist strain to it, and by simply tightening the nut shown in the illustration the fork can be made rigid at any time. The projection on the front of the fork crown contains the spring, which also can be regulated to tension as the rider may desire. On the back of the crown there is the secondary spring, which serves as a buffer for the secondary crown, therefore the front wheel is suspended between two springs and gives the most desirable effect, relieving all jar and jolt from the handlebars and forward part of the frame." Full and instant control of the machine is always contained in the hands without removing them from the grips—the left grip controlling the throttle and the right grip the spark, as heretofore. This is an advantage which all motorcycle riders will appreciate. The appearance of the Indian, always good, has even been improved by some little refinements, and it certainly is an ideal machine and deserving of all the good things that have been said about it. Its reliability and sterling qualities are so well established that it is not necessary to mention them, and now with the new comfort features of cushion fork, compensating sprocket, imported Brooks saddle and

Mr. Hopkins, the Indian agent, delivered the first "side attachment" ever fitted to a motor in this State a couple of weeks ago. Mr. L. B. Smith, who owns four motorcycles, had had the attachment fitted to one of them and is delighted with it. The combination attracts a great deal of attention whenever it is on the street.

Burton Holmes Coming Soon

Burton Holmes, traveler, author and lecturer, whose annual series of finely illustrated lectures has grown in popularity in this city from season to season, will soon be heard at Lyric hall in a new series of "Travelogues," as they are now called. During the past summer, while delivering a double series of travelogues in London, he devoted his daytimes to the gathering of material, photographic and otherwise, for two most interesting lectures on London and the surrounding country; this material will be exploited in his first two lectures here, under the titles "In London" and "Round About London." Each subject will be given twice, as Mr. Holmes is to give a double series at Lyric hall. "Beautiful Ireland" will be the topic for the third in each series, "The Russian Empire" will be the subject of the fourth and "Japan" will be the fifth and last in each series. Course A will be given on January tenth, twelfth, fourteenth and nineteenth and Course B on January eleventh, thirteenth, sixteenth, eighteenth and twentieth. Mr. Holmes will probably give an extra travelogue on the Yosemite Valley on Saturday afternoon, January fourteenth. All of the travelogues will be finely illustrated with magnificently colored stereopticon views and original motion pictures taken by himself and his assistant, Mr. Depue, in the countries which form the subject of each travelogue. Course tickets will be sold for both courses at the same prices as in former seasons, at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s, beginning Tuesday, January third.

Uncle George's Memoirs

Nearly all of the reviewers of "Uncle" George Bromley's volume of memoirs, "The Long Ago and the Later On," made their excerpts from the first part of the book, but there are as many good stories in the later chapters. One of the best is that which tells of "Blaze," a noted character in his day. It runs:

"It was during Mr. Heyworth's administration that an agent known as "Blaze" was found to be short eighteen hundred dollars in his accounts with the company. Now "Blaze" was a jolly, harum-scarum fellow, and weighed something over three hundred pounds. When the deficiency was discovered, there was a meeting of the directors called, and after reviewing the case and discussing the good qualities of "Blaze" and the benefit he had been to the company in keeping off opposition, it was decided to let him off for nine hundred dollars, and Mr. Heyworth was delegated to visit him at his office in Nevada and inform him of this decision. He did so, and when they met and exchanged greetings, said Mr. Heyworth:

"'Blaze,' we have examined the books and found you are eighteen hundred dollars short in your accounts."

"'I know it,' said "Blaze," 'and it was by betting on the wrong card, but I kept on, hoping to hit the right one, and make good the loss.'

"'Well,' said Mr. Heyworth, 'the company has talked the matter over, and decided to throw off half the amount.'

"'Is that so?' said "Blaze."

"'Yes, that's so,' said Mr. Heyworth."

"'Then give me your hand,' said "Blaze," and with moistened eye and quivering lips he stammered, 'then to show my gratitude for your kindness, I will throw off the other half.'

Quite a while after this "Blaze" was running a liquor saloon near the hotel at Grass Valley, when Artemus Ward, the humorist, gave an entertainment in the town, and the morning after the show, as he was about getting on board the stage, he was accosted by "Blaze," with the question:

"'Is this Mr. Ward?'"

"'Yes,' was the reply."

"'Well, here is your bill,' said "Blaze."

"'I have just settled my bill,' said Mr. Ward."

"'Oh, that was your hotel bill,' said "Blaze," 'this is a bill for two and a half for drinks.'

"'I haven't had any,' said Mr. Ward."

"'I can't help that,' said "Blaze." 'That's my saloon next door, and the drinks were there for you, and if you didn't drink them it wasn't my fault. You will, therefore, pay this bill before getting on the stage.' And the famous humorist, after gazing with feelings of awe upon the ponderous proportions of the bill collector, paid it without a murmur."

Another good story in the book is of an experience the author had in Sonora, in the days of the early mining boom. Space does not permit of its repetition here, or of many other readable stories that are scattered throughout the pages, and which escaped the eyes of the reviewers for the dailies. Probably the stories did not escape their eyes, however, but they simply did not know which of the many tales to choose from, where all are so quotable. Readers of Mr. Clough's articles in Town Talk on the missionaries in the Orient will be interested in what Uncle George has to say on the subject. I should like to quote liberally from the chapter on missionaries, but it would take more than the space at my disposal. Mrs. Greathouse's missionary work with pins, in Yokohama, is a very amusing account. Epicures will enjoy the description of the eel-houses in Japan, and the eel feast the author partook of, also the minute description of a clam bake on Angel Island. There are many bits of philosophy scattered through the pages, and the philosophy is for the most part that of the typical bohemian. How the author narrowly escaped becoming a plutocrat, and how he was directoried as a capitalist are of interest. The poems in the last chapter would be worth preserving in a volume by themselves, for some of the poets who wrote these "tributes of friendship" are of world-wide fame. It is not possible, within the scope of a short review, to describe the charm of these simply-told memoirs, in which famous names are mingled with those of lesser importance, and all written of in such a delightful, chatty style that it seems as if one were talking to the author instead of reading of his experiences. "The Long Ago and the Later On" is issued by A. M. Robertson of Post street, in neat binding, red or blue covers, and in a finer edition autographed and numbered. This edition, by the way, has all been sold.

The modish woman's stationery is as much a part of her nowadays as her dainty wardrobe. Cooper & Co., 746 Market Street, are showing the newest modes in paper and envelopes, dies and seals.

London's Sea Wolf

When Jack London was a mere lad just home from sea, he expressed a desire to write a story—"a story which will make you glad you are in front of your own fire at home; a story which will make the sea roar in your ears when you go to bed." Those who have followed his "Sea Wolf" in its serial publication in the Century, or who will read the book as it now appears, will not be apt to question his success in that particular. "The Sea Wolf" is strong meat, raw and bloody, if you will, but fascinating in spite of that. It is rather a character study than a novel in the ordinary sense. Briefly, Humphrey Van Weyden, gentleman of leisure, critic and scholarly dilettante, eminently satisfied with himself and his world, was crossing from Sausalito on a foggy January morning when the ferryboat was run into and sunk by a steamer. Van Weyden was thrown overboard in the sinking of the Martinez, and kept afloat by a life preserver until picked up some time later in the day when he had been carried out nearly to the Farallones by the strong ebb tide. It would have been a simple matter for his rescuer to have transferred him to a pilot boat or some inward bound craft, and that would have been the obvious and natural course pursued by any man but the eccentric captain of the sealing schooner on which he found himself. Wolf Larsen was a primitive man. There is no reason to classify him as insane, degenerate or in any sense irresponsible. He never from first to last gave any indication of not knowing just what he was about, nor of being unconscious of his enormous strength, or the consequences of using it to the full. He was a Viking born a thousand years out of his time, one who might have raided the coasts of Britain and Normandy and harried his neighbors on the sea. When the dainty, white-handed scholar was brought before this practical monarch it suited him to hold him in durance, and there was nothing to do but submit. Then began the process of making a man of unpromising raw material, and the hands which had scarcely lifted anything heavier than a pen learned to haul ropes and scrub decks, to cook in the galley and do such menial service as was demanded. The Ghost was unmistakably a hell-ship, the crew a match for their master and their master the one man who could keep them in subjection. Every day saw scenes of violence and bloodshed; every man walked in fear of his life. And yet this embodiment of brutal physical strength, untempered by conscience or convention, was by no means all animal. On the contrary, he had a keen intellectual faculty and had read deeply in all branches of literature. Self-taught, what he had was a curious compound of ignorance and enlightenment; familiar with Schopenhauer and Spencer, he had never heard the word ethics pronounced and had to study over the meaning of altruism. He was no mean antagonist, and the cultivated brain of the Van Weyden often found its match. In the course of time a woman was introduced on the scene, Maud Brewster, an authoress on her way to the Orient in search of health and literary material. As a matter of course both men fell in love to further complicate the situation. Thereafter the tale relates mainly to the successful attempt at escape by Van Weyden and Miss Brewster, their long voyage in an open boat and their final landing on an unknown island where they made their home, but one could very well spare the whole feminine episode. The evolution of the man "Hump" out of the gentleman, Humphrey Van Weyden, the masterly seamanship of Larsen, that strange duel in the fog between "Wolf," seal poacher, and his brother and mortal enemy, "Death," commander of a steam cruiser for putting down the illegal traffic, and the affairs on board the Ghost, not to mention the contests of intellect between the self-taught mariner and his involuntary passenger, would have been sufficient. There are times when women are very much in the way and this, decidedly, was one of them. There is something pitiful about the final end of Wolf Larsen. He deserved to go out of life in the midst of battle, and in spite of his absolute and consistent materialism, one could wish him his place among the warriors of his race in Valhalla. Instead of which he fell a victim to disease, stricken in his full strength, robbed of one sense after another, and gradually but rapidly became less and less "a bit of the ferment." "The Sea Wolf" is not a lady's book. The average woman, with nerves and a capacity for seeing visions and dreaming dreams, will be well advised to let it severely alone. People with strong heads and a well-developed ability to sleep o' nights will not regret having read the book at least once. Whether people desire this particular kind of a book or not will be speedily determined by the applications at the libraries. As to the ability of Jack London to write a tale of terror, there is no question at all. Published by the Macmillan Company.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

Department No. —. No. 93470.

MINNIE C. MILLS,

Plaintiff

vs.

CHARLES E. MILLS,

Defendant.

Action brought in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court.

D. E. MCKINLAY,
Plaintiff's Attorney.

The People of the State of California send greeting to:

CHARLES E. MILLS, Defendant.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and to answer the complaint filed therein within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this County; or if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

The said action is brought to obtain a judgment and decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony now existing between plaintiff and defendant, upon the ground of defendant's willful neglect, also for general relief, as will more fully appear in the complaint on file, to which special reference is hereby made.

All of which will more fully appear in the complaint on file herein to which you are hereby referred.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

GIVEN under my hand and Seal of said Superior Court at the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, this 30th day of November, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and four.

JOHN J. GREIF, Clerk.

By A. HOUSTON, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Department No. 7. No. 92826.

THE GERMAN SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY,

Plaintiff.

vs.

JOHN V. VREDENBERGH, HENRY H. HULL and JOHN DOE ARNAIZ, also all other persons unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint, adverse to the Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto.

Defendants.

Action brought in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said Superior Court

GOODFELLOW & ELLS,
Attorneys for Plaintiff

The People of the State of California send greeting to:

JOHN V. VREDENBERGH, HENRY H. HULL and JOHN DOE ARNAIZ, also all other persons unknown, claiming any right, title, estate, lien or interest in the real property described in the complaint, adverse to the Plaintiff's ownership, or any cloud upon Plaintiff's title thereto, Defendants.

YOU ARE HEREBY REQUIRED to appear in the action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff, in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after service upon you of this summons, if served within said City and County; if served elsewhere, within thirty days.

AND YOU ARE HEREBY NOTIFIED that if you fail to so appear and answer, the Plaintiff will take judgment for any money or damages demanded in the complaint as arising upon contract, or will apply to the Court for any other relief demanded in the complaint.

Said action is brought to quiet Plaintiff's title and to determine all adverse claims of any of the defendants in and to that certain parcel of land situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, which is bounded and described as follows, to-wit:—

Commencing at a point on the southerly line of Greenwich street distant thereon 272.265 feet easterly from the easterly line of Gough street, and running thence easterly and along said southerly line of Greenwich street to a point distant thereon one hundred and twenty-two (122) feet and six (6) inches westerly from the westerly line of Franklin street; thence at a right angle southerly, parallel with said westerly line of Franklin street, to the intersection of the northeasterly line of the northwest quarter (1/4) of Lot No. Four (4) of the Laguna Survey; thence northwesterly along said line of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4) to the northerly corner of the northwest quarter (1/4) of said Laguna Survey Lot No. Four (4); thence northeasterly to the point of commencement.

Being a part of Western Addition Block No. 115, and being also a part of the northeast quarter (1/4) of said Lot No. Four (4) of the Laguna Survey.

WITNESS my hand and the Seal of said Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 15th day of October, in the year 1904.

JOHN J. GREIF, Clerk.

By A. J. BRANDER, Deputy Clerk.

NOTICE OF SALE.

OFFICE OF TAX COLLECTOR, CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Notice of sale of property of the State, pursuant to Section 3897 of the Political Code.

Whereas, On the 10th day of November, 1904, there was received by me and filed in my office a written authorization, under the hand and seal of the Controller of the State of California, which said authorization was and is in the words and figures following, to wit: Controller's Department, State of California—To the Tax Collector of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California:

Whereas, On various dates there were filed and recorded in the Controller's office of the State of California certain deeds conveying to the People of the State of California the title to those certain lots and parcels of land hereinafter described;

And whereas, Said deeds recite the fact that said property hereinafter described was struck off and sold to the People of the State of California for the non-payment of State and county taxes, penalties and costs, and all charges levied and assessed against the said property for the years 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897 and 1898;

And whereas, Five years have elapsed since the date of said sale, and no redemption, according to law, has been made of said property, or any part thereof;

Now, therefore, in pursuance of the laws in such cases made and provided, I, E. P. Colgan, Controller of the State of California, by virtue of the authority in me vested by the laws of this State, do by these presents authorize, empower and direct you, the said Tax Collector, to sell at public auction, in separate lots or parcels, the property hereinafter described, in the manner following: Public notice shall first be given of such sale by publication for at least three weeks in some newspaper published in the County, or City and County, or if there be no newspaper published therein, then by posting a notice in three conspicuous places in the County, or City and County, for the same period, which notices must state specifically the place of, and the day and hour of sale, and shall contain a description of the property to be sold, and shall also embody a copy of this authorization.

The property above referred to and hereby authorized to be sold is situate, lying and being in the County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and particularly described as follows, to wit:

OFFICE CHIEF OF POLICE

It gives me much pleasure to recommend to the public Mr. George Mayerle of San Francisco. I have been using glasses for the past six years and during that time have consulted several opticians but not until I had consulted Mr. George Mayerle and had him fit glasses to my eyes, did I get entire satisfaction.

Most respectfully,

J. H. ANDERSON,

Sergeant of Police.
